

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

THE SOUTHEASTERN REPORTER

VOLUME 109

(182 N. C. 838)

STATE v. PANNIL et al. (No. 346.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 2, 1921.)

1. Larceny \S 55—Evidence sustaining verdict of guilty.

In a prosecution for the larceny of a quantity of oats, evidence held sufficient to sustain a verdict of guilty.

2. Criminal law \S 1152(1)—Severance of trials within discretion of court.

In a prosecution of three defendants for larceny, the question of separate trials is within the discretion of the court, and not subject to review except for abuse.

3. Criminal law \S 370, 371(2)—Evidence of theft of other property held admissible as to knowledge and intent.

In a prosecution for larceny of a quantity of oats, evidence of the finding in defendants' possession of sweet feed and sweet feed bags belonging to the owner of the oats held admissible to show knowledge and intent.

4. Criminal law \S 922(7)—Judge's misrecital of testimony no ground for new trial.

That the judge in summing up to the jury misrecited the testimony held no ground for a new trial, counsel failing to call the court's attention thereto, and the instructions requiring the case to be tried on the evidence.

5. Criminal law \S 1059(2)—General exception to charge will not be considered on appeal.

The Supreme Court will not consider a general or "broadside" exception to the charge given in a criminal case.

Appeal from Superior Court, Rockingham County; Webb, Judge.

William Reid Pannil, Garland Watt, and Chas. W. Currie were convicted of larceny, and they appeal. No error.

The defendants were convicted of larceny of a large quantity of oats, the property of Nello Teer, and from the judgment upon such conviction appealed to this court.

Exceptions 7 and 9 were directed to the judge's refusal to give judgment as of non-suit at the conclusion of the state's evidence, and again at the conclusion of all the evidence.

The prosecuting witness, Nello Teer, was a contractor working upon the public roads of Rockingham county, and owning a number of mules and horses used in this work. He kept a warehouse in the town of Reidsville, in which he stored a large quantity of oats and sweet feed for his stock, and had missed oats for some time, about 300 bushels. Besides the ordinary fastenings, he nailed up the windows to the warehouse and put a bar across the door. On the night of December 11, 1920, the warehouse was broken into, and 14 5-bushel bags of oats were taken out. About 7 o'clock next morning, he discovered the loss, and secured two policemen of the town to accompany him with a search warrant in his attempt to follow the trail of the thief, or thieves. A one-horse wagon had been backed up to the platform, and though it had rained the night of the theft, they followed the track of this wagon along a devious course, and first to the barn of the defendant Currie. There they found a box of oats, and certain sweet feed bags which had Teer's name on them. The box of oats contained 10 or 15 bushels, and empty bags were hanging up on a wire across the corner of the feed room. There were a dozen or more sweet feed bags with Teer's name upon them, and 8 or more oat bags with his stock number on them. His stock number was z-72, the 72 indicating the grade of the oats and the z, it is contended, the point to which they were shipped. The wagon track was then followed from Currie's barn to the barn in which the other two defendants kept their horses. All of the defendants ran drays in the town of Reidsville. He found in Garland Watt's feed room three full bags and one half full of oats. The bags had the stock number z-72 on them. In another department in the barn, there was a box that had 10 bushels or more of oats in it. Several empty bags were found on that box, which contained also the stock number. He saw Garland Watt's horse after Garland was arrested, observed the horse's track, and it was very much like the track made by the horse attached to the wagon, "So much like it, that I thought it was the same track made by the shoe."

The defendant Pannil occupied one of the departments of a barn, in which Garland Watt had another. There were 10 or 12 bushels of these oats in Will Pannil's department. Will's father, Tom Pannil, and another man had horses in this barn also. None of the defendants had worked for Teer, and he had sold no oats or sweet feed to any of them. When his oat bags were emptied, he bundled them up and shipped them to T. A. Jennings & Sons, Lynchburg, Va.

The defendants claimed that they had bought these oats from one Will, or Brer, Garland. The defendant Currie testified that Will Garland sold him 2 bags of sweet feed at $2.50 a bag. He did not see Will Garland any more, but when he went in the barn the morning of the search the barn was filled with the oats, and the sacks were hanging where he had other sacks hung. He knew that the price of sweet feed on the market was from $3.40 to $3.60. He did not pay Will Garland for oats or sweet feed. Garland Watt claims that he bought 2 bags of sweet feed and 1 bag of oats from Will Garland on the same day that Currie claimed to have bought his. For the 3 bags he was to pay Will Garland $7.50. The oats were put in his barn that night, without his knowledge. Will Pannil also claimed to have bought 2 bags of oats, at $2.50 a bag, from Will Garland, and found them in the barn the next morning, the morning of the search, when he went to feed. He did not pay Will Garland for them. It seems from the testimony that Will Garland had disappeared. Defendants appealed from the judgment upon the verdict of guilty.

J. M. Sharp and J. R. Joyce, both of Reidsville, for appellants.

James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] If we follow the rule that only the state's testimony, with so much of the defendant's sustaining it, is to be considered, on a motion for judgment as of nonsuit, we are of the opinion that the evidence is amply sufficient to sustain the verdict, and the motion for a nonsuit was properly overruled.

[2] Exception 1 was directed to the judge's refusal to sever the trials of the three defendants. This, however, was in the sound discretion of the court. State v. Southland, 178 N. C. 676, 100 S. E. 187, where it was said to have been frequently held that a motion for a separate trial of defendants charged in the same bill of indictment is a matter that must necessarily be left to the sound discretion of the trial judge. To undertake to review such rulings is impracticable, and would result in great delay in the disposition of criminal actions. It is only when there appears to have been an abuse of such discretion that this court will entertain such exceptions and review the rulings of the trial judge. Nothing of that nature appears in this record, citing State v. Dixon, 78 N. C. 558; State v. Parish, 104 N. C. 689, 10 S. E. 457; State v. Hastings, 86 N. C. 597; State v. Haney, 19 N. C. 390; State v. Murphy, 84 N. C. 742. See, also, State v. Finley, 118 N. C. 1161, 24 S. E. 495; State v. Oxendine, 107 N. C. 783, 12 S. E. 573; State v. Gooch, 94 N. C. 997. There was manifestly no abuse of discretion by the judge.

"True it is that evidence as to one offense is not admissible against a defendant to prove that he is also guilty of another and distinct crime, the two having no relation to or connection with each other. But there are well-defined exceptions to this rule. Proof of another offense is competent to show identity, intent or scienter, and for other purposes"—citing State v. Murphy, 84 N. C. 742; State v. Parish, 104 N. C. 692, 10 S. E. 457; State v. Weaver, 104 N. C. 761, 10 S. E. 486; State v. Walton, 114 N. C. 783, 18 S. E. 945 and State v. Graham, 121 N. C. 623, 28 S. E. 409.

So in State v. Stancill, 178 N. C. 686, 100 S. E. 241, where there is a full discussion of the subject, with citation of the authorities, it is said there, at least substantially, that the testimony as to the theft of the Wilkinson tobacco, was offered merely to show the felonious intent with which the defendants stole this tobacco, and not to prove the accusation substantively. It was sufficiently connected with the main charge to render it competent for this purpose. It was all taken to Raymond Stancill's, the common storehouse for the loot of these defendants. It was but a part of a series of transactions carried out in pursuance of the original design, and it was contemplated by them in the beginning, that they should plunder the tobacco barns in the neighborhood, and this was one of them. The jury might well have inferred this common purpose from the evidence. Robbing Wilkinson was a part of the common design, and done in furtherance of it. Proof of the commission of other like offenses to show the scienter, intent, or motive is generally competent when the crimes are so connected or associated that this evidence will throw light upon that question. So it is with the oats and sweet feed in this instance, the two cases being alike.

The one inference to be drawn from the evidence is that defendants stole the oats and sweet feed in the nighttime under the cover of darkness, as the theft was discovered early in the morning, and the warehouse was locked and bolted the night before. The jury did not believe the story about the defendants buying the goods at a greatly reduced price from Will Garland, for, if they had believed it, they would have convicted the defendants upon the second count in the indictment for receiving the goods knowing them to have been stolen, there being ample evidence to warrant it, because, the dealing with Garland being necessarily in the nighttime, and the price asked being considerably below the market quotation, cast grave suspicion on the whole transaction. It was an incredible story at the best, and the jurors were not in credulous mood. But they concluded that Garland was a mythical man, and their story about him a pure fabrication, and consequently convicted them of the principal felony, which verdict is abundantly supported by the testimony.

[4] Exceptions 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17 were addressed to the judge's recital of the evidence. If there was any error or shortcomings in it, his attention should have been called to it at the time. A misrecital of the testimony by a judge in his summing up to the jury is no ground of new trial; such summing up being an appeal to their recollection. It is the right of counsel, in a proper manner and at a proper time, to correct such mistake by calling the attention of the judge to it, in the presence of the jury, before the cause is finally committed to them; and a failure then to make the correction is a waiver of all right to make it thereafter. Wheeler v. Schroeder, 4 R. I. 383.

Exception 18 relates to the following clause in the judge's charge:

"And they admit, that is Currie and Pannil, that they purchased some oats from Garland the afternoon before."

As a matter of fact, Pannil and Watt admitted that they purchased oats from Garland the afternoon before. Currie denied that he bought any oats, but claimed to have bought two bags of sweet feed from Garland. This, however, was a lapse of the tongue, and an error in the recital of the testimony which should have been brought immediately to the attention of the court. The judge told the jury expressly that, "You will try this case solely upon the evidence," and the judge himself, in the very next sentence, corrects his error in regard to Currie. After reciting the contentions of the state and of the defendants, he said to the jury:

"When you go out to consider your verdict, you will discard everything except the evidence in this case."

This exception is covered fully by what has been said above, in regard to exception 4, and including 2 to 5 and 8, and the authorities there cited are applicable here.

Exceptions 19 and 20 were directed to the recital of the state's contentions, while 21 and 22 relate to the recital of the defendants' contentions. In the state of the record these cannot be assigned as errors here, and what we have said above as to exceptions 10 to 17, and the authorities there cited, apply equally in this instance.

Exception 23 has been sufficiently considered in our discussion of exceptions 7 and 9.

Exception 24 was directed to what was a clear and accurate statement by the judge of the reasons why the evidence, in regard to sweet feed and the bags, was admissible, and at the same time a warning to the jury that defendants were not indicted for stealing bags of sweet feed but bags of oats. The evidence was admitted simply as a circumstance to be considered by the jury when weighing the evidence as to whether or not the defendants were guilty of the larceny of oats or guilty of receiving them, knowing at the time that they were stolen.

[5] Exception 25 was a general, or "broad-side," exception to the charge, and as such will not be considered by this court.

This was a bold robbery, done with deliberation, but the defendants were so hurried in its commission, or for some other reason, they failed to conceal, or remove, the marks of identification on the bags, and it makes little difference whether they were oats bags or sweet feed bags. Those that were marked were found with other bags of a kind taken from the warehouse. They were there the night of the robbery, and they were not there the next morning, when it was first discovered that the house had been entered and rifled of a part of its contents. The marked bags identified those unmarked, because (noscitur a sociis) they are known by their companions as a man is said to be known by the company he keeps. What difference does it make whether the mark on the bags was the prosecutor's name or his stock number, so that it identified the bags as the property which had been stolen from him. The numbers were as sufficient for the purpose as his name, but defendants, if they saw them on the bags, did not appreciate their significance and were thus entrapped by their own ignorance, which not infrequently happens in such cases.

The substantial and pivotal objection to the trial of the case below is based upon a misapprehension concerning the competency and relevancy of the testimony as to marks on the sweet feed sacks, which we have shown was clearly admissible. That is sharply made the focus of criticism, and all possible emphasis laid upon it, as not only important, but as being prejudicial to the defendants. We have met this objection sufficiently, and no more comment is required.

The other exceptions, including those to the instructions, are without any real merit. The charge was full and fair to both sides, and is not subject to the objections which are made to it. When the judge correctly ruled upon the evidence, the issue became very largely one of fact, and there was an abundance of evidence to support the verdict.

We can find no error in the case or record. No error.

HUNEYCUTT v. BOARD OF ROAD COM'RS OF STANLY COUNTY. (No. 409.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 2, 1921.)

1. Statutes \Rightarrow 97(2)—Act vesting in commissioners control of county's roads and bridges held not within prohibition of local or private legislation.

Since the purpose of acts 1921, § 3, vesting entire control and management of the public roads and bridges of Stanly county in the board of road commissioners created by such act, and declaring it their duty to take charge of working, repairing, maintaining, altering, and constructing roads and bridges maintained and thereafter built by such county, was not to authorize the laying out, opening, altering, or discontinuing of any road or highway but to provide means by which the general roadwork of the entire county might be carried on and maintained, such act is not within the constitutional prohibition (Const. art. 2, § 29) of local or private legislation.

2. Highways \Rightarrow 95(1) — Acts incorporating boards of road commissioners to construct and maintain, highways, held valid, though county commissioners levy and collect taxes.

Acts incorporating boards of road commissioners, distinct from the county commissioners, and giving them full control and authority over the construction, maintenance, laying out, altering, and discontinuing of public roads and highways, are valid, though the issuing of bonds and the control and ordering of road work are given to the local authorities, while the county commissioners levy and collect taxes.

3. Counties \Rightarrow 174—County road commissioners held authorized to issue county road improvement bonds.

Under Acts 1921, § 6, authorizing the road commissioners of Stanly county to borrow money to pay debt incurred by the former boards of highway commissioners for constructing roads and bridges in the county, to meet outstanding contracts for roadwork, etc., and providing that all notes or other evidences of debt given for such loan shall be executed by and in the name of "road commissioners of Stanly county," section 2, vesting the commissioners with all other powers necessary to carry out the provisions of the act, and section 4, providing that all such moneys spent and obligations incurred shall be deemed to be for the necessary public expense and good of the county, the commissioners had power to issue road improvement bonds in their name for a period not to exceed 40 years, as provided by C. S. § 3768, the governing authorities of a county having authority, when the power to incur a debt for a necessary expense exists, to make provision for payment thereof by issuing bonds, if desirable and proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanly County; Finley, Judge.

Action by E. E. Huneycutt against the Board of Road Commissioners of Stanly County. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Civil action to enjoin the defendant, board of road commissioners of Stanly county, from issuing certain bonds, to the amount of $200,000, in order to carry out the purposes of an act of the 1921 General Assembly (not yet published in book form) entitled, "an act to provide road commissioners and for road improvement in Stanly county." From a judgment dissolving the temporary restraining order, and holding that said bonds might be sold as valid and binding obligations, the plaintiff appealed.

G. D. B. Reynolds, of Albemarle, and Stack, Parker & Craig, of Monroe, for appellant.

Cansler & Cansler, of Charlotte, and Brown, Sikes & Brown, J. R. Price, and R. L. Smith & Son, all of Albemarle, for appellee.

STACY, J. The plaintiff assails the validity of the bonds in question upon the grounds: First, that the act of 1921, creating the board of road commissioners of Stanly county, and giving to them the entire control and management of the public roads and bridges in said county, is void under article 2, § 29, of the Constitution; and, second, that, even if said act be valid, it does not authorize the defendants to issue bonds in the name of the road commissioners of Stanly county.

Considering the objections in the order named, we may observe that the section of the Constitution, against which it is contended the present enactment of the Legislature offends, in part provides:

"The General Assembly shall not pass any local, private, or special act or resolution * * * authorizing the laying out, opening, altering, maintaining, or discontinuing of highways, streets, or alleys. * * * Any local, private or special act or resolution passed in violation of the provisions of this section shall be void. The General Assembly shall have power to pass general laws regulating matters set out in this section."

The act under consideration, among other things, provides as follows:

"Sec. 3. The road commissioners herein created shall have entire control and management of the public roads and bridges of Stanly county. That it shall be the duty of said board to take charge of working, repairing, maintaining, altering, and constructing all roads and bridges of Stanly county now maintained by the county as public roads and bridges and such as may be hereafter built."

[1] Thus it will be seen that the purpose of the act in question was not to authorize the laying out, opening, altering or discontinuing of any given road or highway, but to provide ways and means by which the general road work of the entire county might be successfully carried on and maintained. The two highway commissions hitherto existing in the county were to be abolished and one new central system established. It has been held with us, in a number of cases, that acts of this character do not fall within the constitutional prohibition against local, or private legislation. Brown v. Com'rs, 173 N. C. 598, 92 S. E. 502, and cases there cited; Mills v. Com'rs, 175 N. C. 215, 95 S. E. 481; Martin County v. Trust Co., 178 N. C. 27, 100 S. E. 134; Com'rs v. Pruden, 178 N. C. 394, 100 S. E. 695; Com'rs v. Bank, 181 N. C. 347, 107 S. E. 245, and cases there cited. The subject has been so thoroughly and fully discussed in these recent decisions that we deem it unnecessary to reiterate here the reasons upon which they are based.

[2] We have also repeatedly upheld acts of this character incorporating boards of road commissioners and giving them full control and authority over the construction, maintenance, laying out, altering, and discontinuing of the public roads and highways. Com'rs v. Road Com'rs, 185 N. C. 632, 81 S. E. 1001, and cases there cited. In Highway Commission v. Webb, 152 N. C. 710, 68 S. E. 211, the court decided that the Legislature, in its discretion, might create a board of road commissioners and vest them with such authority over the roads as the county commissioners had theretofore possessed.

"It is no objection to this legislation that the issuing of the bonds and the control and ordering of the roadwork are given to the local authorities, while the county commissioners are directed to levy and collect the taxes." Trustees v. Webb, 155 N. C. 383, 71 S. E. 520.

Again, in Hargrave v. Com'rs, 168 N. C. 626, 84 S. E. 1044:

"The questions presented in this case are almost identical with those considered in Com'rs v. Com'rs, 185 N. C. 632, in which a similar act was upheld. In that case, and also in Trustees v. Webb, 155 N. C. 379; Pritchard v. Com'rs, 159 N. C. 636, affirmed on rehearing, 160 N. C. 476; Tate v. Com'rs, 122 N. C. 812; Herring v. Dixon, Id. 420, and in other cases, this court has held that the construction and maintenance of public roads are a necessary public expense, and that the General Assembly may provide for the construction and working the same and may create a board to do this, distinct from the county commissioners, and fix and authorize the levy of taxes for that purpose, as in this act, without a vote of the people. We know of no reason to question the correctness of those decisions."

[3] Coming then to the second objection made by the plaintiff, to wit, that the defendants are without authority to issue bonds, we find the following provision in the act now before us:

"Sec. 6. The said road commissioners of Stanly county are hereby authorized and empowered to borrow money to an amount not exceeding two hundred thousand dollars at a rate of interest not exceeding six per cent. to pay the current indebtedness now due by the two old boards of highway commissioners in Stanly county incurred for constructing roads and bridges in said county, for which the notes or bonds of the county have not been heretofore issued, and to meet the contracts now outstanding for road work and for further constructing, altering and repairing the roads and bridges of said county. All notes or other evidences of debt given for any loan under this act shall be executed by and in the name of 'road commissioners of Stanly county' by its chairman and attested by its secretary and sealed with the seal of the board."

It is also provided in section 2 that the commission shall have "such other powers as are necessary to carry out any and all the provisions of this act." And further, in section 4:

"All moneys spent and all obligations incurred by said board in constructing, altering, repairing and maintaining the roads and bridges of said county shall be deemed to be for the necessary public expense and good of said county."

In addition to the specific provisions of the present act, it is the generally accepted position that the costs incurred in building bridges and constructing public roads constitute a part of the necessary expenses of a county. Tate v. Com'rs, 122 N. C. 812, 30 S. E. 352; Herring v. Dixon, 122 N. C. 420, 29 S. E. 368; McKethan v. Com'rs, 92 N. C. 243; Evans v. Com'rs, 89 N. C. 154. And whatever difference of opinion may be found in the decisions elsewhere, it has been held with us, in a number of cases, that—

"When the power to incur a debt for a necessary expense exists, there would seem to be no good reason of law to prevent the governing authorities of a town [or county] from making provision for the present or ultimate payment of such a debt by issuing bonds for the purpose, if good business prudence and existing conditions are such as to render this course desirable and proper." Com'rs v.

Webb, 148 N. C. 122, 61 S. E. 671; Jones v. Com'rs, 137 N. C. 579, 50 S. E. 291.

This was approved in Bennett v. Com'rs, 173 N. C. 625, 92 S. E. 603, where Hoke, J., writing the opinion, took occasion to say:

"True, we have held in this jurisdiction that when county commissioners have power to contract a debt or to provide for valid debts already contracted, they may, in the exercise of good business prudence, issue county bonds in evidence of the obligation, the right of taxation therefor being restricted to the constitutional limitations as to debts incurred since the same was adopted"—citing Com'rs v. Webb, 148 N. C. 120, 61 S. E. 670; McCless v. Meekins, 117 N. C. 34, 23 S. E. 99; French v. Com'rs, 74 N. C. 692; Johnston v. Com'rs, 67 N. C. 103.

In Johnston v. Com'rs, 67 N. C. 103, Pearson, C. J., speaking to this question, said:

"When the defendants, 'the board of commissioners,' succeeded to the office and duties of the justices of the peace in this regard, and found a very large amount of interest in arrear, was it the duty of the board of commissioners to levy and collect a tax in one year, sufficient to pay off the accumulated interest for some fifteen years? or did they have a discretion to endeavor to break the force of this burden upon the taxpayers of the county, by issuing county bonds to raise a part of the amount called for, and levying a tax for the residue? We think the board of commissioners had this discretion, and it seems to have been exercised in a discreet manner."

Upon the foregoing authorities, we think the objections made and now insisted on by the plaintiff must be resolved in favor of the validity of the bonds. But we are of opinion that the term of said bonds should not exceed a period of 40 years, as provided by section 3768 of the Consolidated Statutes. It was stated on the argument that this limitation would be observed. As thus modified, the judgment will be affirmed.

Modified and affirmed.

TRUSTEES OF ELON COLLEGE V. ELON BANKING & TRUST CO. (No. 333.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 26, 1921.)

1. Banks and banking §90—Part of a bank's business is acting as agent for customers.

An important part of the business of banks consists in acting as agent or bailee for its customers.

2. Banks and banking §153—Bank, holding itself out to receive and care for articles of unusual value, is not an accommodation bailee.

Banking institutions receiving articles of unusual value, and holding themselves out as having special facilities for their transmission and safe-keeping, are not accommodation bailees; the compensation being indirect benefits.

3. Banks and banking §153—Banks soliciting valuables for safe-keeping owe duty of care of prudent banker for his own property of like value.

Where banks have solicited and taken Liberty Bonds and other valuables for safe-keeping, they owe a duty of the care that a prudent and diligent banker would give his own property of like value and importance.

4. Bailment §33—By failure to return property prima facie case is made sufficient to go to jury.

When it is shown that the property in question has been delivered to the bailee and is not or cannot be returned, there is a prima facie case made for the bailor which is sufficient to go to the jury and authorize a verdict.

5. Negligence §136(2)—Question of fact and law.

Whether there has been negligence in the performance of any legal duty is generally a composite question of fact and law.

6. Banks and banking §154(9)—Negligence as bailee of bonds held jury question.

Negligence of a bank as bailee of bonds stolen by burglars held a question for the jury. Clark, C. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alamance County; Devin, Judge.

Action by the Trustees of Elon College against the Elon Banking & Trust Company. Case heard on facts agreed. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

This action was brought to recover the value of certain bonds of the United States, known as Liberty Bonds, which were deposited with the defendant for the purpose of being exchanged for the new bonds to be issued in their stead under the act of the Congress. The exchange was effected by the defendant and the bonds received by it and deposited in its bank, which will hereinafter more fully appear. They were stolen by burglars. Hence this action for their loss. A more detailed account of the facts and incidents of the case seems to be required.

The following is a substantial statement of the facts, as they appear in the record:

Plaintiffs are the Trustees of Elon College, and the defendant is a corporation of Elon College, N. C., engaged in the business of banking and writing, as agent, contracts of insurance. On March 15, 1920, defendant received from plaintiffs $5,850 in United States Liberty Bonds (of which only $4,400 is here involved) belonging to plaintiffs, to be transmitted by defendant through the Federal Reserve Bank at Richmond, to the United States Treasury Department at Washington, and converted into bonds of the permanent issue and returned to plaintiffs. Plaintiffs offered to pay any expenses incident to the service, but the bank agreed to handle the transaction, as it was its custom, as a matter of accommodation, and further agreed to notify plaintiffs' agent, T. C. Amick, treasurer of the college, upon the return of said bonds. Plaintiffs requested that the shipment be protected by insurance, and the defendant procured such insurance upon the transmission of the bonds from Elon College to Richmond. Of the bonds $4,400 were duly returned, arriving at the post office at Elon College on March 24, 1920, and on that date were receipted for by defendant's cashier, and taken into defendant's safe, where they remained until stolen, as hereinafter set out. On the night of April 19, 1920, defendant's safe was blown open by persons unknown to the parties, and said $4,400 in bonds as well as other property, were stolen and have not been recovered. It had been the custom of plaintiffs to keep their bonds and other valuables in a safe in the main building of the college, and not in defendant's safe. At the time of the burglary the college bonds were deposited in the defendant's safe, where the bank kept its own government bonds (which were also stolen), but not in the part thereof where the bank kept its cash and currency. That by the terms of certain insurance policies carried by the defendant, the bank could recover 100 per cent. of any loss from the money chest (or burglar-proof compartment), but could recover only 10 per cent. of any loss from other portions of the vault.

T. C. Amick, treasurer of the college, resides at Elon College, and is a teacher therein, and was at all times a director, vice president, and local auditor of defendant bank; that on April 2, 1920, he checked up the books of the bank and found $5,800 in Liberty Bonds in there, but the books seen by him did not show that any of the bonds belonged to plaintiffs. A certificate or affidavit made by Amick, as auditor of the bank, showing that the bank had $5,800 Liberty Bonds in the vault on April 2, 1920, was later used by the bank to induce the insurance companies to include the $4,400 of college bonds in the total appraisal of loss sustained by the burglary, a copy of which affidavit is set out in the record. At the time of the burglary, the defendant carried two policies of burglary insurance; and in proof of the claim for loss under said policies the converted bonds belonging to plaintiffs, amounting to $4,400, were listed by the defendant as property, or money for which the defendant was liable and defendant has received and now has 10 per cent. of the said sum, or $440, which it thus received from the insurance companies. If said bonds had been in the burglar-proof compartment where defendant kept its money, the bonds would not have been stolen, or, if stolen, the defendant would have received the full value of the same, or $4,400.

The defendant has tendered the sum of $440 to plaintiffs in full of plaintiffs' claim against it, but the offer has been declined. Defendant still tenders and offers to pay plaintiffs said sum of $440.

The case was heard on facts agreed submitting the controversy without action to the judgment of the court.

The court gave judgment for the defendant, and plaintiff appealed.

D. R. Fonville, of Burlington, and Brooks, Hines & Smith, of Greensboro, for appellant.

E. S. W. Dameron, of Burlington, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). The plaintiffs' counsel contended that, in the consideration of the questions presented herein, certain material facts, which they contend have been admitted, should be kept in mind and control our decision. We will state, as briefly as possible, the grounds upon which these contentions are laid, in discussing the prominent features of the case.

The bank solicited the business, and by reason of the bank's offer the plaintiffs did forego other safe and convenient methods of transmitting the bonds. The bank held itself out as having safe means of preserving the bonds, plaintiffs asked for insurance that would protect them, offered to pay any expense incident thereto, and defendant is an insurance agent. The bank, being in the insurance business, was in a position to know just how fully it was protected, and but for its negligence in acquainting itself with the terms of its own insurance policies might have been, and doubtless would have been, fully protected, instead of being protected only to the extent of 10 per cent. The bank agreed to notify plaintiffs upon return of the bonds. It negligently failed for 26 days to do so. If it had done so, the plaintiffs would have taken them from the bank and placed them in the safe of the college, "where it was the custom for the college to keep its bonds." The college safe was not robbed. The bank did not keep these bonds where it kept its money, and if it had, they would not have been stolen, or, if they had been stolen the bank would have recovered from the insurance company 100 per cent. of such loss. The bank at the time of the loss, acknowledged its liability, and recovered $440 insurance money by solemnly declaring its liability. It still has this money. It has never offered to return the money to the insurance company, but instead offers it to plaintiffs, and avers that it is liable only to this extent. These are some of plaintiffs' contentions:

[1] It is thus well said, in an interesting note by the late Judge Freeman, to be found in 38 Am. St. Rep. 773:

"A very important part of the business of every bank, whether private or incorporated, consists of acting as an agent or bailee for its customers."

It was at one time held by some courts that such services were outside the scope of authority of banking institutions, but all doubt about their propriety has been removed by such well-considered opinions as First National Bank of Carlisle v. Graham, 100 U. S. 699, 25 L. Ed. 750, and Third National Bank v. Boyd, 44 Md. 47, 22 Am. Rep. 35.

[2] While it is a general rule that an accommodation bailee is liable only for gross negligence, the courts in nearly all recent cases have held that a stricter degree of care is required of banking institutions receiving articles of more than usual value, and holding themselves out as having special facilities for their transmission and safe-keeping. In fact, they are not accommodation bailees, for while a bank "may not receive any direct compensation for its service, it obtains advantages therefrom in attracting and retaining clients." Note, Isham v. Post, 38 Am. St. Rep. 781. In the case of Levy v. Pike, 25 La. Ann. 630, the court, discussing a case somewhat similar to this, substantially said:

"Their object was doubtless to increase their deposits, and, of course, enhance their profits; and to accomplish it they held themselves out to the business community as prepared to take care of their valuable boxes. The taking care * * * of these boxes was a part of the business of the bank, by which they doubtless induced cash deposits and made considerable profits. We, therefore, do not regard the deposit in question as only a gratuitous one. Something more than no gross negligence or fraud was expected from the defendants. * * * They were bound to exercise such diligence as prudent bankers would exercise in taking care and preserving a thing of that character deposited with them."

[3] Since banks hold themselves out as having unusually safe and convenient means of transmitting and keeping Liberty Bonds and other valuable securities as well as money, and since such institutions at such small cost can obtain indemnity that will absolutely protect them, the courts have come to apply to them a measure of liability which has been invited by them, to wit, the rule of the ordinary prudent man in like circumstances; or, to be more specific, the care that a prudent and diligent banker would give his own property or securities of like value and importance. As has been said, the assertion that banks are liable for gross negligence only is well calculated, if generally accepted as such, to thwart the only purpose for which such a deposit is ever made. Banks are instituted, and their buildings constructed, for the delivery in, and safe-keeping of, money and money securities; and these bonds were deposited in defendant's bank for greater security of the bonds, that is, for safe-keeping. Whitney v. National Bank, 55 Vt. 155, 45 Am. Rep. 598; Isham v. Post, 141 N. Y. 100, 35 N. E. 1084, 23 L. R. A. 90, 38 Am. St. Rep. 780, and note. Schouler, in his recent work on Bailments and Carriers (section 35), after stating that a gratuitous bailee is liable only for slight care and diligence, according to the circumstances, and cannot be held for loss or injury, unless grossly negligent, says:

"This statement of the rule, though strongly buttressed upon authority, fails at this day of universal approval in our jurisprudence."

The same author says that what is negligence or gross negligence depends largely upon the value of the property, and upon business usage, and the attendant facts. This court, in Hanes v. Shapiro, 168 N. C. 24, 84 S. E. 33, treating of this question, brings our state into line with the majority of jurisdictions, by saying:

"But, in the last analysis, the care required by law is that of the man of ordinary prudence. This is the safest and best rule, and rids us of the technical and useless distinctions in regard to the subject."

And this case is quoted with approval in Perry v. Railroad, 171 N. C. 158, 88 S. E. 156, L. R. A. 1916E, 478. It is evident that the so-called distinctions between slight, ordinary, and gross negligence over which courts have perhaps somewhat quibbled for a hundred years can furnish no assistance. Mad-dock v. Riggs, 106 Kan. 808, 190 Pac. 12, 12 A. L. R. 221. The care must be "commensurate care," having regard to the value of the property bailed and the particular circumstances of the case. Hanes v. Shapiro, supra.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Preston v. Prather, 137 U. S. 604, 11 Sup. Ct. 162, 34 L. Ed. 788, held that banks, acting as bailees, without reward, in the care of special deposits are bound to exercise such reasonable care as men of common prudence bestow upon the protection of their own property of a similar character. The theory that the bailee's care of his own property is a satisfactory test of his duty to a bailor has also been rejected. It is now the law that the bailee must take such care of his property as prudent and careful business men generally take of property of like value and importance. Any other rule would put a premium upon negligence and carelessness. The modern rule is well stated in Mad-dock v. Riggs, 106 Kan. 808, 190 Pac. 12, 12 A. L. R. 219, and is, in substance, this: That while many respectable authorities may be found which regard such a showing as the true test in determining whether there has been gross negligence, the better rule is that taking such care of the property, or thing, as of one's own, repels a presumption of gross negligence; but this may be overcome and liability fastened upon the bailee, nevertheless, by showing the failure to exercise the care that under all the circumstances was required of him, because, manifestly, one may take risks with his own property that he has no right to take with another's, and because it is not a question of the care exercised by him as an individual merely, but as one of a class. In 3 R. C. L. at page 102, it is well said that a gratuitous bailee will not be permitted to absolve himself from all responsibility for the care of an article bailed, merely by proving that he has been likewise grossly negligent with his own goods. See, also, 6 C. J. 1119, §§ 57 and 59.

In Boyden v. Bank, 65 N. C. at page 19, is found an expression which is relied on by defendant, that a bank "is bound only to keep a [special] deposit with the same care that it keeps its own property of a like description." Of course, the court did not mean to make the bald statement, that a bank can be negligent with its own property, and be excused from responsibility for that of another, because the latter was held by it as bailee and dealt with in the same manner as was its owner. In the old case of Doorman v. Jenkins (1834) 2 Ad. & El. 256, 111 Eng. Reprint, 99, 4 Nev. & M. 179, 4 L. J. K. B. N. S. 29, the plaintiff proved the delivery of the money to the defendant for the purpose of taking up a bill. The defendant was the proprietor of a coffee house, and the account he gave of the loss was that he unfortunately placed the money in a cash box which was kept in the taproom, and that the cash box with the plaintiff's money in it, and also a larger sum belonging to the defendant, was stolen from its place of deposit on a Sunday. Lord Chief Justice Denman, a very eminent and learned jurist, said in his charge it did not follow, from the defendant's having lost his own money, at the same time as the plaintiff's, that he had taken such care of the plaintiff's money as a reasonable and prudent man would ordinarily take of his own. The case is reported in 2 Ad. & El. 256 (111 Eng. Reprint, 99), where the action of the court in leaving the question, whether there had been culpable negligence, to the jury, was approved. See, also, Coggs v. Bernard, 2 Ld. Raym. 909 (92 Eng. Reprint, 107), 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 199.

We dealt with this question in Marks v. Cotton Mills, 135 N. C. 287, 47 S. E. 432, and Hanes v. Shapiro, supra. In the Marks Case, we held that an employer in respect to machinery and appliances was not exonerated from liability for an injury received by his employee, while using a machine or appliance, simply because he exercised that degree of care which he would have used if he had been supplying them for his own use, but that he must have been as careful of his employee as a man of ordinary prudence would have been if he was himself exposed to injury, and having regard for his own safety. The principle as to negligence is practically the same in both of the classes.

Reverting to the agreed facts in the case at bar, plaintiffs contend that the defendant has admitted five important things:

(1) It received the bonds as bailee, and is unable to return them.

(2) It was directed to insure the bonds, but carried only 10 per cent. insurance on them.

(3) It failed for a period of 26 days, contrary to express agreement, to notify plaintiffs that the bonds had been returned.

(4) It failed to keep the bonds in the burglar-proof compartment of its safe, where there was 100 per cent. safety—and 100 per cent. insurance.

[4] As to the first proposition, it seems to be well-settled law in this jurisdiction, and generally, that when it is shown that the property in question has been delivered to the bailee, and is not returned, or cannot be returned, there is a prima facie case made for the bailor which is sufficient to carry the case to the jury and to authorize a verdict for him. 3 R. C. L. pp. 150, 151; Hanes v. Shapiro, supra; Sprinkle v. Brimm, 144 N. C. 401, 57 S. E. 148, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 679.

There is some reference in the briefs, and also in the argument before us, to the question of insurance, that is, as to the duty of the defendant to have kept the bonds insured to their full value in compliance with a request to that effect made by the plaintiffs, but we need not enter at large upon the consideration of this question, as we will briefly refer to it later in our conclusion as to the present disposition of the case; and in the same category must be placed the reference to the notice by defendant to plaintiffs of the arrival of the new bonds, it being contended as to that feature of this case that the doctrine of Martin v. Outhbertson, 64 N. C. 328, applies, where it is held by the court:

"Where * * * there is any material departure from the terms of the bailment, the bailee becomes a wrongdoer, and is liable for any injury which results from the departure, without regard to the question of negligence."

And, in this connection, they also rely on 6 Corpus Juris, 1110 and 1111, as stating the rule of the most recent authorities, viz.: Where there is an express and valid contract, the terms thereof control, since both bailor and the bailee are entitled to impose on each other any terms they respectively may choose, and their express agreement will prevail against general principles of law applicable in the absence of such an agreement. The bailee is liable for loss resulting from breach of his contract to keep the property in a particular manner, or to return it at a particular time, or other special stipulation in regard to the property, without regard to whether he has been otherwise negligent. They refer also to Caril v. Goldberg, 59 Misc. Rep. 172, 110 N. Y. Supp. 318; Cochran v. Walker (Tex. Civ. App.) 49 S. W. 403; Sprinkle v. Brimm, 144 N. C. 401, 57 S. E. 148, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 679.

Plaintiffs contend further that the defendant kept the bonds in the wrong place, an unsafe place, while it kept its own money in the "money chest," which proved to be a safe place for it; but this matter also may be deferred for additional treatment in our conclusion, and also the contention that defendant has virtually admitted its liability, by collecting the $440 from the insurance company upon its representation, expressed or implied, that it was, at least to that extent, liable to the plaintiffs.

We come now to the conclusion of the law upon all these matters, and variety of contentions.

[5, 6] The concise question necessarily involved in this case is whether the defendant, as bailee of the bonds, has exercised that care which the law requires of it, in the custody and preservation of them, and whether it gave the notice of their arrival at its banking house, and in other respects complied with the contract of bailment. We find ourselves unable to determine these questions and to decide fairly and correctly as to the rights of the one party, or the liability of the other, upon the case agreed as we find it to be in the record. Whether there has been negligence in the performance of any legal duty is generally a composite question of fact and law, and is in this case, as in nearly all others, one for the jury to decide under proper instructions from the court. The admissions of the parties, as stated in this case, are not so conclusive in their character, and not so comprehensive, as to present the naked question of law whether the defendant has broken the contract of bailment and the plaintiffs have been thereby proximately injured. We can well conceive of other elements, or facts and circumstances additional to those stated in the case, which may well enter into the proper solution of this central and controlling question. The defendant does not, expressly or impliedly, admit its negligence, but denies it strenuously, and, conversely, the plaintiffs do not, expressly or impliedly, admit that there was no negligence. Neither could safely make such an admission. It would end the case against it (the bank or college) should either be so indiscreet as to make the admission. Negligence is pre-eminently a question for a jury, with proper advice from the court as to the law, to pass upon; as the existence or non-existence of it in the particular case depends upon the special facts and circumstances—and all of them.

We do not assert that the facts and circumstances cannot be so stated as to determine the rights and liabilities of the respective parties, but they are not apt to be, as it might require too grave and serious an admission, if not a fatal one, on the part of one or the other of the litigants. Sufficient it is to state that such a case is not presented here. The parties have selected the wrong method of presenting the true question involved in the case, or, to state it another way, they have not stated exhaustively all the facts and circumstances essential to a decision of the pivotal issue, whether there has been negligence.

We hold though that there is evidence of a consideration for the bailment, and if the latter is found by the jury to exist, the measure of care, which the law requires to be exercised by the bank, would be that of an ordinarily prudent person in like circumstances, and not merely slight care, and its responsibility would consequently arise without the presence of gross negligence.

The facts recited by us in this opinion, and partially repeated elsewhere, are evidence of negligence indisputably, but only evidentiary in character, as the ultimate fact of negligence is not stated in the case, and whether the notice was given, or, if given, whether the plaintiffs would have removed the deposit before the theft are also, and at least, but matters of fact, as is the question whether the plaintiff had actual knowledge that the bonds had come (Bank v. Burgwyn, 110 N. C. 267, 14 S. E. 623) and were in the bank for them, or their order, thereby dispensing with notice. We do not decide such questions, but only questions of law. A case agreed must state all the facts necessary to a decision, which this case does not do. In this, if not in other respects, the agreed case lacks completeness. This must be so, unless, whether there is negligence is not a mixed one of law and fact.

For the reasons given, the case is remanded, with directions to submit it to a jury to find as to the question of negligence upon all the evidence, unless the parties agree to a reference for that purpose, or unless they can, and will, amend their case so as to present the bare question of law, which they are not likely to do.

Error, and remanded with instructions.

CLARK, C. J. (dissenting), is of the opinion that the facts are sufficiently set forth in the case agreed and that judgment should be entered thereon in favor of the plaintiff. The bank solicited the business, and by reason of its representations the plaintiff did forego other safe and convenient methods of transmitting the bonds. The bank held itself out as having safe means of preserving the bonds. The plaintiff asked for insurance that would protect it and offered to pay any expenses incident thereto. The defendant bank was in the insurance business, and but for its negligence in acquainting itself with the terms of its own insurance policies would have been fully protected instead of being protected only to the extent of 10 per cent. The bank agreed to notify the plaintiff upon return of the bonds, but negligently failed for 26 days to do so. If it had given notice as it should have done, the plaintiff would have taken the bonds from the bank and have placed them in the safe of the college "where it was the custom for the college to keep its bonds." The college safe was not robbed. The bank did not keep these bonds where it kept its own money, and, if it had, they would not have been stolen, or, if they had been stolen the bank would have recovered from the insurance company 100 per cent. of such loss. The bank at the time of the loss, acknowledged its liability, and recovered $440 insurance money by admitting its liability.

Upon these facts which the defendant has admitted, it would seem clear that there was no negligence on the part of the plaintiff, and that there was negligence on the part of the defendant bank against whom judgment should be rendered upon the case agreed.

KIMBROUGH v. HINES, Director General of Railroads, et al. (No. 254.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 26, 1921.)

1. Railroads \S 5½, New, vol. 6A Key-No. Series—Federal control prevents suit against company.

Where employee of railroad under federal control was injured through negligence of train crew, he could not proceed against the railroad, but must proceed only against the Director General of Railroads, in view of General Order No. 50.

2. Appeal and error \S 1173(1)—Joint judgment against railroad and Director General reversed as to railroad.

Where a railroad employee injured by negligence of train crew of a railroad under federal control sued both the Director General of Railroads and the railroad and obtained a joint judgment, the judgment was reversed as to the railroad and affirmed as to the Director General, where the nature of the evidence would in no respects have been changed and the verdict of the jury would have been the same if the action had proceeded against the Director General alone, in view of C. S. \S 658, 1412.

Walker, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Connor, Judge.

Action by J. W. Kimbrough against Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads, and the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed as to the Director General, and reversed as to the railroad.

Murray Allen, of Raleigh, for appellants.
Douglass & Douglass, R. W. Winston, and J. M. Broughton, all of Raleigh, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. This case was before us at fall term, 1920 (Kimbrough v. Hines, 180 N. C. 274, 104 S. E. 684), and a new trial was granted in an opinion by Walker, J. It appears from the transcript in this case that the trial judge has observed the directions in every respect laid down in that opinion, and therefore we do not deem that it is necessary to repeat the law applicable to the facts which are identical with those presented on the former appeal.

[1] This action was brought against Walker D. Hines, Director General, and the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. The judgment is against each of the defendants. Since this case was tried, the United States Supreme Court, in the opinion in R. R. v. Ault, 256 U. S. —, 41 Sup. Ct. 593, 65 L. Ed. —, filed July 1, 1921, have held that where such actions as this have been brought against the Director General joining as a party the railroad company which was being operated under General Order No. 50, that the action cannot be sustained as against the railroad company. The plaintiff in this case now submits that a modification of the judgment should be ordered reversing the judgment, and dismissing the action, as to the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company.

[2] The issues in this case affecting the liability of the Director General and the railroad company were separate and distinct, and, had the trial judge stricken out all allegations in the complaint and the issues relating to the railroad company, there would have remained a perfectly alleged cause of action against the Director General. The nature of the evidence would in no respect have been changed, and the verdict of the jury would have been the same. The Director General has no ground to insist that the judgment against the railroad company should not be reversed and the action dismissed as to said company.

C. S. \S 658, reads thus:

"Upon an appeal from a judgment or order, the appellate court may reverse, affirm, or modify the judgment or order appealed from, in the respect mentioned in the notice of appeal, and as to any or all of the parties, and may, if necessary or proper, order a new trial."

C. S. \S 1412, provides in part as follows:

"In every case the court may render such sentence, judgment and decree as, on inspection of the whole record it shall appear to them ought in law to be rendered thereon."

Under the technical rules of the common law a different rule prevailed, but the court of equity always followed this procedure, which was adopted by this state when the distinction between law and equity was abolished. One court having taken the place of both law and equity, a joint judgment may be affirmed as to one defendant, and dismissed as to another. This has been the uniform course and practice since the blending of the two forms of procedure, and is expressly authorized by our statutes, above quoted. Newberry v. R. R., 160 N. C. 156, 76 S. E. 233; Hollingsworth v. Skelding, 142 N. C. 242, 55 S. E. 212; Long v. Swindell, 77 N. C. 185. The same practice has been followed in the courts of the other states which have adopted the modern system of practice.

Every objection which could be presented by the Director General is presented before us by this record as fully as it would be if the judgment as to the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company were not dismissed in pursuance of the decisions of the United States Supreme Court in R. R. v. Ault, supra, and the appeal as to the Director General has been in no wise prejudiced by the reversal of the judgment and the dismissal of the action as against the railroad company. Indeed, in Ault's Case the court recognized this course, for, while reversing the judgment as to the railroad company as an unnecessary and improper party, it proceeded to review and discuss the appeal as to the Director General on the merits and reversed that appeal on an entirely different ground.

The judgment against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company is reversed and set aside, and the action as regards that company is dismissed. In the appeal by the Director General we find no error.

WALKER, J. (dissenting). I concur with the other judges that the defendant railroad company is not liable under the recent decision of the United States Supreme Court in Mo. Pac. R. R. Co. v. Ault, appearing in 256 U. S. —, 41 Sup. Ct. 593, 65 L. Ed. —, filed July 1, 1921, and that therefore defendant has properly been dismissed from the case with its costs.

I also agree with my Brethren that judgments, under our Code of Procedure, may be joint or several, and therefore may be rendered against one or more of the defendants, and may also adjust matters in controversy as between plaintiffs and defendants, or between plaintiffs or between defendants, so elastic is our present system, be it said to its great credit. In extolling its virtues and its simple and practical methods of dealing with all matters of litigation, and its provisions should be most liberally construed in order to effectuate justice as speedily as possible instead of delaying, or even defeating it, by dilatory pleading and practice which was the fault of the old common-law system intended to be remedied. For example, the pleadings are sufficient if they state, in a plain and concise manner without any unnecessary repetition (Pell's Revisal, § 467), the essential facts of the case (Blackmore v. Winders, 144 N. C. 215, 56 S. E. 874; Brewer v. Wynne, 154 N. C. 457, 70 S. E. 947; Stokes v. Taylor, 104 N. C. 395, 10 S. E. 566; Warren v. Boyd, 120 N. C. 53, 26 S. E. 700), and likewise, in the interest and furtherance of this more liberal and sensible procedure, it is provided that—

"(1) Judgment may be given for or against one or more of several plaintiffs, and for or against one or more of several defendants; and it may determine the ultimate rights of the parties on each side, as between themselves.

"(2) It may grant to the defendant any affirmative relief to which he may be entitled.

"(3) In an action against several defendants, the court may, in its discretion, render judgment against one or more of them, leaving the action to proceed against the others, whenever a several judgment may be proper."

It was right to proceed further against the Director General. These latter exceptions of the defendant, as to the judgment, were properly denied, which brings us to the merits of the case.

Plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for personal injuries sustained at Selma, N. C., January 27, 1919, as the result of a collision at a public crossing between the automobile which he was driving and a train on the line of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, which was being operated by the United States Railway Administration. There was testimony, on behalf of plaintiff, tending to show that the train was running at a speed of 30 or 40 miles an hour; that no signal of approach to the crossing was given by whistle or bell; that the view of the track was cut off by a string of cars on a spur track; and that these cars extended two or three feet into the public road. Plaintiff testified that he looked and could not see down the track in the direction from which the train was coming, because his view was obstructed by the cars on the spur track.

There was testimony on behalf of the defendant tending to show that the cars on the spur track did not obstruct the plaintiff's view of the train, as the end of the car next to the crossing was some distance therefrom, that notice of the approach of the train had been given by blowing the whistle and ringing the bell, and that the speed of the train did not exceed 10 or 12 miles an hour. The defendants pleaded the plaintiff's contributory negligence as a defense, and contended at the trial that the failure of the plaintiff to stop before entering upon the track, when it was his duty to do so, was, as matter of law, the proximate cause of his injury, as the facts with regard thereto were not questioned.

The case was before the court at the fall term, 1920, and a new trial was ordered. In the opinion of the court (180 N. C. 274, 104 S. E. 684), it is stated that the decision of the motion for a judgment of nonsuit would be reserved. This motion should be allowed, upon the facts as they now appear.

"The failure of a person about to cross a railway track, on a highway at grade, to look and listen for an approaching train, or stop for such purpose, where the view of the track is obstructed, or where there is noise which he may control, * * * is negligence per se, which will bar a recovery for an injury resulting from a collision with a train at such crossing." Blackburn v. Railroad, 34 Or. 215, citing numerous cases in support of this position at page 222, 55 Pac. 225, 226; B. R. v. Biwer (C. C. A.) 206 Fed. 965.

In Chase v. Maine Central R. R. Co., 167 Mass. 383, 45 N. E. 911, it is said to be a general rule:

"That, if there is anything to obstruct the view of a traveler on the highway at a crossing at grade, it is his duty to stop until he can ascertain whether he can cross with safety."

Plaintiff was thoroughly familiar with the crossing, having passed over it on the morning of the accident on his way from Raleigh to Pine Level. He knew the lay of the ground at the crossing and that he was approaching the crossing and says he slowed down. In describing the condition at the crossing and the circumstances of the accident, plaintiff testified that as he approached the crossing, he saw a long string of box cars on the connection track which extended 2 or 3 feet into the highway; that these cars entirely obstructed his view to the south, the direction from which the train was coming; that when he was within 20 feet of the crossing he "slowed down" his Ford automobile and brought it down practically to a stop, but did not stop. He described the situation with which he was confronted as looking like a "death trap." Plaintiff further testified:

"I said I came very near to a stop. I was practically right at the railroad track. I was 10 feet back from the railroad when I slowed up, and when I went through I put my foot on low gear. That Ford car would run under low gear not over 4 or 5 miles with all the gas I could give it. As well as I remember, I gave it all the gas I could."

On cross-examination plaintiff testified that he did not stop before going on the track; that if he had stopped behind the box cars the train would have passed on by, and he would not have been injured. He says:

"When I slowed down, I put my hands on the emergency brake. I was practically at a stop when I reached the edge of those box cars; I was in low gear and speeded up to go on through. I said in my direct examination that I gave all the gas I could when I started to go through there, and that I was 10 feet from the crossing when I slowed down and put my hands on the emergency. That nearly stopped my car; by pulling a little harder, I could have stopped it. If I had heard the train I could have stopped almost immediately. I did not have a starter on the Ford. If I had stopped there behind that car, I could also have stopped my engine—yes, stopped any noise the engine was making. I did not stop. When a Ford is in low gear, it makes more noise than at any other time. Yes, I started off from a point 10 feet. I started in low gear, and I went nearly to the crossing with the engine making more noise than when I came nearly to a stop. They make more noise when you put them in low gear. Of course, when I went in low, I speeded up my engine; the more you speed the engine the more noise you make."

On redirect examination plaintiff testified that he thought there might be a shifting engine there, and that is why he slowed down.

Richard Britt, witness for plaintiff, testified that just before plaintiff reached the crossing he put his automobile in low gear and speeded it up.

The motions of defendants for a nonsuit, on the ground that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, should have been allowed.

Defendants excepted to the following instructions:

"It was the duty of the defendants to keep their premises at and near crossings free from obstructions which would prevent the plaintiff from seeing a train on the railroad approaching the crossing from a point on the highway at which he could stop his car in time to avoid a collision."

The court later instructed the jury that a failure to perform this duty would be negligence on the part of the defendants. It is not the unqualified duty of defendants to keep the premises free from obstructions. The duty could not be greater than to exercise the care of a prudent person in this respect.

The jury were also instructed as follows:

"It being admitted that Selma is a thickly settled town, that near the public crossing there is an intersection of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad with the Southern Railroad tracks passing over the crossing and that the public highway is much frequented by travelers, it was the duty of the defendants not to run its train in approaching the crossing at a rapid and reckless speed without giving reasonable and timely notice of its approach. A failure on the part of the defendant to perform these duties or any one of them would be negligence on their part. * * * Now, gentlemen, there is no evidence here that there is any ordinance in the town of Selma prescribing the rate of speed at which they should pass, but I instruct you inasmuch as Selma is an important town and thickly settled, and that there are many tracks there, and there was an intersection of the Southern and Atlantic Coast Line, I instruct you that the defendant owed a duty to the public not to cause its locomotive to go through that town at a rapid and excessive rate of speed, and if under all the facts and circumstances you find that the speed was dangerous and reckless and not safe, then there would be negligence in that regard."

This instruction entirely disregards the fact that the burden of proof was on plaintiff to satisfy the jury by a preponderance of evidence that the train was being operated at a reckless speed. A finding "under all the facts and circumstances" is clearly insufficient.

The jury were further instructed:

"If, however, you find from this evidence that there has been negligence on the part of the defendant, then it would become your duty to further consider the evidence and ascertain whether or not such negligence as you may find was the direct and proximate cause of the injury which you may find that the plaintiff sustained, because, notwithstanding the fact that the defendant may have been negligent, unless that negligence caused the injury to the plaintiff, the defendant would not, in law, be liable to the plaintiff. For instance, suppose the railroad company had been negligent in obstructing his view of a train approaching from the south, but that he had been injured by a train coming from the north, as to which there was no negligence, then, of course, his injury not having been caused by the negligence of the railroad, the railroad company would not be liable to him."

This instruction must have been exceedingly confusing to the jury in considering the relation of cause to negligence on the part of defendant, and the causal connection between the two.

The court then instructed the jury as follows:

"It was the duty of the defendants operating the locomotive and cars on the railroad to give reasonable and timely notice of the approach of the trains to the public crossing by ringing the bell, or blowing the whistle, or by doing both, if under the circumstances and conditions existing at the time such was reasonably necessary to give such notice."

This instruction was not supported by the evidence. There is nothing in the record to show the existence of circumstances requiring both the ringing of the bell and blowing of the whistle.

The court later instructed the jury that failure in performance of this duty would be negligence on the part of defendants. Considered together, these instructions are erroneous. An instruction not warranted by the evidence is erroneous, although correct as an abstract proposition of law. King v. Wells, 94 N. C. 344.

The following instruction was then given:

"I instruct you, gentlemen of the jury, that if you find from the evidence that the signals were not given, that is, the bell not rung and the whistle not blown, then there was negligence on the part of the defendant in that respect, and if you so find it would then be necessary for you to further consider this issue."

It has been thoroughly settled by us that it is not the absolute duty of a railroad engineer to blow the whistle and ring the bell, as that depends upon the exigencies of the occasion. Sometimes it will be sufficient to blow the whistle "or" ring the bell—and again, it may be the part of prudence, at times, to do both. Edwards v. R. R., 132 N. C. 99, 43 S. E. 585. The particular charge here was that if they found that the signals (in the plural) were not given, that is, that the bell was not rung and the whistle not blown, which clearly implied, as the duty was expressed conjunctively, that both such signals must be given, and the jury must have so understood it.

The jury were further instructed:

"It becomes necessary for you to further consider the evidence and determine whether any such negligence as you find the defendant to be guilty of was the proximate cause of the injury."

It seemingly was error for the court to say to the jury that the facts recited in these instructions constituted negligence on the part of the defendants. The issue reads "was plaintiff injured by the negligence of defendant," etc., and it would naturally impress the jury that they were being instructed by the court to answer the issue "Yes" if they found the facts as recited in the instructions.

The court instructed the jury as follows:

"Our Supreme Court has held that there is no absolute duty upon the driver of an automobile on approaching a railroad crossing to stop his car before going upon the crossing, but they have said that the rule being that a traveler must conform his conduct to that of a prudent man situated as the jury may find the plaintiff to have been immediately as he approached the crossing, that it is for the jury to say whether under all the facts and circumstances as they then appeared to him as a prudent man, that he should not only have looked and listened, but he also should have stopped his car. So it is necessary for you to consider and determine whether or not, in view of all the facts and circumstances as you find them to have been at the time that Mr. Kimbrough approached that crossing, whether as a prudent man he should have stopped that car. Unless you find, gentlemen of the jury, that the plaintiff was negligent, as I have instructed you, without further consideration, you will answer the fifth issue, 'No.'"

This instruction restricted the jury's consideration of this question to the elements of contributory negligence recited by the court. It prohibited consideration of other elements of negligence on the part of plaintiff, especially speeding up to go past the cars, permitting his engine to run with such noise as to interfere with his hearing, and others, and it excluded consideration of the combination of circumstances relied upon by defendant as contributory negligence; and there is this other defect, that his honor failed to give the converse of this proposition, and nowhere in his charge does he instruct the jury that upon finding certain facts they will answer the issue of contributory negligence, "Yes," as he then said:

"If, however, you find that he was negligent, you must proceed to the further consideration of the evidence and determine whether or not the negligence which you may find that the plaintiff was guilty of contributed to his injury." Jarrett v. Trunk Co., 142 N. C. 466, 55 S. E. 338.

Proximate cause upon facts admitted or found by the jury is a question of law. If plaintiff failed to stop when it was his duty to stop, it is clear that such neglect of duty contributed to his injury, and it was error to leave this question to the jury. Kimbrough v. Hines, 180 N. C. 274, 104 S. E. 684.

The court had previously instructed the jury that if plaintiff "failed to exercise proper care within the rule stated, it is such negligence as will bar recovery, provided always it is the proximate cause of his injury." This instruction is also subject to the objection that conduct of plaintiff which of itself would bar his right to recover was submitted to the jury on the question of proximate cause.

The court also instructed the jury as follows:

"The defendant says that if you find that notwithstanding the fact that they failed to give any signal, that notwithstanding that there was an obstruction that interfered with his view, and notwithstanding the fact that it was running the train too fast, still there would have been no injury, if Mr. Kimbrough had looked and listened and stopped his car, and that therefore you should find that his negligence in so doing was a contributing cause of his injury."

The defendants' contention was that, if the matters recited in this instruction were found to be true and plaintiff failed to look and listen and failed to stop, his conduct was contributory negligence as matter of law, and that the jury should have been so instructed.

Defendants noted an exception to the following instruction:

"If his view is obstructed or his hearing an approaching train is prevented, and especially if this is done by the fault of the defendant and the company's servants fail to warn him of its approach, and induced by this failure of duty, which has lulled him into security, he attempts to cross the track and is injured, having used his faculties as best he could, under the circumstances, to ascertain if there is any danger ahead, negligence will not be imputed to him, but to the company; its failure to warn him being regarded as the proximate cause of any injury he received."

It is patent that this instruction falls with the decision of this case on the former appeal (180 N. C. 274, 104 S. E. 684), in that it totally ignores plaintiff's duty to stop, if prudence on his part required it. If proximate cause is a question for the jury, the court erred in this instance in taking it from them.

It would not do to confine plaintiff's duty in the premises merely to two, or even three, recited facts, because the jury must be allowed to consider the situation in its entirety, and all the facts and circumstances connected with it, and then to say whether an ordinarily prudent man would have acted as plaintiff did on this occasion, or pursued a safer course, one which he himself says was open to him and which, if he had adopted it, would have prevented the injury to him. Nor is it true that the failure, on the part of the defendant, to warn of the train's approach, was, as matter of law, conclusively negligent, for whether so or not may depend very much upon all the facts and circumstances of the situation at the time, and the jury may well have found upon the evidence that the plaintiff was grossly imprudent in taking so great a risk, but should have waited for only a few moments and until he was better informed as to the safety or danger of crossing before "leaping in the dark" and taking his life into his own hands.

Even if this instruction may have been correct in the abstract, it was error to give it in this cause, under the facts and circumstances as now presented.

Defendants assign as error the following instruction to the jury:

"I instruct you that the defendant had the right to put cars on that connection track, but that they had no right to leave the cars on the track extending up to the main line so as to obstruct the view of the traveler upon the highway approaching the crossing, as I have instructed you. If, however, you find that there was a breach of duty, in that regard, this establishes negligence on the part of the defendant in respect to that matter."

The record is entirely lacking in evidence that the defendants, or either of them, left these cars on the track extending up to the main line so as to obstruct the view of the traveler on the highway. The record is silent as to when and by whom the cars were put in such position, if it is granted that they were at any time so close to the crossing, which defendants denied, and it is error to give an instruction which is not supported by the evidence. Griffin v. R. R., 137 N. C. 247, 49 S. E. 212; King v. Wells, 94 N. C. 344. It was also error to instruct the jury that the facts recited, taken by themselves, constituted negligence on the part of defendants. Besides, the recited facts did not constitute negligence, as matter of law, but whether so or not was for the jury to decide.

The defendants contended that it was the duty of the plaintiff to stop his automobile and to stop the noise of his engine before attempting to drive across the track, and that this duty was imperative, if his view of the track was totally obstructed, and whether this, or the obstruction of the string of cars, was the proximate cause of the injury, the jury should have been left perfectly free to determine.

The declarations of the plaintiff made after the accident, were incompetent, not being pars rei gestae. Evidence substantially the same was held to be incompetent in Bumgardner v. R. R., 132 N. C. 438, 43 S. E. 948. See, also, Smith v. R. R., 68 N. C. 107; Williams v. Telephone Co., 116 N. C. 558, 21 S. E. 298; Rumbough v. Improvement Co., 112 N. C. 751, 17 S. E. 536, 34 Am. St. Rep. 528; Egerton v. R. R., 115 N. C. 645, 20 S. E. 184.

The evidence admitted, after objection by defendant, as to the shifting engine's not ringing their bells while running at Selma, was clearly incompetent and irrelevant and prejudicial. That did not even tend to prove that the engineer on the train in question did not ring his bell or blow the whistle. Similar evidence was held to be incompetent in Ice Co. v. R. R., 126 N. C. 797, 36 S. E. 279. This was manifest error. The court in that case (Ice Co. v. R. R., supra), as appears from the headnote, said:

The evidence did not "throw any light on the question directly before the jury, and was calculated to divert and mislead the minds of the jury to an unsafe verdict," citing Grant v. R. R., 108 N. C. 462, at 470, 18 S. E. 200; Henderson v. R. R., 144 Pa. 461, 22 Atl. 851, 16 L. R. A. 299, 27 Am. St. Rep. 652.

There are other assignments of error which need not now be noticed.

The dominant and overshadowing error in the case is the refusal of the learned judge to nonsuit the plaintiff upon the evidence and at its close. The train was late, and naturally running at a high speed to make up for lost time. Plaintiff was injured about 11 o'clock, on January 27, 1919, while he was returning from Pine Level. He knew that a train was "due to pass there not until 11 o'clock," so that he should have known, according to his own testimony, that he was crossing the track at a dangerous time. He testified: "As I came up on the track the engine was there." And again:

"As I came up, it looked like a death trap, and the engine was right over me. When I got upon the track they hit me."

These excerpts are sufficient to show that he drove into the train and that he knew how dangerous his act was, as he called it a "death trap." There could not have been a more threatening situation and one that should have warned a man with the least sense of prudence to desist, rather than risk his life by his daring act. A few moments loss of time was nothing as compared with the chances he was taking. It was nothing short of recklessness upon his own version of the facts. The more careless the plaintiff proves the engineer to have been, the more and more reckless was he. There was evidence that the bell was rung, for the witness R. P. Oliver testified that he could hear it distinctly, and that he could see the train, and he was in no way connected with the plaintiff or the railroad company, but was an indifferent and impartial witness. There was other evidence of the fact. The witness L. M. Batton testified that he was at Selma that morning and heard the train coming and heard it blow, the crossing or the station blow, but thought it was the crossing blow, being unusually loud, which attracted his attention. J. T. Adams heard the train and also heard the whistle blow, and saw Kimbrough pass at the rate of 15 or 20 miles an hour. I. B. Early testified that he saw the train and Kimbrough could have seen it if he had looked. The conductor stated that the train consisted of 12 cars, and it was running 15 miles an hour, and that it made a good stop. There was much other testimony to the same general effect. The fireman testified that he rang the bell for the road crossing where plaintiff was hit by the train, and had rung the bell from the railroad crossing to the road crossing. The conductor on this train stated that he blew the station and crossing signals, and that plaintiff's car just darted out. He described minutely the different blasts of the whistle for station and crossings. He and the automobile were running at the same speed and came together on the crossing. He took every precaution at those places to prevent any accident, and that he did everything in this instance that could be done to avoid an accident. He used the distress signal and applied the emergency brakes, which were the Westinghouse, usual and approved type, and in good order. So that there was strong evidence for the defense that no precaution against accident was omitted by the engineer and fireman. The evidence was not all one way.

But omitting the defendant's testimony, if the plaintiff had used the care not only of an ordinarily prudent man, but of a man of the slightest prudence, the accident could not, and would not, have occurred.

In Railroad Co. v. Houston, 95 U. S. 697, 24 L. Ed. 542, the court held that negligence of the railroad company was no excuse for negligence on the part of a traveler crossing its track, and that he must take the consequences when he carelessly walks or drives into a place of "possible" danger. He must use his sense of hearing and sight, and all other available precautions. If he goes upon the track, instead of waiting for an expected train to pass, he is guilty of culpable negligence and so far contributes to his injury as to deprive him of the right to complain of others, and the consequences of his reckless mistake and temerity cannot be cast upon the company. "No railroad company can be held for a failure of experiments of that kind. If one chooses, in such a position, to take risks, he must bear the possible consequences of failure. Upon the facts disclosed by the undisputed evidence in the case we cannot see any ground for a recovery by the plaintiff. Not even a plausible pretext for the verdict can be suggested, unless we wander from the evidence into the region of conjecture and speculation. Under these circumstances, the court would not have erred had it instructed the jury, as requested, to render a verdict for the defendant." It has been well and truly said that a traveler about to use the tracks of a railroad must take no chances. "Which of the tracks would or should be used for its various trains was, of course, a matter for the exclusive determination of the railroad company." It was held in Rich v. R. R., 31 Ind. App. 10, 86 N. E. 1028, that a traveler using a railroad track has no right to confine his precautions to his knowledge of the schedule and customs of the company, but must take due care against the approach of "extra trains" and even "wild trains," those which are expected as well as those not expected to use the track. He must look out for all trains, and any other rule, it was said, would measure his conduct by the altogether too liberal rule of chances and risks, and would impose upon the railroad company too rigorous and burdensome responsibilities, regardless of the inconvenience to the public arising from operating its trains under any such handicap. Abernathy v. R. R., 164 N. C. 91-95, 80 S. E. 421, and cases; Ward v. R. R., 167 N. C. 148, 83 S. E. 326, L. R. A. 1918F, 451; Treadwell v. R. R., 169 N. C. 694, 86 S. E. 617.

No one can predict when a train will pass any given point. The tracks are in constant use and must needs be, not merely for any private use of the railroad but to serve the public, who have the right to prompt service. The railroad company cannot itself know at what times it may have to use its tracks, and therefore must be free to use them at all times. If they are tardy in the performance of their public duties, or delay performance, their patrons are swift to demand compensation if loss ensues. They are hedged in on all sides by these conflicting interests, and must serve as best they may an exacting public. They should be held to the strict discharge of these duties, it is very true, but to enable them to comply with the public demands, they must, and should, have the free and unrestricted use of their tracks, so far as is consistent with a proper regard for the rights of others, when carefully exercised, but not when done so carelessly and even recklessly as here in this case. One train was due at 11 o'clock a. m.; the accident occurred at 11:05 or 11:10, as testified. Another train, the one into which the plaintiff actually ran his car, was overdue several hours, and perhaps unavoidably so. The plaintiff knew these facts, for he stated that one of these trains was not due until 11 o'clock. There was no urgency which required him to cross at the very time that he did. If he had waited but two or three minutes, he would have crossed in safety and unscathed, but instead he risked his life to save a little time, which, so far as appears at least, was comparatively valueless. He did not leave his car and look toward Selma for the train. He could have seen far enough in that direction to have done so and returned to his car and driven across the track, out of any danger, before any train could possibly have reached him, and if he had done so, he would have seen the train coming and averted the disaster. But he was lacking in every essential of care and precaution, and suffered the terrible consequences of his gross negligence. Any man of the least degree of prudence would have taken better care of himself.

I do not agree that the case, as now presented, is the same as the one on the first appeal, but "materially" different. I had grave doubt when I wrote the opinion in the first appeal as to whether the plaintiff should not have been nonsuited at that time, but preferred to give him the benefit of the doubt and allow the facts to be more fully developed at the new trial. Instead of improving his case, I think the plaintiff has made it worse for himself by the added facts and the new version of those in the record before.

My conclusion is that he should fail in his suit, because of his plain and palpable negligence, which, as matter of law, proximately caused the injury. It may be said that, at the least, the negligence of both the railroad company and himself were concurrent, which also would bar his recovery.

"Where * * * the negligence of both [plaintiff and defendant] concur and continue to the time of the injury, the negligence of the defendant is not in the legal sense the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury." Hamilton v. Lumber Co., 160 N. C. 47, 75 S. E. 1087.

It was held in Neal, Adm'r. v. Railroad, 126 N. C. marg. p. 634 (Anno. Ed.); 36 S. E. 117, 49 L. R. A. 684:

"Where the evidence on the part of the plaintiff (the defendant having introduced none) is demurred to, and, if true, establishes negligence on the part of the plaintiff, and of the defendant, concurrent to the last moment, a judgment as of nonsuit, sustaining the demurrer, is proper."

I dissented in Perry v. Railroad, 180 N. C. 290, 104 S. E. 673, which had several features in common with this case, and they are so much alike that what I said in my dissenting opinion there (concurring in by Justice Brown) is applicable here, though this is a much stronger case against this plaintiff than were the facts there against Perry and his companions. I now strongly affirm what I then said, and also adopt what was written by Justice Brown in the first appeal of this case as my own view, though I think the case, as now presented, much stronger than it was when he so ably discussed the questions which were then involved. I refer to both opinions for further argument, without repeating what is there said. I also refer to Coleman v. R. R., 153 N. C. 322, 69 S. E. 251, where Justice Brown gave the opinion of this court, which was unanimous and which so clearly states the principle governing here as to the duty of the plaintiff under the menacing circumstances.

If the plaintiff had acted as any prudent man would have done, and not have rushed, or rather jumped with his car, under a quick driving low pressure upon the crossing, he would have passed over it without the least difficulty and in perfect safety, and, as I have said, he would have reached the other side unscathed. It was his rashness that brought the trouble upon him, which naturally followed his act. The fault was all his own, and he should bear the loss of which he was the guilty author, and proximately so.

This opinion, it will be observed, is mostly predicated on the assumption of defendant's negligence primarily, this concession being made for the sake of argument, and the negligence which bars plaintiff's recovery is held to be his own, first, as contributing proximately to his injury, and, second, if not, then as so concurring with that of defendant as to operate as a bar to his alleged right. The care of plaintiff must have been exercised, according to our authorities, before he had taken a position exposing him to peril or before he has entered into the zone of danger. Coleman v. R. R., 153 N. C. 322, 69 S. E. 251. A traveler is not permitted to drive blindly upon a railroad track and impute any resultant injury he receives to the railroad company, when he is the principal cause of his own misfortune. It was held in Coleman v. R. R., supra:

"A railroad crossing is itself a notice of danger, and all persons approaching it are bound to exercise care and prudence; and when the conditions are such that a diligent use of the senses would have avoided the injury, a failure to use them constitutes contributory negligence. * * * By stopping, looking, and listening before reaching a railroad right of way at a public crossing, and at a place where the view is obstructed by houses, the plaintiff has not performed his duty, or exercised the care required before crossing the track; and it appearing that the right of way extended some 65 feet from the track, with an unobstructed view, and that by stopping thereon before reaching the track the plaintiff could have seen, or have become aware of, the approaching train in time to have avoided the injury complained of, in failing to do so he is guilty of contributory negligence, the proximate cause of the injury, and his action is barred thereby."

If the plaintiff had stopped and gone near to the track, he would have had an unobstructed view of the approaching train, and would have avoided the injury.

My conclusion is that the action should have been dismissed.

et al. (No. 285.)(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 26, 1921.)1. Master and servant \S 137(4)—Negligence to run train without signals and contrary to rules.

It was negligence, as to a railroad employee engaged on track, for train crew without warning to run in on a main line of the company's track where persons were likely to be at the time, and in violation of a rule that no train should run into a station yard between the station and a train engaged at the time in taking on and discharging passengers.

2. Master and servant \S 289(26) — Brake-man's contributory negligence in crossing track held for jury.

In an action by a brakeman on a freight train for injuries received while crossing main track from warehouse in the line of his duty and under the immediate orders of the conductor, whether plaintiff whose view was obstructed was guilty of contributory negligence in failing to observe train coming into yard without warning held for the jury.

3. Railroads \S 5½, New, vol. 6A Key-No. Se-

Employee of a railroad injured by negligence of a train crew while the road was under federal control cannot proceed and obtain a judgment against the railroad, but must proceed against the Director General of Railroads, particularly in view of General Order No. 50.

4. Appeal and error \S 1173(1).—Joint judgreversed as to railroad.

Where employee of railroad under federal control injured through negligence of train crew sued both the railroad and the Director General of Railroads and obtained a joint judgment against both of them, the judgment could be reversed as to the railroad and affirmed as to the Director General without nullifying the whole judgment, in view of C. S. § 602, subsecs. 1 and 3, and section 1412.

5. Judgment \S 237(1)—When several judgment may be rendered against one of several

Under C. 6. Appeal and error \S 900 — Presumption against error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Cumberland County; Daniels, Judge.

Action by Gaston Wyne against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company and W. D. Hines, Director General of Railroads. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed as to the railroad, and affirmed as to the Director General.

The action is to recover damages for personal injuries, caused by alleged negligence of defendants, while plaintiff was engaged at his work as brakeman on a freight train on road of defendant company and while same was being operated by the government of United States under the supervision and control of W. D. Hines, Director General. A motion to dismiss the action as to the railroad corporation was overruled, and defendant company excepted. There was denial of liability and plea of contributory negligence by defendant, and on evidence offered the jury rendered the following verdict:

(1) At the time the cause of action alleged in the complaint arose, was the possession, operation, and control of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company exercised by the Director General of Railroads under the proclamation of the President of the United States? Answer: Yes.

(2) Was plaintiff injured by the negligence of the agents, servants, or employees of federal administration, acting through the Director General of Railroads? Answer: Yes.

(3) Was plaintiff injured by the negligence of the defendant Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company? Answer: Yes.

(4) Did the plaintiff by his own negligence contribute to his injury? Answer: No.

(5) What damage, if any, is plaintiff entitled to recover? Answer: $8,000.

Judgment on verdict for plaintiff, and defendants appealed, assigning error.

Rose & Rose, of Fayetteville, for appellants.

Sinclair & Dye, of Fayetteville, for appellees.

HOKE, J. The facts in evidence tended to show that on June 15, 1918, plaintiff was employed and working as a brakeman on a freight train on defendant road, and while engaged in carrying freight from his train, then on the ground at Kenley, N. C., to the station warehouse of the defendant road, was run over by a passenger train on the road going south and received painful and protracted physical injuries "to his great damage," etc. That at the time and place of his injury the freight train on which plaintiff was working was on a pass track of defendant company. Lying to the east and between that and the company station and freight depot on the west there were two main line tracks, and a station or warehouse track lying next to the buildings. That the passenger train going north was at the time on the yard on the main line track lying next to the freight train, and there was evidence permitting the inference that the train was then engaged in receiving and discharging passengers, that on the warehouse track and to the north there were freight cars standing and which to a great extent obstructed the view in that direction. That when plaintiff had placed a load of freight on the platform of the warehouse and under the direction of his conductor was going back across the track to couple up his train, the passenger train of defendant going south came on the yard and struck plaintiff, knocking him down and dragging him some distance, causing the injuries complained of. That the train came without signal or warning of any kind and was in violation of a special rule of the defendant put in evidence, to the effect:

"That trains must use caution in passing a train receiving or discharging passengers at a station and must not pass between it and the platform at which passengers are being received or discharged."

It was further shown that in crossing the track plaintiff passed just in front of No. 80, the passenger train going north, and that the noise of the train was such as to prevent or very much interfere with hearing the approach of the incoming train. It is stated also as an admission of record that the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad at the time was being operated by the federal administration.

[1, 2] On this a sufficient statement to a proper apprehension of the question presented, the motion of nonsuit, in our opinion, was properly overruled; it appearing that a south-bound train without any warning ran in on a main line of the company's track where divers persons were not unlikely to be at the time, and this, too, in violation of a rule of the company:

"That no train should run into a station yard between the station and a train engaged at the time in receiving or discharging passengers."

Both were breaches of a duty very likely to result in harm and leading directly to the plaintiff's injury. And as to the conduct of the plaintiff usually considered on the issues as to contributory negligence in Sherill v. Railroad, 140 N. C. 252, 52 S. E. 940, it was held that while one who enters on a railroad track is required to look and listen for trains that may be approaching when negligence of the defendant has been established the facts and attendant circumstances may so qualify the obligation as to require that the question of contributory negligence should be left to the jury, a position that is particularly insistent when one is upon the railroad track in the line of his duty and in this instance acting under the immediate direction of his conductor. The position so stated has been again and again approved in our decisions. Lutterloh v. Railroad, 172 N.

C. 118, 90 S. E. 8; Penninger v. Railroad, 170 N. C. 475, 87 S. E. 249; Johnson v. Railroad, 163 N. C. 431, 79 S. E. 690, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 598; Fann v. Railroad, 155 N. C. 136, 71 S. E. 81; Inman v. Railroad, 149 N. C. 126, 62 S. E. 878; Wolfe v. Railroad, 154 N. C. 569, 70 S. E. 993. Under these authorities and the principle they uphold and illustrate, it is clear, we think, that the question of contributory negligence should be referred to the jury; it appearing that plaintiff in the line of his duty and acting at this time under the immediate orders of the conductor was endeavoring to cross the track, that his view as he approached was shut off to a great extent by box cars standing on the warehouse track, that the incoming train ran into the yard without signal or warning of any kind, and the noise of the passenger train on the other track was such as to prevent taking note of the incoming train. A full discussion of the question citing most of the authorities on the subject in our own court to the time were approved in Fann's Case, supra, and the decisions in Wolfe v. Railroad, and Inman v. Railroad, are especially pertinent to the facts appearing in the present record. Even if contributory negligence should have been made to appear both under federal and state law, it would not avail defendant on motion for nonsuit—the only exception urged before us on the general question of liability.

[3-5] It has been held, in several of our cases construing the federal statutes under which the government had taken over this and other roads, that both the Director General and the railroad corporation are liable for an injury under the circumstances presented in the record, and his honor below, in accord with these cases, very properly entered judgment against both defendants. Since this case was tried, the Supreme Court of the United States, the final authority on the interpretation of federal law, has held that under the federal statutes applicable and the various orders of those in control of the roads thereunder, particularly General Order No. 50, judgment could not be properly had against the corporation. Missouri Pacific Railroad Company v. Ault, 256 U. S. —, 41 Sup. Ct. 593, 65 L. Ed. —. In deference to this authoritative ruling, we must direct that the judgment against the Atlantic Coast Line be set aside; but we do not approve the position further insisted on that, for this reason, the entire judgment must be nullified. We were referred to several of the older decisions of our court to the effect that—

"A judgment is to be regarded as an entirety and that it cannot be affirmed as to one or more defendants and reversed as to the others," citing Davis v. Campbell, 23 N. C. 482.

But if that and other like decisions could be considered as applicable to the facts of the record under the former law, they do not prevail under our present system of procedure, wherein the same court administers principles of both law and equity, and further there is express statutory provision that—

A "judgment may be given for or against one or more of several plaintiffs, and for or against one or more of several defendants; and it may determine the ultimate rights of the parties on each side, as between themselves," and "in an action against several defendants, the court may, in its discretion, enter judgment against one or more of them, leaving the action to proceed against the others, whenever a several judgment is proper." C. S. § 602, subsecs. 1 and 3.

"In every case the court may render such sentence, judgment and decree as on inspection of the whole record it shall appear to them ought in law to be rendered thereon."

There is therefore no objection as a conclusion of law to the entry of a several judgment against one of the defendants while the other has been relieved, unless it appears that the liability of the codefendants are mutually dependent the one upon the other or that the rights of the defendant who is held has been in some way prejudiced by the presence of the other in the trial of the cause. There is, however, a presumption against error, and not only does it not appear that the rights of the Director General have been prejudiced by the presence of the corporation, but a perusal of the record will disclose that on the facts in evidence the question of liability was determined by the jury on a separate issue and entirely as between plaintiff and the Director General in the present control and management of the road, and the liability of the corporation also on a separate issue was ruled by the court as a conclusion of law from the verdict against the Director General. The trial as to him, therefore, could in no way have been prejudiced by the presence of the corporation; nor is there any reason in law or fact why, under our present system, a several judgment may not be upheld. The admission of the rule as to the approaching of an incoming train alleged to have been violated was not objected to, nor does it appear as an assignment of error, and is evidently a rule under which the road is being presently operated. In this aspect of the matter the request of the plaintiff to a several judgment is fully upheld in Kimbrough v. Hines Director General, 109 S. E. 11, a case decided at the present term.

For the reasons stated, the judgment against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad will be set aside and action dismissed, and the judgment against the Director General is affirmed.

Modified and affirmed.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 26, 1921.)

1. Negligence §136(10)—Conflicting evidence for jury.

In a negligence case, court is not warranted in granting a motion for nonsuit simply because plaintiff's witnesses apparently contradict each other in their testimony; such conflict being a matter for the jury.

2. Railroads §5½, New, vol. 6A Key-No. Series—Federal control prevents suit against company.

Where a servant of a railroad under federal control is injured through negligence, he may not maintain an action against the railroad company, but must proceed against the Director General of Railroads.

3. Appeal and error §1173(1)—Joint judgment against railroad and Director General reversed as to railroad and affirmed as to Director General.

Where injured railroad servant obtained joint judgment against railroad and Director General of Railroads, when under the federal law he could not maintain an action against the railroad for his injuries, on appeal a judgment against the railroad will be reversed and action dismissed as to it, but, with the consent of the plaintiff, the judgment will be affirmed as against the Director General.

Appeal from Superior Court, Cumberland County; Daniels, Judge.

Action by W. H. Franck against Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads, and the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed as to the railroad, and affirmed as to the Director General.

Civil action to recover damages for an alleged negligent injury to plaintiff while a passenger on defendants' "shuttle train," which was a mixed train composed of an engine and several cars and used in carrying workmen from the city of Fayetteville, N. C., to Camp Bragg and back, a distance of several miles.

There was evidence tending to show that on May 9, 1919, the plaintiff boarded the train in the city of Fayetteville while it was down near the water tank, some distance from the Norfolk-Southern station; that the coaches and platforms were at that time crowded with passengers; and that the plaintiff was standing on the step of the car, holding to the grabirons, when he was struck by a switch target as the train started with a sudden jerk. It was permissible for passengers to get on the train at the coal chute, the ice plant, the water tank, and they "would stop first at one place and then another," and, wherever they stopped, "people would crowd on the cars." There was also evidence tending to show that the switch target was only 6½ feet from the center of the track.

On the other hand, there was evidence, elicited on cross-examination, tending to show that plaintiff undertook to get on the train while it was in motion and was struck by the switch stand in his effort to board the moving cars.

Upon the issues of negligence, contributory negligence, and damages being answered in favor of the plaintiff, and from a judgment rendered thereon, the defendants appealed.

Rose & Rose, of Fayetteville, for appellants.

Averitt & Blackwell and Bullard & Stringfield, all of Fayetteville, for appellee.

STACY, J. [1] Defendants rely chiefly upon their motion for judgment as of nonsuit, and they contend that the case at bar falls squarely under the decision of this court in Gilliam v. R. R., 179 N. C. 508, 103 S. E. 10, where we had occasion to consider another accident which occurred on this same "shuttle train." But we think the present facts are somewhat different and sufficient to sustain the verdict of the jury. It is true the plaintiff's own witnesses apparently contradicted each other in their testimony, but this would not warrant the court in granting the defendants' motion for nonsuit. Where the evidence is conflicting, with respect to a material matter, it must be submitted to the jury. Shell v. Roseman, 155 N. C. 90, 71 S. E. 86; Ward v. Mfg. Co., 123 N. C. 252, 31 S. E. 495.

[2, 3] This action was instituted against Walker D. Hines, Director General, and the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. The judgment is against both of the defendants. Since this case was tried, the United States Supreme Court, in R. R. v. Ault, 256 U. S. —, 41 Sup. Ct. 593, 65 L. Ed. — (opinion filed July 1, 1921), has held that in such actions arising under federal control, the same may not be maintained against the railroad company. Hence the judgment against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company will be reversed and the action dismissed as to said company. The plaintiff consenting to this modification, the judgment against the Director General will be upheld under authority of Kimbrough v. Hines, 109 S. E. 11, at the present term, where the reasons for this position are fully stated in an opinion by Clark, C. J., and therefore we will not repeat them here. See, also, Wyne v. Director General, 109 S. E. 19, at this term.

In the trial and judgment on the verdict against the Director General, we find:

SMITH v. SEABOARD AIR LINE RY. CO.
(No. 253.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 26, 1921.)

1. Master and servant ⇨264(4) — Proof restricted to negligence alleged.

In an action by a railroad employee under the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665) to recover for personal injuries, where he alleged several acts of negligence in respect to condition of water tank exploding, he was restricted to those specified.

2. Trial ⇨253(1) — Court instructing on branch of case must not omit matter.

Where judge is attempting to state the law on a particular branch of a case, he must state it correctly, and must not omit part of it, for any material omission is an affirmative error.

3. Master and servant ⇨125(2)—Knowledge of defect essential to liability under federal act.

A defect in a water tank was not sufficient of itself to charge a railroad with liability for negligence under the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665), unless the defect was either known to it or had existed so long that the law will impute such knowledge when the defect could have been discovered by a reasonable inspection which should be made by the master at proper intervals to secure safety in its use by the servants.

4. Master and servant ⇨101, 102(2)—Not absolute duty under federal act to furnish safe place.

It is not the absolute duty of a master under the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665) to furnish even a reasonably safe place for the servant to do his work, but only to use ordinary care to provide for him such place.

5. Railroads ⇨5½, New, vol. 6A Key-No. Series—Federal control prevents suit against company.

An employee of a railroad under federal control injured through negligence cannot maintain an action against the railroad, but must proceed against the Director General of Railroads; and where he has started an action against both jointly and has obtained a joint judgment against them, which is reversed for error, and dismissed as to the railroad, he may continue to prosecute the action as to the Director General, in view of C. S. § 602.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Connor, Judge.

Action by Oscar Y. Smith against the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. New trial.

Plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained at Sanford, N. C., July 18, 1919, by being thrown from a standpipe while putting water in the tank of an engine.

Plaintiff testified that he was fireman on one of the engines being operated on the Seaboard Air Line Railway while under federal control, and that it became necessary for the engine to take water at Sanford; that the engine was properly placed, and he pulled the standpipe to the tender and around to the manhole and leaned against the standpipe to hold it down, and, as he pulled the lever to release the water, the standpipe exploded and threw him backwards. In explaining his position when leaning against the standpipe, plaintiff testified that he assumed a sitting posture. Plaintiff also testified that he had used this standpipe before the time of his injury; that he would pull the lever about halfway over and the water would come with a rush. The lever referred to was on top of the spout of the standpipe and was used to regulate the flow of water through the pipe and into the tank of the engine.

It will perhaps be better, or at least more accurate, to state the substance of the testimony for plaintiff substantially in his own language, or rather in that of his counsel as it is set forth in their brief, which we now do:

The plaintiff testified: That, at the time of his injury, he was temporarily performing the duties of a railroad fireman; that he was a locomotive engineer by trade and was employed on the Seaboard Air Line Railway on the 18th of July, 1919.

The plaintiff testified in part as follows:

The engineer ran up to the standpipe. He told me to take water on the tender, and I went to take water. He stopped the engine right even with the standpipe. I pulled the standpipe to the tender and around to the manhole and leaned against it to hold it down, and as I pulled the lever to release the water the standpipe exploded and threw me backwards. The standpipe that I was leaning against exploded. * * * Before the 18th of July, I took water the same way I was taking it when I got hurt. There was nothing unusual before this time. * * * I had seen different firemen take water at the same pipe, all the time. * * * I was taking water on this day the same as they were. I was taking it in the same manner as I had authority to take it. I was working the lever with my left hand. The lever works the valves that let the water flow in the standpipe. * * * And I pulled it out to get water. * * * As you pull it toward you it opens the valve and the water comes in. * * * There was no place on the side of the spout that you could put your foot on and hold the spout down in the tank. I was not aware of the fact that there was more pressure there than at any other standpipe. * * * I pulled the lever up halfway, and still holding it down I took a seat on the side and pulled the lever over, and that is when it exploded. That is the position I had always assumed. I mean by the explosion that the pipe burst and there was compressed air and water and it all came out at the same time. It was not solid force of water. There was a gush of air. The air and water came out at the same time. Q. What kind of noise was it making? A. A blow and a sudden jerk. The blow was very strong and powerful. I had never heard anything like that at a standpipe before. It all happened at the same time. I do not know how high the standpipe was thrown by the explosion. The last I remember it was going up and I was going with it. Q. You stated, Mr. Smith, on cross-examination, that some time before that in resting on it you had felt it go down and come up; explain to the jury what it was doing? A. There was no force as there was that day. I don't suppose it ever raised four or five inches. I was leaning there on it and pushed it down. I could not have done it on the day of the explosion.

The defendant's witness J. L. Kelly testified, in part:

Something broke loose. I don't know what it was. It pitched him 15 feet high. * * * A whole lot of stuff went up there with him. It exploded and he went up in the air. I did not see anything but a little water come out of that explosion. No, that little water would not have exploded with the tank that way. No, I did not hear the water running in the tank before that. I saw the piece break just as it was pulled down. I don't know whether he had hold of the lever at that time or not.

The defendant's witness Yow testified, in part:

I guess this standpipe exploded as soon as he pulled the lever. Yes, it suddenly exploded. * * * It was about as quick as lighting. He had not more than got it down when he reached up and got the lever. Just as he pulled it, it exploded. I was struck with the water. This whole arm was up straight. The explosion took place as soon as this man pulled the lever down. From where they picked him up I should say he went 20 feet into the air. * * * I think he was thrown 50 feet.

The defendant's witness Gold testified, in part: That the column was 12 inches thick; that the ball was made of brass and was an inch thick. The ball was crushed and drawn in. * * * Mr. Owens, the pump repairer, was working on the same main that supplied this standpipe the day of Mr. Smith's injury. * * * Mr. Owens had the immediate supervision and upkeep of this standpipe.

Defendants offered the testimony of two eyewitnesses of the accident, neither of whom was connected in any way with the defendants, and they both testified that plaintiff straddled the spout of the standpipe and attempted to operate the lever while in that position. M. H. Gold, witness for defendants, testified that at the time of this accident he was division engineer in charge of the standpipe; that he went to Sanford on the day this accident occurred and after the accident; that he had been there two days before and the standpipe was in very good condition; that there were two grabirons on the spout by which you could pull it around, and there was sufficient room on the grab-iron for a fireman to place his foot and hold the spout in position; that a fireman could stand on the tender and place his foot on the grabiron and hold the pipe in place; that by pulling the lever on top of the spout you could control the opening of the valve in the pipe so as to control the flow of water; that by pulling it gradually the water would flow gradually; that if the lever was pulled up suddenly that would throw the entire pressure on the standpipe and that would have a tendency to straighten the pipe out at the end. This witness also testified that he examined the standpipe after the accident and that there were no weak places in it.

D. T. Owens, witness for plaintiff, testified that he was pump repairer and on the North Carolina division of the railroad; that he remembers this identical standpipe; that he gave Mr. Gold notice of the condition of the standpipe before the accident; that every time he talked to Mr. Gold he spoke to him about the standpipe; that he told him he did not like it because it would give him trouble; that they were too weak for the pressure. The witness further testified that the trouble with the standpipe was that it was leaking. He said that he worked the lever on this standpipe and that by working it slowly it would let the water in gradually, and if you pulled the lever suddenly that would cause the water to rush up suddenly. This witness further testified that the standpipe was all right before plaintiff was injured; that it was in good working order and there was nothing about it that was broken; that he inspected it on the fourth of the month before the accident and put it in good condition; that after the accident he could find no defect except such as was caused by the spout flying up; that the tank is 70 feet high at Sanford.

At the conclusion of the evidence plaintiff admitted that he was employed in interstate commerce at the time of his injury, and, over defendants' objection, was permitted to amend his complaint so as to allege that defendants were engaged in interstate commerce, and that he was employed in such commerce.

The judge charged the jury, among other things, as follows:

"I instruct you that if you find by the greater weight of the evidence in this case that this plaintiff in the performance of his duty, after the engine had been placed opposite the water tank, took down the spout and placed the mouth of it in the tender in order that the water might flow, and further find that the usual and customary way was to pull the lever, and then find, gentlemen of the jury, that the plaintiff leaned his weight upon the spout in order to hold it in position, and you further find that when the water did come that it came in such a rush and force as to throw the young man in the air, and further find that the violence with which the water came was due to some defect in the apparatus, or was due to carelessness on the part of the defendant, and if you find that such negligence was the direct and proximate cause of the injury, you will answer both of the two issues, 'Yes.'"

The jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff on all the issues and fixed the damages at $40,000.

Judgment thereon, and defendant appealed, assigning errors.

Murray Allen, of Raleigh, for appellant.
Armistead Jones & Son and Douglass & Douglass, all of Raleigh, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The plaintiff alleged several acts of negligence in respect to the condition of the water tank at the time of the accident, and, of course, he is restricted to those specified. If he desired to show others, the proper way was to ask the court for an amendment, giving the defendants reasonable opportunity to amend their answer and prepare to meet the new phase of the case. Being thus confined to his own statement of the particular acts of negligence, it was error for the court to instruct the jury as appears in the above excerpt from the charge.

[2, 3] But there is a still more fatal defect in this instruction. The judge was attempting to state the law on this branch of the case, and there is nothing better settled than the rule that he must state it correctly, for any material omission is an affirmative error. A defect in apparatus is not sufficient, of itself, to charge the defendant with liability for negligence, unless the defect was either known to it or had existed so long that the law will impute such knowledge, when the defect could have been discovered by a reasonable inspection of the machinery and implements, which should be made by the master at proper intervals to secure safety in their use by his servants. This element of liability was entirely omitted from this instruction and not even a reference made to it. The cases have thoroughly established this principle in the law of negligence. The following cases will show that this is so: Hudson v. R. R., 104 N. C. 491, 10 S. E. 669; Railway v. Barrett, 166 U. S. 617, 17 Sup. Ct. 707, 41 L. Ed. 1136; Patton v. Railway, 179 U. S. 658, 21 Sup. Ct. 275, 45 L. Ed. 361; Railroad v. McDade, 135 U. S. 554, 10 Sup. Ct. 1044, 34 L. Ed. 235; Blevins v. Cotton Mills, 150 N. C. 493, 64 S. E. 428; Labatt on Master and Servant, § 119 et seq. And to these cases we add a recent one (which was carried from this court by writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States) in which this same doctrine is discussed, and formulated according to the view of it as above stated. S. A. L. Rwy. Co. v. Horton, 233 U. S. 492, 34 Sup. Ct. 635, 58 L. Ed. p. 1062, L. R. A. 1915C, 1, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 475, and especially the same case on second appeal, 239 U. S. 595, 36 Sup. Ct. 180, 60 L. Ed.

p. 458, where a water gauge was alleged to be defective and exploded. In the Hudson Case, 104 N. C. 491, 10 S. E. 669, we held that—

"The burden is upon the servant who sues his master for damages, resulting from the use of defective machinery furnished by the latter, to establish prima facie (1) that the machinery was defective; (2) that the defects were the proximate cause of the injuries; and (3) that the master had knowledge of them, or might, by the proper exercise of care and diligence, have acquired such knowledge."

Now, in this case, when the testimony is closely and carefully examined, it will be found that it is both ways as to this point. There is perhaps some evidence from which the jury might fairly and reasonably infer that, if the tank or the pipe leading to it was defective, or that there was air in the latter which should have been expelled before using it, the defendant either knew it or should have known it by the exercise of ordinary care, and there also is testimony to the contrary, and some tending to show that the tank was put in good condition by repairs to it, before the accident and was in such condition just before the explosion took place. In view of this conflict of testimony, the case should have been submitted to the jury with proper instructions as to the law. A carrier is not liable for every accident that may occur and injure one of its employees, but, by the very terms of the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665) only for those "due to its negligence." Federal Employers' Liability Act by Richie (2d Ed.) p. 122, § 53, and cases in notes. Extended comment is not required to further demonstrate the correctness of this rule as to the duties of the master to his servant, with respect to machinery and implements furnished to him by the latter, nor the citation of other authorities, though there are very many decisions of this and other state courts, and of the highest federal courts, that might be added to those we have cited above. We will, though, refer especially to Texas & Pac. R. R. Co. v. Barrett, 166 U. S. 617, 17 Sup. Ct. 707, 41 L. Ed. 1136, in this connection.

[4] There is also another exception to which we should advert, as it may be repeated unless attention is directed to it. The court instructed the jury:

"That, under the law, it was the duty of the defendant to furnish to the plaintiff, while in its employment, a safe place to do his work and reasonably safe implements with which to do the work required of him."

His honor corrected this charge afterwards by instructing the jury that he should have told them that the defendant was required to furnish only "a reasonably safe place for the servant to do his work," but left it otherwise intact. It is not the absolute duty of the master to furnish even a reasonably safe place for the servant to do his work, but the true and correct rule is that he must use ordinary care to provide for him such a place. Choctaw, O. & G. R. Co. v. McDade, 191 U. S. at page 64, 24 Sup. Ct. 24, 48 L. Ed. 96; Garner v. R. R., 150 U. S. at page 359, 14 Sup. Ct. 140, 37 L. Ed. 1107; Washington & G. R. Co. v. McDade, 135 U. S. at page 570, 10 Sup. Ct. 1044, 34 L. Ed. 235; B. & O. Railroad v. Baugh, 149 U. S. 368, 13 Sup. Ct. 914, 37 L. Ed. 772. See, also, Powell v. Anderson S. & T. P. Co., 216 Pa. 618, 65 Atl. 1113, and Kyner v. Gold Mining Co., 184 Fed. 43, 106 C. C. A. 245. Justice Brewer said in Patton v. Texas & Pac. R. Co., 179 U. S. 658, 21 Sup. Ct. 275, 45 L. Ed. 361:

"It is also true that there is no guaranty by the employer that place and machinery shall be absolutely safe. Hough v. Texas & P. R. Co., 100 U. S. 213, 218, 25 L. Ed. 612, 615; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Baugh, 149 U. S. 368, 386, 37 L. Ed. 772, 780, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 914; Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Mackey, 137 U. S. 72, 87, 39 L. Ed. 624, 630, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 491; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Archibald, 170 U. S. 665, 669, 42 L. Ed. 1188, 1190, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 777. He is bound to take reasonable care and make reasonable effort; and the greater the risk which attends the work to be done and the machinery to be used, the more imperative is the obligation resting upon him. Reasonable care becomes, then, a demand of higher supremacy; and yet, in all cases it is a question of the reasonableness of the care; reasonableness depending upon the danger attending the place or the machinery."

"The rule in respect to machinery, which is the same as that in respect to place, was * * * accurately stated by Mr. Justice Lamar, for this court, in Washington & G. R. Co. v. McDade, 135 U. S. 554, 570, 34 L. Ed. 235, 241, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1044."

Justice Lamar's statement of the law in this respect in 135 U. S. 554, 10 Sup. Ct. 1044, 34 L. Ed. 235, referred to by Justice Brewer, is a strong and very lucid exposition of the subject; but it is not necessary that we should insert it verbatim here, as it can easily be found in the volume where it is reported, and it is substantially covered by Justice Brewer's own version of the principle, as stated above. It also will be found stated by us in Marks v. Cotton Mills, 135 N. C. 287, 47 S. E. 432, and the same case, 138 N. C. 401, 50 S. E. 769, 3 Ann. Cas. 812, where it was held:

"In all cases involving the question of negligence the standard by which to measure the conduct of the employer and the employee is" that "followed by the ideal prudent man."

What was held in the first of the two cited cases (135 N. C. at page 290, 47 S. E. 432) is directly in point here, that—

"The employer does not guarantee the safety of his employees. He is not bound to furnish them an absolutely safe place to work in, but is required simply to use reasonable care and prudence in providing such a place. He is not bound to furnish the best known machinery, implements and appliances, but only such as are reasonably fit and safe and as are in general use. He meets the requirements of the law if, in the selection of machinery and appliances, he uses that degree of care which a man of ordinary prudence would use, having regard to his own safety, if he were supplying them for his own personal use. It is culpable negligence which makes the employer liable, not a mere error of judgment. We believe this is substantially the rule which has been recognized as the correct one and recommended for our guide in all such cases. It measures accurately the duty of the employer and fixes the limit of his responsibility to his employees. Harley v. B. C. M. Co., 142 N. Y. 31. This court has said that all machinery is to some extent dangerous, but the fact that it is dangerous does not of itself make the owner liable in damages. It is the negligence of the employer in not providing for his employees safe machinery and a reasonably safe place in which to work that renders him liable for any resulting injury to them."

That case was cited and the principle it states approved by the court in Pressly v. Yarn Mills, 138 N. C. at page 413, 51 S. E. 69, and has been cited and approved in numerous subsequent cases.

There are other exceptions worthy of consideration if the result depended, in any way, upon them; but it does not, and we will not prolong this opinion in order to foreclose them.

[5] The action should be dismissed as to the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company, as the Supreme Court of the United States has recently decided that there is no liability as to it. Mo. Pac. R. R. Co. v. Ault (No. 16, July 1, 1921), 256 U. S. —, 41 Sup. Ct. 593, 65 L. Ed. —. The plaintiff may continue, though, to prosecute the action against the Director General, under our present procedure, as will appear from Consol. Statutes, § 602, where it is provided specially that a several judgment may be entered. This is discussed fully in the dissenting opinion of the writer in Kimbrough v. A. C. L. Ry. Co. and Director General (at this term) 109 S. E. 11; the court being unanimous on this point. Reference is made to that opinion to avoid repetition.

There was error, in the respects indicated, because of which another jury must be called.
New trial.

POINDEXTER v. CALL. (No. 356.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 2, 1921.)

1. Landlord and tenant §94(3)—Verbal notice to quit sufficient.

A verbal notice by landlord to tenant to quit is sufficient, Revisal 1908, § 878, applying to a different class of notices.

2. Landlord and tenant §308(1)—Burden on landlord to show tenancy has come to an end.

In a summary proceeding of ejectment by landlord against tenant, the burden to prove that the tenancy has come to an end rests upon the plaintiff.

3. Evidence §91—Burden of proof upon party asserting affirmative issue.

The burden of proof is on the party who substantially asserts the affirmative of an issue, whether he be nominally plaintiff or defendant.

4. Appeal and error §1062(5)—Issue upon which court improperly placed burden of proof on defendant held immaterial and harmless.

In summary proceeding in ejectment by landlord, where court submitted the issues, "Was the tenancy existing between the plaintiff and the defendant from month to month, and if so when did such tenancy expire?" and "Was the tenancy between plaintiff and defendant from year to year; if so when did the same expire?" the second issue was immaterial, and error of the court in placing the burden of proof as to such issue upon the defendant was harmless, the jury having answered "Yes" to the first issue, upon which the court placed the burden of proof upon plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Forsyth County; Webb, Judge.

Action by H. D. Poindexter against C. R. Call. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. No error.

Jones & Clement, of Winston-Salem, for appellant.

Holton & Holton, of Winston-Salem, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This is a summary proceeding in ejectment, brought by the plaintiff, as landlord, against the defendant, as his tenant.

There are only two questions presented for our consideration:

I. Can a tenancy be terminated by a verbal notice to quit?

II. Upon which party rests the burden to prove that the tenancy has come to an end?

[1] First. The notice in this case was oral. The defendant contends that it should have been in writing, and for this he relies on Pell's Revisal, § 878, but that section applies to a different class of notices. In Vincent v. Corbin, 85 N. C. 108-111, it was held that a verbal notice to the tenant by his landlord is sufficient. This disposes of the first exception.

[2] Second. As to this exception, it is necessary to state that the court below submitted two issues to the jury, as follows:

"(1) Was the tenancy existing between the plaintiff and the defendant from month to month, and, if so, when did such tenancy expire?" The jury answered this issue, "Yes; January 1, 1921."

"(2) Was the tenancy between the plaintiff and the defendant from year to year; if so, when did the same expire?" The jury answered this issue "No."

This action to eject the defendant was commenced in February, 1921. The court placed the burden as to the first issue upon the plaintiff, and, as to the second issue, upon the plaintiff. Submitting two issues was unnecessary. The defendant's counsel, Messrs. Jones and Clement, correctly insisted here, in their brief and in their argument, that in no event could the burden of proof be placed upon the defendant Call, for that the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff from the beginning to the end of the trial. There was but one question for the jury to pass upon, and that was, "Had the defendant's term, or lease, expired when this action was commenced?" The burden of the issue could not rest on both plaintiff and defendant. The plaintiff became the actor at the institution of the suit, which placed the burden of proof on him, citing Garris v. Harrington, 167 N. C. 86, 83 S. E. 253; Tillotson v. Fulp, 172 N. C. 499, 90 S. E. 500. This, as we have said, is very true. There was only one issue, and that was the one stated by the learned counsel for the defendant, but that one was submitted by the first of the issues, and the judge properly placed the burden as to it upon the plaintiff.

[3, 4] The contention of the defendant that the tenancy was one from year to year, and required 30 days' notice to end it, was not a separate or distinct defense, but was in the nature of a denial of plaintiff's allegation that it was one from month to month, and was involved in the general issue or traverse of plaintiff's allegation. If plaintiff failed to establish his contention that the tenancy was one from month to month, he failed to do what the law required him to do, and the verdict and judgment should have been against him. Defendant, though, should have stood his ground upon the general issue, simply denying the plaintiff's allegation. The form of the second issue may have placed the burden upon the defendant, as he was required to prove the affirmative of it. The court said in Walker v. Carpenter, 144 N. C. 675, 57 S. E. 461:

"However they may be arrayed on the docket, it is a fundamental rule of evidence that the burden of proof is on the party who substantially asserts the affirmative of the issue, whether he be nominally plaintiff or defendant. * * * The first rule laid down in the books on evidence is to the effect that the issue must be proved by the party who states an affirmative and not by the party who states the negative."

To the same effect is McKeel v. Holloman, 163 N. C. 135, 79 S. E. 445. But we regard the second issue as entirely immaterial and without any proper significance in the case. The jury having found, under the evidence and the charge, that the tenancy was one from month to month, and that it expired on January 1, 1921, the plaintiff was entitled to recover. Having found that the tenancy was from month to month, in response to the first issue, the jury would hardly have found, in response to the second, that it was a tenancy from year to year. They evidently found, and intended to find, for the plaintiff. While there was a formal error in the respect indicated, it was harmless, as the case turned out, and was not, therefore, prejudicial.

It was held in Cotton v. Mfg. Co., 142 N. C. 531, 55 S. E. 358, that instructions to the jury are to be considered with reference to the theory upon which the case is tried, and with reference to the evidence and contentions of the parties. And Chief Justice Ruffin once said that the language of the judge is to be read with reference to the evidence and the point disputed on the trial, and of course is to be construed with the context.

When thus considered, there is no room for doubt that the jury fully understood the real and only issue decided with the plaintiff, and intended their verdict to be for him.

(182 N. C. 328)

STATE v. LEMONS. (No. 349.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 2, 1921.)

1. Intoxicating liquors \S 146(4)—"Sale" includes loan of liquor.

In a prosecution for the unlawful sale of spirituous liquors, it was not error to exclude evidence as to whether the liquor was paid for, since a sale on credit, or a loan of liquor, to be returned, comes within the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Sale.]

2. Intoxicating liquors \S 219—Indictment need not allege sale to particular person.

That the indictment in a prosecution for unlawfully selling spirituous liquors did not allege a sale to any particular person, or to persons to the jurors unknown, was no ground for arrest of judgment, C. S. \S 3383, making it unnecessary to allege a sale to a particular person.

3. Indictment and information \S 87(9)—Indictment need not allege date of unlawful sale of liquor.

That the date of the unlawful sale of spirituous liquor was not set out in the indictment is not material, C. S. \S 4625, providing that no judgment can be stayed for failure to state the time of an offense when time not of its essence.

4. Criminal law §970(8)—Indictment for unlawful sale not insufficient for failure to state place of offense.

That an indictment for unlawfully selling spirituous liquor did not allege that the offense was committed in the county, was no ground for arrest of judgment, the objection being waived by failure to plead in abatement, and in view of the statutes of jeofails, O. S. §§ 4623, 4625.

5. Criminal law §875(1)—Duty of trial judge to see that verdict is returned in proper form.

In a prosecution for unlawfully selling spirituous liquors, it was not error for the trial judge to require the jury to return a verdict of "guilty or not guilty," it being his duty to see that the verdict was returned and recorded in proper form.

6. Criminal law §1152(1)—Permitting jury to give reasons for verdict in discretion of court.

How far the court should permit the jury to give their reasons for a verdict is within its discretion and not subject to review by the Supreme Court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Rockingham County; Long, Judge.

Tom Lemons was convicted of violating the prohibition law, and he appeals. No error.

This was an indictment for violation of the prohibition law (O. S. §§ 3367-3411), setting out 4 counts, the first of which alleged an unlawful sale of spirituous liquors and the second for having spirituous liquors in possession for the purpose of sale. The defendant introduced no evidence. Verdict of guilty. When the foreman began giving the reasons for the verdict the court told him that the jury must find for their verdict "guilty or not guilty," and thereupon the jury returned a verdict of guilty with a recommendation for mercy. Judgment and appeal by defendant.

J. R. Joyce, of Reidsville, and U. Leland Stanford, of Stoneville, for appellant.

J. S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

CLARK, C. J. The witness Price testified that the defendant let him have three half pints of whisky which was loaned to him; that he did not buy it, but that he agreed to return it, and told the defendant that he did not know when he would get the whisky to return, and afterwards offered to pay him.

[1] The defendant excepted to the refusal to let the witness Price answer the question whether he afterwards paid the defendant. The question was immaterial and irrelevant, for a sale on credit, or a loan of liquor to be returned, comes within the statute. In State v. Mitchell, 156 N. C. 659, 72 S. E.

632, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 302, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 469, the court held:

"When one lends spirituous liquor with the understanding that it shall be returned in kind, the title to the liquor passes absolutely on the consideration of its being replaced, and the transaction is a barter or exchange and comes within the meaning of the word 'sale,' and therefore is a violation of the state prohibition law."

Brown, J. (156 N. C. at page 662, 72 S. E. 634, 37 L. R. A. [N. S.] 302, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 469), very appropriately said:

"In adopting the prohibition statute enacted by the General Assembly, our voters had in view the prevention of the traffic in intoxicating liquors in the state. If it were allowable to carry on an exchange or barter in whisky, the law would be rendered practically worthless and incapable of enforcement. Whenever a person was charged with an illicit sale of liquor the defense in most cases doubtless would be that the transaction was only an exchange or barter."

The defendant introduced no evidence, but contented himself with demurring to the evidence of the state, which was properly submitted to the jury. The exceptions to the charge do not require discussion.

The defendant moved here in arrest of judgment on the grounds:

[2] (1) That the bill of indictment does not allege a sale to any particular person or to a person or persons to the jurors unknown. Laws 1913, c. 44, § 6, now O. S. § 3383, prescribes that in an indictment for this offense "it shall not be necessary to allege a sale to a particular person, and the violation of law may be proved by circumstantial evidence as well as by direct evidence." This section was sustained in State v. Brown, 170 N. C. 714, 86 S. E. 1042.

[3, 4] (2) That the offense is not alleged to have been committed in Rockingham county, and also argued that the date of the transaction was not set out in the indictment. O. S. § 4625, which was previously Rev. § 3255, and Code, § 1189, provides that no judgment can be stayed or reversed (among other things) for failure to state the time or stating an impossible time of the commission of the offense when time, as in this case, is not of the essence of the offense. State v. Williams, 117 N. C. 755, 23 S. E. 250, nor for want of a proper and perfect venue when the court shall appear to have had jurisdiction of the offense.

The heading of the indictment was probably, "North Carolina, Rockingham County," and the indictment merely recites that the offense occurred on May —, 1921, "at and in the county aforesaid." But whether there was such heading or not, the indictment was found by the grand jury of Rockingham which had jurisdiction of the offense, and if the offense had not been committed in that county the defendant waived the objection by not pleading in abatement. State v. Lewis, 142 N. C. 636, 55 S. E. 600, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 669, 9 Ann. Cas. 604. The authorities that a motion in arrest of judgment will not be allowed after conviction for the omission of the date or failure to state the venue of the offense are collected in State v. Francis, 157 N. C. 612, 72 S. E. 1041; State v. White, 146 N. C. 606, 60 S. E. 505, and State v. Lancaster, 169 N. C. 284, 84 S. E. 529.

C. S. § 4623, provides that no bill or warrant shall be quashed for informality:

"Every criminal proceeding by warrant, indictment, information, or impeachment is sufficient in form for all intents and purposes if it express the charge against the defendant in a plain, intelligible, and explicit manner; and the same shall not be quashed, nor judgment thereon stayed, by reason of any informality or refinement, if in the bill or proceeding sufficient matter appears to enable the court to proceed to judgment."

This and C. S. § 4625, are our principal statutes of jeofails, which have been frequently cited. See citations thereto in C. S. under the above sections.

Chief Justice Ruffin, with his strong common sense in the administration of the law, quotes the above words from the Act 1811, c. 809, and says:

"This law was certainly designed to uphold the execution of public justice, by freeing the courts from those fetters of form, technicality and refinement, which do not concern the substance of the charge, and the proof to support it. Many of the sages of the law have before called nice objections of this sort a disease of the law, and a reproach to the Bench and lamented that they were bound down to strict and precise precedents, neither more brief, plain, nor perspicuous than that which they were constrained to reject. In all indictments, and especially those for felonies, exceptions extremely refined and often going to form only, have been, though reluctantly, entertained. We think the Legislature meant to disallow the whole of them and only requires the substance, that is a direct averment of those facts and circumstances which constitute the crime to be set forth. It is to be remarked that the act directs the court to proceed to judgment without regard to two things—the one, form, the other, refinement."

These clear expressions by this eminent judge have been often quoted since in the opinions of this court.

[5, 6] The requirement of the judge that the jury should find the defendant "guilty or not guilty" was eminently proper (State v. Godwin, 138 N. C. 586, 50 S. E. 277), and without that there would have been no sufficient verdict. It was his duty to see that the verdict was returned and recorded in proper form. State v. Whitaker, 89 N. C.

472; State v. Whitson, 111 N. C. 697, 16 S. E. 332, and cases there cited. How far the court should permit the jury to give their reasons was a matter within his discretion which is not subject to review by us, nor does it appear how far he allowed them to explain their verdict, beyond the fact that they did make a recommendation for clemency—which is mere surplusage, and does not vitiate the verdict. State v. McKay, 150 N. C. 816, 63 S. E. 1059.

GRAVES v. REIDSVILLE LODGE NO. 2128 et al. (No. 353.)

1. Justices of the peace §119(3)—Judgment in personam without voluntary appearance or service void.

A judgment in personam without voluntary appearance or service of process within the jurisdiction is void in a justice court as well as in courts of more extended jurisdiction, and where the fact appears on inspection of the record such judgment may be treated as a nullity, or will be set aside on motion, but where lack of service does not so appear, but is established, the party affected may have judgments set aside on motion that his defense may be considered and passed upon.

2. Justices of the peace §127—Justice may set aside judgment which is irregular or void for want of service notwithstanding accusation of fraud.

The doctrine that a judgment can only be set aside for fraud by an independent action of which a justice has no jurisdiction applies only to final judgments which are otherwise in all respects regular, and does not prevail where judgments are irregular or are void for want of jurisdiction by reason of nonservice of process.

3. Justices of the peace §127—Statute as to application for rehearing inapplicable to motion to set aside judgment for want of service.

C. S. § 1500, rule 21, requiring application for rehearing before a justice when a party is absent from the trial because of sickness, excusable mistake, or neglect within 10 days, held inapplicable to motion to set aside judgment for want of service.

4. Justices of the peace §127—Statute relating to time of appeal inapplicable to motion to set aside judgment for want of service.

C. S. § 1530, providing for an appeal from a justice's judgment on notice given within 10 days, or within 15 days after personal notice of judgment if it was rendered on process not personally served, held not applicable to motion to set aside judgment for want of service.

Appeal from Superior Court, Rockingham County; Webb, Judge.

Actions by R. S. Graves against Reidsville Lodge No. 2128 and others before a justice. Judgment for plaintiff set aside by the justice, and plaintiff's motion to dismiss denied, and he appealed to Superior Court. Motion to dismiss granted, and named defendant excepts and appeals. Reversed.

Motion to set aside three several judgments on a money demand entered against defendant lodge et al., heard on appeal from a justice court before his honor J. L. Webb, judge presiding, at February term 1921, of the superior court of Rockingham county. The justice having set aside judgment for lack of service and on allegations tending to establish fraud, on appeal his honor, being of opinion that the justice was without jurisdiction to entertain the motion for the reason that an issue of fraud was involved, dismissed the proceedings. The ruling of his honor and the reason for it are more fully embodied in the judgment as follows:

"The court finds as a fact that there is an issue of fraud arising upon the motion and affidavits in the bringing of said action and obtaining said judgment before the justice of the peace, and, that fact appearing to the court, on motion of the plaintiff that the said motion of the defendant to set aside the judgment be dismissed, on the ground that the justice had no power to hear and determine the matter, and that said justice had no power to make his findings of fact and render said judgment as herein set out as to fraud, the court finding as a fact that an issue of fraud arises herein and the justice had no jurisdiction of that issue, it is further ordered and adjudged that the finding of fact and judgment of the said justice be overruled, and that the said motion be dismissed, and that the motion of the plaintiff to dismiss is hereby sustained, and that the defendant be taxed with the cost of this proceeding."

Defendant lodge excepted and appealed.

J. M. Sharp, of Reidsville, for appellant.

P. W. Glidewell and W. R. Dalton, both of Reidsville, for appellee.

HOKE, J. [1-4] It is the accepted principle here and elsewhere that a judgment in personam without voluntary appearance or service of process within the jurisdiction is void, and where the fact appears on inspection of the record, such a judgment may be treated as a nullity, or it will be set aside on motion and the party charged allowed to make his defense. And where the lack of service does not so appear but is established, the party affected may have the same set aside on motion in the cause, that his defense may be considered and passed upon. Herdon v. Autry, 181 N. C. 271, 107 S. E. 3; Stocks v. Stocks, 179 N. C. 285-288, 102 S. E. 306; Johnson, Trustee, v. Whilden, 171 N. C. 153, 88 S. E. 223, 225; Massie v. Hainey, 165 N. C. 174, 81 S. E. 185; Flowers v. King, 145 N. C. 234, 58 S. E. 1074, 122 Am. St. Rep.

444. The same principle, both as to the right and the procedure, prevails in reference to judgments in a justice court as well as in courts of more extended jurisdiction. Herdon v. Autry, supra; Lowman v. Ballard, 168 N. C. 16, 84 S. E. 21, L. R. A. 1915D, 427, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 899; Ballard v. Lowry, 163 N. C. 488, 79 S. E. 966; King v. Railroad, 112 N. C. 318, 16 S. E. 929; Whitehurst et al. v. Transportation Co., 109 N. C. p. 342, 18 S. E. 937. The position is not affected because there may be allegations and evidence of fraud presented. The gravamen of the application is the failure of service of process showing an entire lack of jurisdiction, and the court that has unwittingly countenanced the wrong is charged with the duty and has the power to right it. In such a case, the fraud, and the evidence of it, is only an incident. The doctrine that a judgment can only be set aside for fraud by an independent action, of which a justice has no jurisdiction, applies only to final judgments which are otherwise in all respects, regular, and does not prevail in reference to judgments that are irregular, or which are void for want of jurisdiction by reason of nonservice of process. And so in reference to other principles of law, statutory and otherwise, urged upon our attention in support of his honor's ruling. In C. S. § 1500, rule 21, which provides that a judgment of a justice may be reheard when a party is absent from the trial and such absence is caused by sickness, excusable mistake, or neglect of the party, and requiring that such an application be made in 10 days, and section 1530, which provides for an appeal from a justice's judgment on notice given within 10 days, and if on process not personally served allowing 15 days after personal notice of the judgment, they all contemplate and apply to causes of which the court has acquired jurisdiction, either by personal service or by attachment and publication, and do not affect a case like the present, which enables one to obtain relief from a judgment entered against him when the court, for lack of service, was without jurisdiction to make any orders in any way affecting his rights of person or property. In Lowman v. Ballard, supra, it was held, as stated, that—

"Where a judgment obtained before a justice of the peace is sought to be set aside by the defendant for lack of service of summons, the remedy is by motion in the cause made before the court which had rendered the judgment."

And speaking to the question the court, in the opinion said:

"Both in the superior and justices' courts the statutory limits as to time within which motions of this character shall be made are cases where the proceedings are in all respects regular, and do not apply in cases where there is defective service of process or an entire absence of it" citing Massie v. Hainey, 165 N. C. 174, 81 S. E. 135; McKee v. Angel, 90 N. C. 60.

It may be well to note that if on investigation it should be made to appear that service of process had been made, giving the justice jurisdiction of the appellant, that would present the case in a different aspect, and some of the positions urged for appellee may be made available in his favor.

For the reason stated, the judgment of his honor will be reversed, and the superior court will proceed to hear the motion on the affidavits and facts as properly presented.

Reversed.

(182 N. C. 276)

WHITE v. HINES, Director General of Railroads, et al. (No. 289.)

1. Evidence \S 208(1)—Admission in answer held admissible in evidence without submitting entire allegation.

Where plaintiff alleged that the train in which her ward was traveling was wrecked by derailment, the admission in defendant's answer that it was so wrecked was properly admitted without the entire allegation that it was without the negligence or fault of defendants.

2. Evidence \S 478(1)—Nonexpert may testify that a person was crazy or not normal.

Nonexpert witnesses may testify that a person whose sanity was involved was "crazy," or "not normal."

3. Release \S 56—Evidence of treatment of family and stay in hospital admissible on mental competency.

On issue of the mental competency of a person injured and executing a release, evidence as to the manner in which he treated his family before and after the injury was properly admitted, and also evidence of his stay in various hospitals after the injury.

4. Release \S 56—Declarations of alleged incompetent admissible.

Conduct and declarations of an injured person who executed a release were competent on the question of his mental condition.

5. Evidence \S 501(3)—Declarations of alleged incompetent admissible as basis for opinion.

Conduct and declarations of a person alleged incompetent were admissible as a fact in connection with other circumstances on which a witness might found her opinion of mental capacity.

6. Damages \S 168(1)—Evidence of mental condition three years before injury admissible.

Where a guardian suing a carrier for injury to the ward by derailment alleged that prior to the injury the ward was "strong and healthy both mentally and physically," testimony as to the ward's mental condition three years before the injury was not too remote.

7. Damages \S 168(2)—Evidence of mental condition at time of trial held admissible.

Where a guardian sued a carrier for injury to the ward by derailment, alleging as one of the results of the injury the ward's permanent insanity, testimony based on observation concerning the condition of the plaintiff's ward at the trial was competent.

8. Witnesses \S 389—Evidence of contradictory statement held admissible.

Where the competency of an injured person executing a release was in question, and defendant's witness testified that he paid the injured person a sum of money, and that his mental condition at that time was good, and denied on cross-examination having told plaintiff that the injured person was in a mighty bad shape when witness gave him the check, evidence of such statement was admissible for purpose of contradiction.

9. Evidence \S 380—Photograph may be vouched for by other than photographer.

That a photograph is a true representation may be shown by witnesses other than the photographer.

10. Appeal and error \S 1052(1)—Error in preliminary evidence was harmless where the final evidence was not introduced.

Any error in preliminary evidence to the verity of a photograph was harmless where the photograph was neither introduced in evidence nor exhibited to the jury.

11. Carriers \S 321(21)—Instruction as to burden of proof as to injury of passenger held proper.

In an action for injuries to passenger from derailment, instruction that burden originally was on the plaintiff to satisfy the jury by the greater weight of the evidence that there was negligence on the part of the defendant which was the proximate cause of the injury, but if the jury should be satisfied that plaintiff's injury was the proximate result of a derailment, then "the burden shifts to defendant and defendant must go forward and produce evidence to relieve itself of the charge of negligence and show the jury it was not guilty of the negligence, or that its negligence was not the proximate cause," held not erroneous in connection with the balance of the instructions, and was not to be understood as shifting to defendant the burden of the issues or the burden of preponderating proof, but imposed on him the duty of going forward with evidence tending to relieve itself of charge of negligence.

12. Negligence \S 121(1)—Doctrine of "res ipsa loquitur" and "prima facie" evidence, stated.

The expressions "res ipsa loquitur" and "prima facie" evidence or "prima facie case" are used synonymously, and each expression signifies nothing more than evidence to be considered by the jury, and a "prima facie case" or evidence is that which is received or continues until the contrary is shown, and if called a presumption of negligence, that presumption still is only evidence of negligence for the consideration of the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Prima Facie; Res Ipsa Loquitur.]

13. Negligence ⇨ 121(1)—Rule as to burden of proof stated.

Where plaintiff has established a prima facie case of negligence, as by showing the event and the injury therefrom, the jury might be warranted in answering the issue as to negligence in plaintiff's favor, but is not required to do so as a matter of law, and it is incumbent on defendant to offer proof in rebuttal, but not to the extent of preponderating evidence, though if he offer evidence plaintiff may introduce evidence in reply, and the final question for the jury is whether plaintiff is entitled by the greater weight of all the evidence to an affirmative answer; for throughout the trial the burden is on plaintiff to show by the greater weight of the evidence that he is entitled to such answer.

14. Trial ⇨ 295(1)—Instructions must be considered as a whole.

The charge must be considered as a whole in the connected way in which it was given, and on presumption that the jury did not overlook any portion of it, and if when so construed it presents the law fairly and correctly, it will afford no ground for reversal, though expressions standing alone might be regarded as erroneous.

Appeal from Superior Court, Cumberland County; Daniels, Judge.

Action by Samuel A. White, by his guardian, against Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads, and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. No error.

This was a civil action brought by the plaintiff to recover damages for injury to Samuel A. White, the ward of the plaintiff, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendants. The case was tried before his honor, Frank Daniels, Judge, and a jury at the March term, 1920, of the superior court of Cumberland county, the trial resulting in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, from which defendants appealed to the Supreme Court.

The plaintiff moved to substitute John Barton Payne as the successor of Walker D. Hines as Director General of Railroads.

Upon the trial, there was evidence for the plaintiff tending to show that her ward, Samuel A. White, while a passenger on a train of the defendants, was injured by the derailment of the train; that he was "thrown about within the coach," which was overturned; that he was injured on the back of the head about the base of the brain, and that his body and limbs were bruised; that his mind was seriously affected; that he was treated, after the injury, in the Tranquil Park Sanitarium in Charlotte, at Johns Hopkins in Baltimore, and at the Highsmith Hospital in the city of Fayetteville; and that he is now confined in the State Hospital for the Insane. The plaintiff alleged that the injuries were caused by the negligence of the defendants in the operation of the train, in the negligent care of the rolling stock and roadbed, and in the negligent failure properly to inspect and to care for them. The plaintiff further alleged that her ward, by reason of said injuries, had suffered great pain, had incurred expense for medical and hospital service, had been ruined in physical health, and made permanently insane; that his earning capacity had been destroyed, and his family deprived of his support; that prior to the alleged injuries, to wit, July 20, 1917, her ward had been strong and vigorous, both mentally and physically; and that he had been industrious, skillful, and proficient in his occupation of "beamer and stationary engineer."

The defendants denied that they were negligent in any of the respects complained of, and that the plaintiff's injury, if any, was due to an accident which could not reasonably have been foreseen or prevented.

The defendants further alleged that the plaintiff's ward had executed to the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, one of the defendants, a release and receipt in full for his claim for damages resulting from the alleged injuries. This alleged release was introduced in evidence.

There was evidence tending to show that the derailment had been caused by a wash-out in the roadbed; that the section master had examined the track about three hours before the derailment occurred, and had found it apparently in safe condition; that the train had been inspected before it left Rocky Mount, and was found to be in good condition in all respects; and that it was skillfully operated by a competent crew. There was evidence tending to show that there had been heavy rains for one or two days, and that a hole under the track, five or six feet deep, had been caused by water running underneath.

There was evidence for the plaintiff tending to show that her ward's mind had been seriously impaired by the injuries which he had sustained in the derailment, and that he did not have sufficient mental capacity to execute the release introduced in evidence by the defendants, and that the release had been procured by fraud and undue influence. Plaintiff contended that said release, for this reason, was voidable. There was evidence for the defendant tending to show that the plaintiff's ward had sufficient mental capacity to execute said release. Evidence was introduced tending to show his mental condition prior to the alleged derailment, at that time and thereafter, and especially with reference to his mental condition at the time the release was alleged to have been signed. There was further evidence for the plaintiff tending to show that her ward had judicially been declared a lunatic in July, 1918, by a proceeding duly prosecuted before the clerk of the superior court of Cumberland county, and that the plaintiff had duly been appointed as his guardian.

At the close of the plaintiff's evidence, the defendants moved for judgment as in case of nonsuit, and at the close of all the evidence, this motion was renewed.

The defendant's motion was allowed as to the Railroad Administration and denied as to the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. To the court's refusal to dismiss as to the railroad company, the company duly excepted.

The issues were answered by the jury, as follows:

(1) Was the plaintiff injured by the negligence of the defendant as alleged in the complaint? A. Yes.

(2) Did plaintiff execute the release set out in the answer? A. Yes.

(3) Was the execution of said release procured by fraud, or undue influence, as alleged in the reply? A. Yes.

(4) Was plaintiff incapable, by reason of mental affliction, to execute the said release, as alleged in the reply? A. Yes.

(5) What damages, if any, is plaintiff entitled to recover of the defendant? A. $12,500, less $554 paid.

Judgment was entered for $11,946, together with the costs of this action. The defendants appealed.

Rose & Rose, of Fayetteville, for appellants.

Evans & Eason, of Raleigh, for appellee.

ADAMS, J. There are 52 exceptions in the record, several of which have been formally abandoned.

[1] The plaintiff alleged that the train in which her ward was travelling "was wrecked by derailment." In their answer the defendants admitted that the train was "wrecked by derailment without fault or negligence on the part of the defendants, or any of their agents or employees." The plaintiff offered in evidence the following portion of the answer:

"Answering the allegations contained in article 5 of the complaint, the defendants admit that on July 20, 1917, S. A. White was a passenger on train No. 89 of defendants, en route to Hope Mills, N. C., and that while said White was a passenger on said train, about 1½ miles from Hope Mills, said train was wrecked by derailment."

The defendants objected on the ground that the remainder of their allegations was omitted, and that the court below should have excluded the evidence or required the plaintiff to offer the additional phrase denying "fault or negligence on the part of the defendants." The evidence offered by the plaintiff was admitted, and the defendants excepted. This is the first exception in the record.

Evidence of the derailment and of the ward's injury as the proximate result was sufficient on the question of negligence to carry the case to the jury. The plaintiff's allegation that the train had been wrecked by derailment was the distinct statement of a circumstance relevant to the first issue. Proof of the plaintiff's qualification as guardian, of the derailment of the train, and of the ward's personal injury as the proximate result, nothing else appearing, made a prima facie case for the plaintiff, and upon the defendants devolved the duty of explaining the alleged wreck. In a number of decisions this principle has been applied, and it has frequently been held, in accordance with his honor's ruling, that the admission of a separate fact relevant to the inquiry, though only a part of an entire paragraph, is competent without qualifying or explanatory matter inserted by way of defense. Sawyer v. R. R., 145 N. C. 30, 58 S. E. 598, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 200; Stewart v. R. R., 136 N. C. 387, 48 S. E. 793; Wade v. Contracting Co., 149 N. C. 177, 62 S. E. 919. The first exception cannot be sustained.

[2, 3] Exceptions 9, 10, 11, 21, 23, 24, 29, 30, 32, 35, 36, 38, and 39 are addressed, directly or inferentially, to the mental condition of the plaintiff's ward, and may be grouped and considered together. All these exceptions are without real merit. The defendants offered in evidence a paper writing purporting to be the ward's receipt for $554, and a release of the railroad company from all liability resulting from the derailment. The plaintiff replied that Samuel A. White was mentally incapacitated to such an extent that at the time of its execution he could not comprehend the nature and effect of the instrument to which he had affixed his signature. Evidence as to White's mental condition, then, was both material and essential. The defendants contended that testimony to the effect that he "was crazy" or "not normal" was the statement of a positive conclusion, or fact, and, for this reason incompetent. But in this jurisdiction it is established that a nonexpert witness, who has had conversations and dealings with another, and a reasonable opportunity, based thereon, of forming an opinion as to the mental condition of such person, is not disqualified on the ground that his testimony is a mere expression of opinion. McLean v. Norment, 84 N. C. 235; In re Stocks, 175 N. C. 224, 95 S. E. 360; In re Broach, 172 N. C. 522, 90 S. E. 681. One not an expert may give an opinion, founded upon observation, that a certain person is sane or insane. Whitaker v. Hamilton, 126 N. C. 470, 35 S. E. 815; Clary v. Clary, 24 N. C. 78. Evidence as to the manner in which White treated his family before and after the injury was admitted on the issue of mental competency. His honor carefully limited this evidence to the fourth issue. Upon this issue evidence of his stay in various hospitals was likewise competent.

[4, 8] The admission of Mrs. Porter's testimony that "we all begged him (White) not to go to Hopewell, and he went anyhow, and that the doctor advised him not to go back," is not reversible error. White's conduct and declarations were competent on the question of his mental condition, and as a fact in connection with other circumstances upon which Mrs. Porter founded her opinion of his mental capacity. McLean v. Norment, supra; Clary v. Clary, supra; State v. Cooper, 170 N. C. 719, 87 S. E. 50, 8 A. L. R. 1214.

[6] Nor is the testimony of Deaver touching White's mental condition three years before the injury ground for reversal. The plaintiff's allegation that prior to the injury her ward was "strong and healthy both mentally and physically" was denied by the defendants, and this evidence, offered in support of the plaintiff's allegation, was not too remote to be considered by the jury.

[7] We are unable to see why the testimony of Dr. Small, based upon his observation, concerning the condition of the plaintiff's ward at the trial was not competent. The plaintiff distinctly alleged that White's insanity was permanent, and this the defendants denied. Evidence as to his mind subsequent to the injury and at the time of the trial was clearly competent in support of the plaintiff's contention. This disposes of exceptions 45, 46, and 47.

[8] E. L. McDonald, a witness for the defendants, testified that he had paid White a check for $554, and that his mental condition at that time was good. On cross-examination he denied having told the plaintiff that White "was in mighty bad shape" when he gave White the check. The evidence of J. W. McFayden and of the plaintiff was admitted only for the purpose of contradicting McDonald. Exceptions 33 and 34 are therefore overruled.

Exceptions 43 and 44 relate to interrogatories propounded to Dr. Small, a medical expert. The objection is that the questions were not sufficiently definite, and that they contained hypotheses for the support of which there was no evidence. We have bestowed upon these questions a critical examination, and have concluded that the evidence was properly admitted. State v. Cole, 94 N. C. 960; State v. Keene, 100 N. C. 509, 6 S. E. 91; State v. Wilcox, 132 N. C. 1120, 44 S. E. 625; Summerlin v. R. R., 133 N. C. 550, 45 S. E. 898.

[11] Exceptions 49 and 50, which are directed to the charge of the court concerning the "shifting of the burden of proof," cannot be sustained.

His honor instructed the jury as follows:

"Our Supreme Court has laid down the principle that where one is a passenger on a train and the train is derailed and he is injured, and the derailment is the proximate cause of the injury then the burden shifts to the defendant. The burden originally was on the plaintiff in this case to satisfy the jury by the greater weight of the evidence that there was negligence in respect to the roadbed, on the part of the defendant, and that this negligence was the proximate cause of the injury, but where it is admitted that plaintiff was a passenger on a train of defendant, and that train was derailed, and if the jury should be satisfied by the greater weight of the evidence that the plaintiff was injured, and that his injury was the proximate result of the derailment of defendant's train, then the burden shifts to defendant, and the defendant must go forward and produce evidence to relieve itself of the charge of negligence and show to the jury that it is not guilty of the negligence, or that its negligence was not the proximate cause of the injury. * * * Now under this first issue, the burden of it being upon the plaintiff, if you are satisfied by the greater weight of the evidence that plaintiff was a passenger on the train of the defendant company, and if you are satisfied by the greater weight of evidence that he was injured, and that his said injury was proximately caused by the negligence of defendant, then you will answer the first issue 'Yes'; otherwise, you will answer it 'No.' * * * And if you should be satisfied, by the greater weight of the evidence, that there was a derailment by which the plaintiff's injury was proximately caused, nothing else appearing, you should answer the first issue 'Yes,' unless the defendant has satisfied you that there was no negligence on the defendant's part with reference to the construction of the roadbed, and with respect to the proper inspection of conditions that prevailed there.

"Then, if you are satisfied, gentlemen, by the evidence, or if you are satisfied by the testimony introduced by the defendant, the burden being on the defendant that in the construction of its roadbed the defendant exercised reasonable care, and that it was inspected and repaired in a proper manner, then you would answer the first issue 'No.' If you answer the first issue 'No,' that ends the case, and you need not consider the issues further."

To each of these instructions the defendant duly excepted, contending that they were tantamount to shifting the burden of proof from the plaintiff to the defendant. In this connection the court further said:

"The defendant contends that this was an accident; that it had done all of its duty, as I have told you was required of it, but that on account of the heavy rains existing there, it could not, in the exercise of its proper care, have discovered the conditions of the roadbed; that the roadbed had been properly constructed and inspected (there is evidence that it had been inspected on that day by the roadmaster and the section master), and that the defendants did not and could not, in the exercise of such reasonable care, as I have described to you, have discovered that it was in defective condition."

The exceptions require a brief examination of former decisions of this court, which, it is admitted, unfortunately disclose expressions as to the burden of proof and the burden of the issue that are inconsistent, contradictory, and confusing. Beginning with Ellis v. R. R., 24 N. C. 138, in which the plaintiff sought to recover damages for loss caused by fire escaping from the defendant's locomotives, this court, in discussing the principle to which the exceptions relate, said:

"We admit that the gravamen of the plaintiff is damage caused by the negligence of the defendants. But we hold that when he shows damage resulting from their act, which act, with the exertion of proper care, does not ordinarily produce damage, he makes out a prima facie case of negligence, which cannot be repelled but by proof of care or of some extraordinary accident which renders care useless."

Referring to Ellis' Case, 24 N. C. 138, Justice Reade said:

"In that case the plaintiff proved that his fence was 50 feet from the railroad and that sparks from the engine set it on fire; and that although it had been there for a long time it had never caught fire before, and that the engine usually had a spark catcher, but it did not appear whether it had one on that day. There was no other evidence by the plaintiff, and the defendant offered none. It was held to be prima facie negligence. Of course it was. There was the plain fact that the defendant had set fire to the plaintiff's fence, which the prudent use of his engine had never fired before. That made it necessary for the defendant to show that he had used the same care on that day as had been used theretofore. If he had proved that the engine was supplied with a spark catcher and that the usual care was used, the decision would have been the other way." Bryan v. Fowler, 70 N. C. 597.

In Aycock v. R. R., 89 N. C. 321, a suit for the recovery of damages caused by fire from a passing locomotive, Chief Justice Smith in discussing R. R. v. Schultz, 2 A. & E. R. R. Cases, 271, used this language:

"A numerous array of cases are cited in the note in support of each side of the question as to the party upon whom rests the burden of proof of the presence or absence of negligence, where only the injury is shown, in case of fire from emitted sparks. While the author favors the class of cases which imposes the burden upon the plaintiff, we prefer to abide by the rule so long understood and acted on in this state, not alone because of its intrinsic merit, but because it is so much easier for those who do the damage to show the exculpatory circumstances, if such exist, than it is for the plaintiff to produce proof of positive negligence. The servants of the company must know and be able to explain the transaction, while the complaining party may not; and it is but just that he should be allowed to say to the company, 'You have burned my property, and if you are not in default show it and escape responsibility.'"

The learned Chief Justice followed this decision by another in Lawton v. Giles, 90 N. C. 380, in which he said:

"The reason for the exception to the general rule that one required to allege must prove negligence, in the case of fire caused by steam engines, is thus stated in a late and valuable treatise: 'All information as to the construction and working of its engines is in the possession of the company, as are also the means of rebutting the charge of negligence entirely in its power. An outsider can hardly be expected to prove that in the construction of the engine, or in the use of it, at the time the injury occurred, the company was guilty of negligence. He can only prove that his property was destroyed by one of the company's locomotives; and having done this, it is but proper to call on the defendant to show that he was not negligent, that he employed careful and competent servants, and that he had used the most improved appliances to prevent the escape of fire from his engines.' 1 Thomp. Neg. 153, par. 8."

In Grant v. R. R., 108 N. C. 467, 13 S. E. 209, there may be observed a marked departure from the principle announced in preceding decisions. There the plaintiff brought suit to recover damages for personal injury caused by derailment. The trial judge instructed the jury that after the prima facie case of negligence was shown by the derailment of the train, "the laboring oar is shifted to the defendant, and the defendant must show by a preponderance of evidence that the company has not been guilty of negligence." The judgment of the lower court was affirmed, but in Williams v. R. R., 130 N. C. 128, 40 S. E. 979, and in Shepard v. Telegraph Co., 143 N. C. 244, 55 S. E. 704, 118 Am. St. Rep. 796, a similar charge was expressly disapproved. The Williams Case was followed by another in which it was held that the trial judge was in error when he instructed the jury that if the fire originated from the defendants' engine, "this would not of itself cast the burden on the defendants to prove that the engine was properly equipped with spark arresters, and skillfully operated." Hosiery Co. v. R. R., 131 N. C. 240, 42 S. E. 602. In Manufactur- ing Co. v. Raleigh & G. R. Co., 122 N. C. 888, 29 S. E. 575, it is said that, when the origin of the fire is fixed upon the defendant, the presumption of negligence arises, and the burden rests upon the defendant to show that approved appliances were used; and in Marcom v. R. R., 126 N. C. 204, 35 S. E. 423, it is said that the burden of proving a failure of legal duty rests upon the plaintiff, but when that fact is shown or admitted, the burden is on the defendant to excuse its failure. To the same effect is Wilkie v. R. R., 127 N. C. 208, 37 S. E. 204, which was the case of a derailment. In Overcash v. Electric Co., 144 N. C. 573, 57 S. E. 377, 12 Ann. Cas. 1040, the plaintiff sued to recover damages for personal injury caused by the derailment of an electric car. The plaintiff's counsel, undertaking to conform their prayer to the cases theretofore decided, requested the court to give the following instruction, which was declined:

"That if they find as a fact, from the evidence, that the plaintiff got aboard defendant's car and paid his transportation therefor, then he was a passenger on same; and if they further find as a fact, from the evidence, that the said car on which he was riding ran off the track and plaintiff was injured thereby, as alleged in the complaint, and that said derailment was the proximate cause of the injury, then the law presumes that the defendant was negligent in allowing said car to become derailed, and the burden is upon it to satisfy the jury that said derailment was not caused by its negligence; and unless it has so satisfied the jury they should answer the first issue 'Yes.'"

The defendant prayed this instruction, which also was refused:

"That while proof or admission of the derailment of the car raised what the law terms a presumption that such derailment was the result of the defendant's negligence, and casts upon it the burden of disproving negligence, yet the court charges you that, notwithstanding the fact that the car was derailed, if you shall find by the greater weight of the evidence that the track at the place of derailment was in good condition, the car properly equipped and in good repair, and being carefully run at a proper rate of speed, then the court instructs you that the defendant was not guilty of negligence, and you will answer the first issue 'No.'"

The charge, which was approved by this court, was as follows:

"If you believe the evidence in this case that there was a derailment of the defendant's car at the time of the injury complained of, and if there was a derailment, there would arise from this fact alone a presumption of negligence upon the part of the defendant, and this presumption of negligence, if not rebutted, is evidence of negligence for consideration of the jury, and if it satisfies you that the defendant was negligent and that this negligence was the real and proximate cause of the injury, then it would be the duty of the jury to answer the first issue 'Yes.' This presumption of negligence may be rebutted by showing that the track of the defendant company was in a reasonably safe condition; that the car was equipped in a reasonably safe manner, and that it was being operated in a reasonably prudent way; and, if rebutted, then the presumption of negligence arising from the derailment is no longer evidence of negligence."

In this charge the "burden" is not devolved upon the defendant. In fact, the judge declined the defendant's prayer that the presumption of negligence arising from the derailment "cast upon the defendant the burden of disproving negligence." The case of Stewart v. R. R., 137 N. C. 690, 50 S. E. 313, had previously decided, certainly in effect, that "the burden is thrown upon the defendant to disprove negligence on its part." Apparently inconsistent with this position are such cases as Womble v. Grocery Co., 135 N. C. 474, 47 S. E. 493; Stewart v. Carpet Co., 138 N. C. 60, 50 S. E. 562; Ross v. Cotton Mills, 140 N. C. 115, 52 S. E. 121, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 298; Shepard v. Telephone Co., supra; Mumpower v. R. R., 174 N. C. 743, 94 S. E. 515. In Cox v. R. R., 149 N. C. 117, 62 S. E. 884, supra, the question is again presented. The court charged the jury:

"If you find from the evidence that the fire which injured the plaintiff's property escaped from the defendant's engine, there is a presumption in law of negligence on the part of the defendant in the operation of its train, and in that event the burden of proof is cast upon the defendant to satisfy you that it was not negligent in the respect complained of."

"To this instruction exception was duly taken, and we think it was erroneous. It evidently made the impression upon the jury that the emission of the sparks raised a legal presumption of the defendant's liability and shifted the burden of proof to the defendant, in the sense that it had failed to satisfy them that there was no negligence; in other words, that [if] its engine was properly equipped and operated, they should return a verdict for the plaintiff. This charge is not sustained by the decisions of this court. The presumption is one of fact and not law. Evidence that the sparks were emitted from the engine and that they set fire to the timber, made a prima facie case for the plaintiff, but only to the extent of being evidence sufficient to carry the case to the jury and to warrant a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, if the jury should find the ultimate or crucial fact that the fire was caused by the defendant's negligence. In the recent case of Winslow v. Hardwood Co., 147 N. C. 275, 60 S. E. 1130, we said: 'The burden of the issue does not shift, but the burden of proof may shift from one party to the other, depending upon the state of the evidence. When the plaintiff introduces testimony in a case of this kind to the effect that the injury to him was caused by the derailment of a train, it is sufficient to carry the case to the jury; but the burden of the issue remains with the plaintiff, though the burden of proof may shift to the defendant in the sense that, if he fails to explain the derailment by proof in the case, either his own or that of the plaintiff, he takes the chance of an adverse verdict, for then the jury may properly conclude that the plaintiff has established the affirmative of the issue as to negligence by the greater weight of the testimony. But the defendant is not required to overcome the case of the plaintiff by a preponderance of the evidence.' This fits our case exactly, and distinctly shows the error in the instruction of the court. Judge Elliott states the general rule which applies in cases of this kind with clearness and accuracy, when he says: 'The burden of the issue, that is, the burden of proof in the sense of proving or establishing the issue or case of the party upon whom such burden rests, as distinguished from the burden or duty of going forward and producing evidence, never shifts, but the burden or duty of proceeding or going forward often does shift from one party to the other, and sometimes back again. Thus, when the actor has gone forward and made a prima facie case, the other party is compelled in turn to go forward or lose his case, and in this sense the burden shifts to him. So the burden of going forward may, as to some particular matter, shift again to the first party in response to the call of a prima facie case or presumption in favor of the second party. But the party who has not the burden of the issue is not bound to disprove the actor's case by a preponderance of the evidence, for the actor must fail if, upon the whole evidence, he does not have a preponderance, no matter whether it is because the weight of evidence is with the other party or because the scales are equally balanced.' 1 Elliott on Evidence, 139. We have approved the rule, as thus stated by Judge Elliott, and notably in Board of Education v. Makely, 139 N. C. 31, and Shepard v. Telegraph Co., 143 N. C. 244. The charge of the court was, we think, contrary to the principle established by those and the following cases: Overcash v. Electric Co., 144 N. C. 572; Ross v. Cotton Mills, 140 N. C. 115; Stewart v. Carpet Co., 138 N. C. 60; Womble v. Grocery Co., 135 N. C. 474; Stanford v. Grocery Co., 143 N. C. 419, and Furniture Co. v. Express Co., 144 N. C. 644."

As to the duty of the defendant, it will seem that various expressions have been used. It has been held that, after the plaintiff has established his prima facie case, the defendant must repel it by proof of care (Ellis v. Railroad, supra), or repel the presumption of negligence (Aycock v. R. R., supra), or excuse its failure (Marcom v. R. R., supra), or assume the burden of proving that it had used the necessary precautions (Aman v. Lumber Co., 160 N. C. 324, 75 S. E. 931), or go forward with proof (Ross v. Cotton Mills, supra).

The attempt to reconcile all the cases on this question would be a useless task; but from the perplexing variety of decisions this court in the more recent cases has undertaken to formulate a rule that should be accepted as reasonable, definite, and stable.

Although there are expressions in some of our decisions that seem to indicate a distinction between the terms res ipsa loquitur and prima facie case, the distinction is most plausibly drawn in those cases which require the defendant to disprove negligence. The terms are often used interchangeably, as in Kay v. Metropolitan Co., 163 N. Y. 447, 57 N. E. 751, in which it is said:

"In the case at bar the plaintiff made out her cause of action prima facie by the aid of a legal presumption" (referring to res ipsa loquitur).

See State v. Wilkerson, 164 N. C. 435, 79 S. E. 888.

In 20 R. C. L. § 156, it is said concerning the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur:

"While it may be true that the mere fact of injury will not give rise to a presumption of negligence on the part of any one, it is also true that some accompanying elemental facts have long been deemed to be sufficient proof of negligence to establish a prima facie case in favor of a person maintaining an action therefor. The presumption arises, it has been said, from the inherent nature and character of the act causing the injury. Presumptions arise from the doctrine of probabilities. The future is measured and weighed by the past, and presumptions are created from the experience of the past. What has happened in the past, under the same conditions, will probably happen in the future, and ordinary and probable results will be presumed to take place until the contrary is shown. More precisely the doctrine res ipsa loquitur asserts that, whenever a thing which produced an injury is shown to have been under the control and management of the defendant, and the occurrence is such as in the ordinary course of events does not happen if due care has been exercised, the fact of injury itself will be deemed to afford sufficient evidence to support a recovery in the absence of any explanation by the defendant tending to show that the injury was not due to his want of care. * * * The presumption of negligence herein considered is, of course, a rebuttable presumption. It imports merely that the plaintiff has made out a prima facie case which entitles him to a favorable finding unless the defendant introduces evidence to meet and offset its effect. And, of course, where all the facts attending the injury are disclosed by the evidence, and nothing is left to inference, no presumption can be indulged—the doctrine res ipsa loquitur has no application."

[12] A prima facie case or evidence is that which is received or continues until the contrary is shown. It is such as in judgment of law is sufficient to establish the fact, and if not rebutted remains sufficient for the purpose. Troy v. Evans, 97 U. S. 3, 24 L. Ed. 941; Kelly v. Jackson, 6 Pet. 622, 8 L. Ed. 523; Jones on Evidence, § 8; State v. Floyd, 35 N. C. 385; State v. Wilkerson, supra. Even if the prima facie case be called a presumption of negligence, the presumption still is only evidence of negligence for the consideration of the jury. Overcash v. Electric

In some of our decisions the expressions res ipsa loquitur, prima facie evidence, prima facie case, and presumption of negligence have been used as practically synonymous. As thus used each expression signifies nothing more than evidence to be considered by the jury. Womble v. Grocery Co., supra; Stewart v. Carpet Co., supra; Ross v. Cotton Mills, supra; Shepard v. Telegraph Co., supra; Mumpower v. R. R., supra; Perry v. R. R., 176 N. C. 69, 97 S. E. 162.

When the plaintiff proves, for instance, that he has been injured by the fall of an elevator, or by a derailment, or by the collision of trains, or other like cause, the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applies, and the plaintiff has a prima facie case of negligence for the consideration of the jury. Such prima facie case does not necessarily establish the plaintiff's right to recover. Certainly, it does not change the burden of the issue. The defendant may offer evidence or decline to do so at the peril of an adverse verdict. If the defendant offer evidence the plaintiff may introduce additional evidence, and the jury will then say whether upon all the evidence the plaintiff has satisfied them by its preponderance that he was injured by the negligence of the defendant.

We may remark in this connection that in Currie v. R. R., 156 N. C. 422, 72 S. E. 488, the burden of the second issue was imposed upon the defendant, because, contrary to the usual practice, two issues instead of one were submitted to the jury on the question of negligence.

[13] As applicable to this class of cases, the rule formulated by the more recent decisions of this court is substantially as follows: In all instances of this character, after the plaintiff has established a prima facie case of negligence, if no other evidence is introduced, the jury will be fully warranted in answering the issue as to negligence in favor of the plaintiff, but will not be required to do so as a matter of law. When such prima facie case is made, it is incumbent upon the defendant to offer proof in rebuttal of the plaintiff's case, but not to the extent of preponderating evidence. The defendant, however, is not required as a matter of law to produce evidence in rebuttal; he may decline to offer evidence at the peril of an adverse verdict. If he offer evidence, the plaintiff may introduce other evidence in reply; and the jury will finally determine whether the plaintiff is entitled by the greater weight of all the evidence to an affirmative answer to the issue; for throughout the trial the burden is upon the plaintiff to show by the greater weight of the evidence that he is entitled to such answer.

stated in the later decisions of this court. The charge must be considered as a whole in the connected way in which it was given, and upon the presumption that the jury did not overlook any portion of it. If, when so construed, it presents the law fairly and correctly, it will afford no ground for reversing the judgment, though some of the expressions when standing alone might be regarded as erroneous. State v. Exum, 138 N. C. 602, 50 S. E. 283; Hodges v. Willson, 165 N. C. 323, 81 S. E. 340.

We do not understand that his honor shifted to the defendant the burden of the issue, or even the burden of preponderating proof, but imposed on the defendant merely the duty of going forward with evidence tending to relieve itself of the charge of negligence, or to show there was no negligence, or, if there was, that the defendant's negligence was not the proximate cause of the injury. The paragraph of the charge in which his honor used the expression "the burden being on the defendant" must be construed in connection with the first paragraph. It is manifest that his honor used the word "burden" in each paragraph as signifying merely the burden of going forward with evidence tending to rebut the plaintiff's case.

His honor conformed his charge to the requirements of Perry v. Mfg. Co., 176 N. C. 70, 97 S. E. 162, in which there are expressions apparently going beyond the exigencies of the case in devolving upon the defendant the burden of establishing his defense to the satisfaction of the jury. In that case the trial judge instructed the jury that the burden would be shifted to the defendant to show that the fire was not due to its negligence. Justice Walker said, referring to the charge:

"The instruction, reasonably construed, means that if the jury found from the facts recited by the judge the main fact that the engine sparks started the fire, a prima facie case was presented, calling upon the defendant to go forward with his proof or take the risk before the jury of an adverse verdict."

See Williams v. Mfg. Co., 177 N. C. 512, 99 S. E. 370.

In view of one or two expressions in Perry's Case, we suggest that, in cases of negligence in which the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applies, after all the evidence is introduced the vital question is not whether the defense specifically relied on is established to the entire satisfaction of the jury, but whether on the issue of negligence the evidence preponderates in favor of the plaintiff, and by this test the answer to the issue is to be determined. The conclusion reached in Page v. Camp Mfg. Co., 180 N. C. 335, 104 S. E. 669, is directly in point.

"It is true that expressions are to be found in some of our cases, filtered there from two or three cases based on the English rule, which justified his honor's charge, but since they were decided we have adhered to the true and correct rule, which is stated in Stewart v. Carpet Co., supra; Womble v. Grocery Co., supra; Cox v. R. R., supra; Shepard v. Telegraph Co., supra, and many other cases, and which we have applied in this case, the substance of which is that the burden to prove his case is always on the plaintiff, whether the defendant introduces evidence or not. Where we have said 'it is the duty of the defendant to go forward with his proof,' it was only meant in the sense that if he expects to win it is his duty to do so or take the risk of an adverse verdict, and not that any burden of proof rested upon him. He pleads no affirmative defense but the general issue, and this puts the burden throughout the case on the plaintiff, who must recover, if at all, by establishing his case by the greater weight of evidence. The Supreme Court of the United States has so stated the rule, and it referred with approval to our cases above cited. We say this much again, in the hope that the rule, as we have stated it, may hereafter be considered as the correct one."

The other exceptions are formal and require no discussion. Of course it will be understood that the rule herein stated is not intended in any way to modify the well-established principles that apply in case of homicide.

We find no error.

No error.

STATE v. DORSETT et al. (No. 348.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 2, 1921.)

Robbery \S 24(1)—Evidence sufficient to sustain conviction.

In a prosecution of three defendants for robbery, evidence held to sustain a verdict of guilty.

Appeal from Superior Court, Rockingham County; Long, Judge.

Hudy Dorsett, Paul Kirkman, and Will Coford were convicted of robbery, defendant Coford being also found guilty of assault with a deadly weapon, and they appeal. No error.

On Sunday night, June 6, 1921, F. H. Finney, an elderly man, was called from his home by the defendant Coford and another man in company with him. Just as the prosecuting witness opened the front door, the two men grabbed him and jerked him out into the yard. They both had pistols. Finney testified:

"The unknown man went into the house while Coford held me at the door. While they were robbing my wife, just about the time they got through and the shooting was over, a car came up to my hogan just below the house and these two men, Coford and the unknown man, went down, got in it, and left. I didn't know who the men in the car were. I didn't see them; just heard them talking. They took $13 from me and $35 from my wife. I was shot in the leg; had to go to the hospital, have my leg split to the bone and the ball taken out. When the men started to the car they gave me back $3 and my knife."

There was much evidence pro and con as to whether Coford was the real assailant and as to whether Dorsett and Kirkman were present, aiding, abetting, and assisting in the perpetration of the crime.

The defendants denied having anything to do with the affair; and upon their evidence, if believed, the jury undoubtedly would have returned a verdict of acquittal.

The three defendants were convicted of robbery, and the defendant Coford was also found guilty of an assault with a deadly weapon. From a judgment of two years' imprisonment with assignment to work upon the public roads, the defendants appealed.

J. M. Sharp and Glidewell & Mayberry, all of Reidsville, for appellants.

James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

STACY, J. The record discloses a serious and aggravated breach of the criminal law. The prosecuting witness was called from his home in the night time, assaulted, robbed, and shot. There was ample evidence, offered by the state, tending to show that the defendants were the guilty parties. On the other hand, there was much evidence offered by the defendants, in support of their defense, which tended to establish their innocence. But upon the controverted questions of fact and the ultimate issue of guilt, the verdict of the jury was adverse to the appellants.

There are a number of exceptions appearing on the record relating to the admission and exclusion of evidence and to his honor's charge, but we have failed to discover any prejudicial or reversible error. The case apparently has been tried in substantial conformity to our decisions on the subject; and, after a careful consideration of all the material questions presented, we find no error, and this will be certified to the superior court.

(182 N. C. 333)

CITY OF DURHAM v. DURHAM PUBLIC SERVICE CO. (No. 335.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 2, 1921.)

1. Municipal corporations \Leftrightarrow 434(6) — Ordinance held not to exempt street railroad from duty of paving tracks.

A city ordinance licensing a street railway company which recited that nothing therein contained should be construed to require the company to pave its roadbed held not to exempt the company for all time, notwithstanding C. S. § 2708, authorizing local improvement assessments, provides that franchises shall not be affected; the exemption not being in terms so explicit as to be free from substantial doubt.

2. Municipal corporations \Leftrightarrow 406(1) — Legislature may directly or through agencies impose assessments for local improvements.

The Legislature, either directly or through its recognized governmental agencies, may impose assessments for local improvements, such as street paving.

3. Municipal corporations \Leftrightarrow 425(1) — Street railway property assessable for local improvements as abutting property.

The property and franchise of street railways laid along a street within the effects and benefits of a local improvement may be assessed under the principle relating to abutting owners.

4. Municipal corporations \Leftrightarrow 406(1), 465—Necessity and apportionment of local improvement assessments within discretion of legislative agents.

The imposition of assessments for local improvements, both as to necessity and apportionment, is very largely in the discretion of the Legislature and its subordinate agencies.

5. Municipal corporations \Leftrightarrow 472, 473—Paving assessment against street railway company not excessive nor discriminatory.

In proceedings to assess the roadbed of a street railway company for street paving, held, that the assessment was not excessive nor discriminatory.

6. Street railroads \Leftrightarrow 37 — Width of paving charged to street railway company for "tracks" held not excessive.

In the imposition of assessments against a street railway company for paving its roadbed, it was not improper, under C. S. § 2708, defining the space to be assessed as 18 inches outside of the tracks, to include the rails and cross-ties within the term "tracks."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Track.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Durham County; Devin, Judge.

Action by City of Durham against the Durham Public Service Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The action is to recover the sum of $102,942.30, assessed against the defendant company for its proportion of the cost of paving the Main street of said city on which the tracks of defendant, a street railway, are laid. Defendant having refused to make the improvement as required by a city ordinance, the work was done by the city and assessed against the company as the statute provides. There is no claim but that the proceedings were formally correct, but defendant resists recovery on the ground that the company is protected by a clause in the license or permit under which its tracks were laid, and which amounts to a contract on the part of the city that the costs of such an improvement shall not be imposed upon the company; second, that the width of the improvement is in excess of the amount allowed by the statute.

J. S. Manning, of Raleigh, and W. L. Foushee and W. J. Brogden, both of Durham, for appellant.

S. C. Chambers and Fuller, Reade & Fuller, all of Durham, for appellee.

HOKE, J. The charter of the Durham Traction Company, under which defendant holds and is operating the street railway (Private Laws 1901, c. 25, § 2), contains the provision that said company may construct and operate railway lines upon and along the streets of said city, permission being first had from the board of aldermen, etc. And the ordinance of the city by which the permit or license was given, after conferring the privilege and designating the routes over which the tracks may be laid, etc., is in part as follows:

"As soon as the said tracks are completed and the poles, wires, and appliances are erected and placed, the portions of the streets and avenues that may have been used for these purposes shall be repaired and restored at said company's cost and expense to their former condition so far as they may have been damaged by the placing and erecting of the tracks, poles, wires, and appliances. The said Durham Traction Company, in laying its track upon the route herein described on, over, and along the streets and avenues, shall follow the grade to be designated by the street commissioner, and it shall be his duty upon the application of said Durham Traction Company to furnish it with grades. The said Durham Traction Company, whenever it shall be required so to do, shall cause its roadbed and track to be brought to surface grade at its own expense and costs, but nothing herein contained shall be construed to require said Durham Traction Company to pave its roadbed, but it shall be required to restore its roadbed to the conditions in which it was at the time of laying of said track, provided, however, that if the city decides to put in or change its sewerage pipes on any of the streets of the said city on which the tracks of said Durham Traction Company may be laid, the said city may require the said traction company to remove and replace, at its own expense, the said tracks, for said purpose, and said city shall incur no liability for any delays or interruptions of the business or traffic of said traction company caused thereby."

And in the act of the Legislature more directly pertinent which authorized the imposition of these assessments for local improvements, and in the portion appertaining to street railways, etc. (Consolidated Statutes, § 2708), it is provided:

"That where any such company shall occupy such street or streets under a franchise or contract which otherwise provided, such franchise or contract shall not be affected by this section, except in so far as may be consistent with the provisions of such franchise or contract."

[1] And it is earnestly contended for the appellant that this clause in the ordinance referred to fully recognized in the legislative proviso amounts to a contract stipulation protecting the defendant company at all times from any charge for paving the streets, and that the burden here imposed upon it is without warrant of law, but in our opinion and on the facts presented the position may not be sustained.

[2] It is fully established that the Legislature, either directly or through its recognized governmental agencies, may impose assessments for these local improvements. City of Raleigh v. Carolina Power & Light Co., 180 N. C. 234, 104 S. E. 462; Felmet v. Canton, 177 N. C. 52, 97 S. E. 728; Justice v. Asheville, 161 N. C. 62, 76 S. E. 822; Tarboro v. Staton, 156 N. C. 504-509, 72 S. E. 577; Kinston v. Wooten, 150 N. C. 295, 63 S. E. 1061; Asheville v. Trust Co., 143 N. C. 360, 55 S. E. 800; Raleigh v. Peace, 110 N. C. 32, 14 S. E. 521, 17 L. R. A. 330; Milwaukee, etc., R. R. v. State of Wisconsin, etc., 252 U. S. 100, 40 Sup. Ct. 306, 64 L. Ed. 476, 10 A. L. R. 892; French v. Barber & Co., 181 U. S. 324, 21 Sup. Ct. 625, 45 L. Ed. 879.

[3] And it is very generally held that the property and franchise of street railways laid along a given street or in a designated locality within the effects and benefits of the proposed improvement may be lawfully brought within the principle as abutting owners. City of New Bern v. A. & N. C. R. R., 159 N. C. 542, 75 S. E. 807; Commissioners of Chatham v. S. A. L. R. R., 133 N. C. 216, 45 S. E. 566; Cicero R. R. v. City of Chicago, 176 Ill. 501, 52 N. E. 860.

The power to impose these assessments for local improvements is properly referred to the sovereign power of taxation, and it is the accepted principle of interpretation that no license, permit, or franchise from a municipal board or from the Legislature itself will be construed as establishing an exemption from the proper exercise of this power, or in derogation of it, unless these bodies are acting clearly within their authority, and the grant itself is in terms so explicit as to be free from any substantial doubt. Railroad v. Alsbrook, 110 N. C. 137, 14 S. E. 652, affirmed on writ of error in 146 U. S. 279, 13 Sup. Ct. 72, 36 L. Ed. 972; Cleveland Electric R. R. v. City of Cleveland, 204 U. S. 116, 27 Sup. Ct. 202, 51 L. Ed. 399; Lincoln Street Railway v. City of Lincoln, 61 Neb. 109, 84 N. W. 802; Sioux City Street Railway v. Sioux City, 78 Iowa, 367, 43 N. W. 224, affirmed on writ of error, 138 U. S. 98, 11 Sup. Ct. 228, 34 L. Ed. 898; Railway Co. v. Philadelphia, 101 U. S. 528, 25 L. Ed. 912.

In Alsbrook's Case it was held:

"The power of taxation being essential to the life of government, exemptions therefrom are regarded as in derogation of sovereign authority and common right, and will never be presumed.

"2. The grant of an exemption from taxation must be expressed by words too plain to be mistaken; if a doubt arise as to the intent of the Legislature, that doubt must be resolved in favor of the state."

And in Cleveland v. Electric Railway Co., 204 U. S. 116, 27 Sup. Ct. 202, 51 L. Ed. 399: Grants of franchises are usually prepared by those interested in them and submitted to the Legislature with a view to obtain the most liberal grant obtainable, and for this and other reasons such grants should be in plain language, certain, definite in their nature, and containing no ambiguity in their terms, and should be strictly construed against the grantee.

Under a proper application of these decisions and the principles they approve and illustrate, there is nothing in the ordinance that contains the exemptions contended for by the company. The terms relied upon for the purpose appear in the second section of the ordinance in the immediate connection with the provision:

"The said Durham Traction Company whenever it shall be required to do so shall cause its roadbed and track to be brought to surface grade at its own expense and cost but nothing herein contained shall be construed to require said Durham Traction Company to pave its road but it shall be required to restore its roadbed to the conditions in which it was at the time of laying the track," etc.

The ordinance is dealing and intends to deal only with the things there required and under conditions then existing. There is nothing that purports to affect the future, nor which could prevent the city government under more advanced conditions in the exercise of the powers conferred upon it for the public good from enacting ordinances that its streets be paved, and that this railway as an abutting owner should bear its proper proportion of the cost. Several of the authorities already referred to are in direct approval of the position. City of New Bern v. Railroad, 159 N. C. 542, 75 S. E. 807, Sioux City Railway v. Sioux City, 138 U. S. 98, 11 Sup. Ct. 226, 34 L. Ed. 898, Railway Co. v. Philadelphia, 101 U. S. 528, 25 L. Ed. 912, and numerous others could be cited.

We are confirmed in this view, if confirmation were needed, by the fact that there is grave doubt if either Legislature or city government in abdication of the police powers conferred upon them for the public good could enter into a valid contract binding on their successors that never under any circumstances and regardless of changing conditions could any future city government order that its streets be paved and the railway company as abutting owner bear its proportion of the costs. Powell v. Railroad Co., 178 N. C. 243, 100 S. E. 424; Railroad v. Goldsboro, 155 N. C. 356, 71 S. E. 514, affirmed on writ of error 232 U. S. 548, 34 Sup. Ct. 364, 58 L. Ed. 721. In case of ambiguity permitting construction, the courts will lean against an interpretation that threatens the constitutionality of a statute. Black's Interpretation of Laws (2d Ed.) p. 110.

[4] It is further insisted for the appellant that the assessment is invalid because the same is excessive in amount and discriminative as between this company and other abutting owners, but in our opinion the facts in evidence do not support the objection. It is fully established that in the imposition of these assessments, both the necessity of the proposed improvement and its apportionment are very largely in the discretion of the Legislature and its subordinate agencies in charge and control of the matter. Speaking to the question in Felmet v. Canton, supra, the court held:

"The authority conferred by statute on municipal corporations to assess lands abutting upon the streets for public local purposes comes within the power of taxation and is largely a matter of legislative discretion, usually held to be conclusive as to the necessity of the improvement, and in respect to the apportionment and the amount only becomes a judicial question in cases of palpable and gross abuse."

[5] Tarboro v. Staton, 156 N. C. 509, 72 S. E. 577, Kinston v. Wooten, 150 N. C. 295, 63 S. E. 1061, and authority generally on the subject is to the same effect. True, the court finds that the value of the property on this main street is only $100,000, but this is the objective or tangible property, constituting the 202 miles of trackage on that street, and contains no estimate of the value of the company's franchise under which it is operating, and which by fair apportionment must be included in the estimate. The only data presented on that subject is that the net earnings of the company for the year ending December 31, 1920, was $147,000 from this and other activities under the franchise. There is a further finding to the effect that for the year ending May 31, 1921, the operation of defendant's railway showed a loss of $17,388.73. Whether this results by reason of exceptional costs and charges accruing during that period does not definitely appear, but there is a presumption against error, and under the principles referred to as controlling and approved in the cases cited, the facts presented are entirely insufficient to justify the court in upsetting the action of the municipal authorities having charge of the assessment, and this exception must be overruled.

[6] Again, appellant objects, contending that the width of the pavement charged against them exceeds the amount allowed by the statute under which the city government proceeded; the limitation being that the burden imposed shall not exceed "the space between the tracks, the rails of the tracks, and eighteen inches in width outside of the tracks of such company." Consolidated Statutes, § 2708. The court finds that the width of assessment where the track is single is eight feet, and the cross-ties of company are seven feet and ten inches, so that, if the language and meaning of the statute "eighteen inches outside of the tracks of the company" by correct interpretation include the rails and the cross-ties, the width of the paving imposed upon the company is well within the statutory provision. The term "railroad tracks" in several dictionaries is defined to include both the rails and the cross-ties upon which they are placed, and to extend even to the roadbed. This definition has been approved in authoritative cases dealing with the subject. In Attorney General v. Common Council, 148 Mich. 71, 111 N. W. 860, Gates v. Chicago R. R., 82 Iowa, 518, 48 N. W. 1040, and in cases of this character, there is every reason to include the cross-ties as coming within the meaning of the term.

The form of the judgment allowing payment by installments is expressly provided for in the statute (Consolidated Statutes, § 2716).

On careful consideration, we find no reversible error, and the judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

Affirmed.

WALKER v. BURT. (No. 257.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 2, 1921.)

1. Accord and satisfaction \S 1.—Definition of term; "accord and satisfaction."

The doctrine of "accord and satisfaction" is a method of discharging a contract or settling a cause of action arising either from a contract or a tort by substituting for such contract or cause of action an agreement upon satisfaction thereof and an execution of such substituted agreement.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Accord and Satisfaction.]

2. Accord and satisfaction \S 7(2)—Arises on acceptance of less amount in full.

Under C. S. \S 895, payment of a less amount according to agreement and compromise of the whole is a full and complete discharge of the same.

3. Appeal and error \S 1062(1)—In action for tort and on breach of contract, where defense was accord and satisfaction, submitting only this issue was not prejudicial.

In an action for tort and breach of contract, where all the evidence showed that a settlement was in the nature of an accord and satisfaction, the submission of this issue only, instead of three issues on this subject proposed by plaintiff, is not prejudicial, since the questions raised in plaintiff's issues were presented under the issue submitted.

4. Trial \S 352(3)—Number of issues is for discretion of court.

If issues are directed to material facts under the pleadings and afforded an opportunity to present the various phases of the controversy, their number is a matter within the discretion of the trial court.

5. Evidence \S 402, 408(2)—In absence of fraud, imposition, or mistake, parol evidence not admissible to vary checks and receipts in full settlement.

Where plaintiff accepted and collected two checks, both marked in full settlement, and signed and delivered a receipt at the time of the first payment that it was in full settlement of all accounts and for all crops sold up to date, in the absence of an allegation of fraud, imposition, or mistake, parol evidence cannot be admitted to vary the terms of the checks and receipt.

6. Appeal and error \S 215(1)—Objection to instructions must be made in lower court.

Where exceptions related to statements as to the contention of the parties in the instructions, and the court was not advised of the objection at the time, the question cannot be raised on appeal.

7. Appeal and error \S 171(1)—On appeal party may not change theory of case from that relied on at trial.

After a party has elected to try his case on one theory in the lower court, he may not change his attitude with respect thereto on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Connoe, Judge.

Action by Willie Walker against J. J. Burt. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. No error.

The plaintiff alleged that in December, 1918, he rented a farm from the defendant for the cultivation of certain crops during the year 1919; that he agreed to plant 10 acres in tobacco, 10 in cotton, 10 in corn, and 10 in wheat on certain conditions or agreements which are fully stated in the complaint. He alleged that the defendant in several respects had failed to comply with his contract; that he had sold a part of the plaintiff's crop of tobacco and had refused to account for all the proceeds; that the defendant had declined to permit the plaintiff to cultivate in cotton the land agreed on, but had required the plaintiff to cultivate another tract about a mile distant; that the defendant had sold the plaintiff's cotton and failed to account for it; that the defendant had retained more rent corn than he was entitled to, and had wrongfully detained certain of the plaintiff's wheat. The plaintiff alleged further that sundry other dealings had taken place between him and the defendant, which need not be recited here, and that the defendant was indebted to him in the sum of $2,769.86, with interest from January 1, 1920.

The defendant denied the material allegations in the complaint, setting out particularly his contentions as to the several matters relied on by the plaintiff, and alleged that the plaintiff had failed to cultivate the land according to the agreement, and in other particulars had failed to comply with the contract. The defendant by way of amendment incorporated the following allegation in his answer:

"That on or about the 22d day of November, 1919, the plaintiff and the defendant had a full accounting and settlement between them of all their claims, accounts, and demands, except small remnants of ungathered crops, and that at said time and in connection with said settlement it was ascertained, determined, and agreed between them that the total indebtedness of the defendant to the plaintiff was $872.65, and that accordingly at said time the defendant paid to the plaintiff the said sum of $872.65, which said sum the plaintiff received and accepted from the defendant in full settlement of all matters, except the said remnants of ungathered crops, and that thereafter, to wit, on or about the 14th day of January, 1920, the plaintiff and the defendant had a full accounting and settlement of said remnants of ungathered crops not included in the said former settlement, and that thereupon upon a full accounting between them it was ascertained and determined that the full and final balance owing by the defendant to the plaintiff in adjustment, payment, and settlement of all accounts, claims, and demands existing between them was the sum of $14.45, and that thereupon the defendant paid to the plaintiff the said sum of $14.45 in full settlement as aforesaid, and the plaintiff received and accepted from the defendant the payment of the said sum of $14.45 in full, complete, and final settlement of all claims, accounts, or demands whatsoever of the plaintiff against the defendant, and that the plaintiff is by said settlement barred and estopped to set up the claims and demands set forth in his complaint, and is barred to maintain his said action."

The plaintiff tendered the following issues:

- (1) Was the check dated November 22, 1919, for $872.65, given and received with intent on the part of both parties thereto that said check should be and was in full settlement of a disputed account and demand existing between the plaintiff and defendant on said date, except small remnants of ungathered crops?
- (2) Was any check given by the defendant and received by the plaintiff on January 14, 1920, in the sum of $14.25?
- (3) If so, was said check given and received with intent on the part of both plaintiff and defendant that said check should be, and was, in full settlement of disputed balance due from defendant to the plaintiff as of January 14, 1920, as alleged in defendant's supplemental answer?

His honor submitted only one issue to the jury, which, with the answer, is as follows:

"Has there been a full and final accounting and settlement between the plaintiff and the defendant of the matters in controversy referred to in the pleadings as alleged in the answer? A. Yes."

Thereupon judgment was rendered, adjudging that there had been a full and final accounting and settlement of all matters referred to in the pleadings.

All the exceptions in the original brief of the appellant's counsel, not including the last three, which are purely formal, relate either to the issue submitted and the court's refusal to submit the issues tendered by the plaintiff, or to the admission and rejection of evidence, or to declining or giving instructions to the jury. At the trial defendant testified that on November 22, 1919, he and the plaintiff had a settlement to date of all matters in dispute between them, and that he gave the plaintiff a check for $872.65, on which were written the words, "In full settlement to date," that the plaintiff thereupon delivered to the defendant a receipt "in full settlement of all accounts and for all crops sold up to date," and that on January 4, 1920, there was a complete settlement, and that the defendant paid the plaintiff $14.45 by a check marked "in full settlement." There was evidence for the defendant tending to show that the alleged settlements included all matters in controversy.

The plaintiff contended that the defendant was due him more than $872; that he did not understand the transactions as purporting to be in settlement of all matters in dispute; that the defendant admitted owing the plaintiff about $1,500; and that defendant in November or December refused, after demand, to make further payment to the plaintiff. On each side there was corroborative evidence. The plaintiff appealed.

A. J. Fletcher, of Raleigh, R. B. Lewis, of Fuquay Springs, and J. W. Bailey, of Raleigh, for appellant.

Allen J. Barwick, of Raleigh, for appellee.

ADAMS, J. [1, 2] From the evidence, the charge, and the plaintiff's prayers for instructions, as well as his exceptions, it appears that the theory upon which the case was tried is that of accord and satisfaction. This doctrine is recognized as a method of discharging a contract, or settling a cause of action arising either from a contract or a tort, by substituting for such contract or cause of action an agreement for the satisfaction thereof and an execution of such substituted agreement. 1 R. C. L. p. 177. Consolidated Statutes, § 895, provides:

"In all claims, or money demands, of whatever kind, and howsoever due, where an agreement is made and accepted for a less amount than that demanded or claimed to be due, in satisfaction thereof, the payment of the less amount according to such agreement in compromise of the whole is a full and complete discharge of the same."

[3, 4] The defendant testified, it is true, that the plaintiff was satisfied with the settlement, and that there was no dispute, but in addition the defendant said in substance that after considering the claims of each party he finally agreed to make payment in settlement of all matters; and it is somewhat difficult to conform all the evidence to the conclusion that the settlement was not in the nature of an accord and satisfaction. We are therefore unable to see how the plaintiff could have been prejudiced by the court's embodying in one issue the substance of the three issues tendered by the plaintiff. It is obvious that the question whether the defendant gave, and the plaintiff accepted, the checks in part payment or in full settlement, could easily have been presented under the issue submitted. In fact, this seems to have been one of the controverted questions: for the plaintiff distinctly testified that the checks were not accepted in final settlement, and that he thereafter made demand on the defendant for the remainder claimed to be due. If the issues are directed to the material facts arising upon the pleadings and afford an opportunity of presenting the various phases of the controversy, their number is a matter within the discretion of the court. Millikin v. Sessoms, 173 N. C. 723, 92 S. E. 359; Drennan v. Wilkes,

[5] Only a few of the exceptions to the admission and rejection of evidence require discussion. The plaintiff contends that the court erroneously excluded evidence offered by him for the purpose of showing in connection with the receipt and the first check what had and what had not been sold, and for the purpose of showing in connection with the second check that the words, "In full settlement," did not include all matters in controversy. We recognize the principle which under certain circumstances permits the introduction of parol evidence for the purpose referred to, as, for instance, in Long v. Guaranty Co., 178 N. C. 507, 101 S. E. 11; but we are of opinion that the principle is not applicable to the plaintiff's exceptions. The plaintiff accepted and collected both the checks and signed and delivered the receipt. There is no allegation in the pleadings that the plaintiff was induced by fraud, imposition, or mistake to accept the checks or to sign the receipt, and he is therefore bound by their terms. In view of the limitation in the first check of "payment in full to date," and in the receipt of "full settlement of all accounts and for all crops sold up to date," it is not unreasonable to assume that the plaintiff accepted the second check "in full settlement" of all matters in controversy (Kerr v. Sanders, 122 N. C. 638, 29 S. E. 943), and hence he "will not be permitted to collect the check and repudiate the condition" (Aydlett v. Brown, 153 N. C. 336, 69 S. E. 243; Cline v. Rudisill, 126 N. C. 524, 36 S. E. 36; Davis Co. v. Powers, 130 N. C. 153, 41 S. E. 6; Mercer v. Lumber Co., 173 N. C. 54, 91 S. E. 588).

We have carefully examined all the prayers for instructions, and find them untenable. The granting of some would have required the judge to invade the province of the jury, and the granting of others would have withdrawn the issue or directed an answer.

[6] In his honor's instructions to the jury we find no reversible error. Several of the exceptions relate to statements as to the contentions of the parties, and the court was not advised at the time of the plaintiff's objection. State v. Foster, 172 N. C. 960, 90 S. E. 785; McMillan v. Railroad, 172 N. C. 853, 90 S. E. 683; State v. Little, 174 N. C. 801, 94 S. E. 1.

[7] We are precluded from giving to a part of Mr. Bailey's interesting argument the consideration which ordinarily it would merit for the reason that it was based upon a theory distinct from and inconsistent with that upon which the case was tried before the jury. There is a uniform line of decisions which hold that after a party has elected to try his case on one theory in the lower court he may not be permitted to change his attitude with respect thereto on appeal. Brown v. Chemical Co., 165 N. C. 424, 81 S. E. 463; Lindsey v. Mitchell, 174 N. C. 459, 93 S. E. 955; Barcliff v. Railroad, 176 N. C. 41, 96 S. E. 644; King v. Railroad, 176 N. C. 306, 97 S. E. 29; Lipsitz v. Smith, 178 N. C. 100, 100 S. E. 247; Hill v. Director General of Railroads, 178 N. C. 612, 101 S. E. 376; Starr v. O'Quinn, 180 N. C. 94, 104 S. E. 66. All the plaintiff's exceptions are disallowed.

(182 N. C. 851)

STATE v. HAIRSTON. (No. 377.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 9, 1921.)

1. Homicide \S 167(8)—Evidence that defendant possessed a pistol held material.

In a prosecution for murder, reply of witness, when asked why he went to the scene of the shooting, that he went to see who was shooting, and that defendant and another were shooting, was material, where defendant stated that he did not have a pistol.

2. Homicide \S 169(2)—Evidence that deceased sheriff was rightfully on premises held material.

In a prosecution for murder, where a witness was asked why he, the deceased, a sheriff, and another approached the scene of shooting, his reply that the defendants had weapons and that they were going to take them away was material, as showing that the parties accompanied the sheriff in his attempt to prevent a general affray, and were rightly on the premises.

3. Homicide \S 339—Error in striking out evidence explaining flight held cured by its admission later and by charge to the jury.

In prosecution for murder, striking out the testimony of defendant that he fled from his home because he was warned that a mob was looking for him, if error, was cured by its admission later and by a charge that defendant fled because of being warned of danger from a mob.

4. Criminal law \S 351(3)—Flight of accused competent evidence.

Unexplained flight of the accused is competent evidence of guilt in a criminal prosecution.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stokes County; Finley, Judge.

Bunk Hairston was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. No error.

Wm. P. Bynum, of Greensboro, McMichael & Johnson, of Winston-Salem, and Folger, Jackson & Folger, of Mount Airy, for appellant.

James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WALKER, J. The defendant assigns only three errors on this appeal. Exceptions 1, 2, and 3. It appears that, on April 18, 1920, some dozen or fifteen negro men were congregated in and about a café and soft-drink stand of Nick Hairston in the village of Walnut Cove, when the firing of pistols attracted the attention of citizens of the town. Sheriff R. P. Joyce, taking with him Mr. Matthis and the witness Neal, went up to the stand. Neal was asked:

"Why did you men go there on this occasion? A. Well, there was some shooting going on around the back of the building, and I walked out to see who was doing the shooting, and it was Billy Covington and Bunk Hairston."

[1, 2] The defendant objected to this question and answer on the ground that they were immaterial and irrelevant. But the defendant Bunk Hairston denied that he had a pistol at all on that occasion, and certainly this evidence was material for this reason. Again the same witness, Neal, was asked:

"Why did you and Mr. Matthis and Sheriff Joyce come up later? A. Well, these boys had had their guns out, and we saw them and went to take the guns away from them."

It would seem that this evidence was very material, as showing that these parties, accompanying the sheriff in his attempt to prevent a general row, were rightly on the premises. As a matter of fact, both Sheriff Joyce and Mr. Matthis were killed inside the stand by pistol shots, and the defendant was being tried for the killing of the sheriff. There was direct evidence that the defendant, Bunk Hairston, fired the shot which killed the sheriff.

[3, 4] Defendant's exception 6, assignment of error 3, was taken under the following circumstances: The defendant, Bunk Hairston, was on the stand testifying in his own behalf, and said that he had no pistol over there, and nothing to do with the killing of Sheriff Joyce or of Mr. Matthis. After the killing he seems to have gone off, and was arrested about a mile from Walnut Cove. He testified further:

"I went home, was fixing to go to church that night, and while standing by the dresser combing my hair, my coat and hat off, a white man came to the window, tapped on it, and told me that I had better look out, that a mob was looking for me, and I had better leave."

Upon the state's objection, this evidence was stricken out, and defendant excepted. It is quite probable that the defendant was entitled to this testimony, and that the ruling of the judge, standing alone, upon that testimony may have been error. But it does not stand alone, because he expressly states on his cross-examination:

"I was afraid to stay at home. Somebody told me they were hunting for me. I was not at home when arrested."

Again, on redirect examination:

"I was afraid because some one told me that they were looking for me; that a mob had been made up, and I had better skin out. I heard the crowd, and it seemed like about 50 men. I then left. I was arrested about a mile from home."

In stating the contentions of defendant on this point, the judge charged the jury that when he left it was because he was informed that they were looking for him. He left for fear of being lynched, or receiving bodily harm, and not as a result of the consciousness of guilt. Thus the defendant had the full benefit of the evidence stricken out before, and the error, if one was committed at first in excluding the evidence, was corrected by permitting the same evidence to come in afterwards, or, at most, the error became harmless.

We have treated the testimony concerning what was said to the defendant at his home when he was preparing to go to church, as in the record, because it is afterwards referred to in the charge. This testimony, the subject of the fourth assignment of error, was offered for the purpose of explaining defendant's flight after the homicide. The defendant's objection to the exclusion of the evidence is based upon the fact that witnesses testified for the state, that the defendant fled immediately after the killing, offering this as some evidence of his guilt, and that he was apprehended near Dr. J. W. Slate's, about a mile from Walnut Cove, a day or two after the killing. In some way this testimony is not set out in the record, though it was offered by defendant and is referred to incidentally in the record and in the charge of the court, while stating the contentions of the state, viz.:

"The state contends that after the killing he fled, and the next day he was captured."

This was a proper reference on the part of his honor, because of the fact that this was a contention of the state, and evidence was offered on that point. The defendant contends that his honor erred in denying him the right to explain his flight, which, unexplained, has been held by the courts to be some evidence of the defendant's guilt, and fit to be considered by the jury. Defendant says it was therefore competent for him to state that after the killing he went home and was preparing to go to church and that while standing near the dresser he was warned of the approach of a mob, and it was on this account that he fled, and not from any realization of his guilt or fear of a trial.

But we have shown that he had the full benefit of the evidence, the same in substance, and this removes the error, or renders it innocuous. One's flight, wherever and whenever occurring, is generally offered by the state as an evidence of guilt, and unexplained is some evidence of it, and was particularly so in this case. The rule is clearly stated in Chamberlayne's Handbook on Evidence, § 559, beginning at bottom of page 423 and continuing on page 424, as follows:

"Prominent among relevant acts of the accused showing a consciousness of guilt is flight. Where the prosecution can show in a criminal case that the accused has become a fugitive from justice," such a fact can be considered on the question of his guilt.

And, further:

"Where one charged with crime, without good ground, departs from the jurisdiction shortly after the commission of the crime, with which he is charged, the circumstance may often be highly significant. The law of early times made flight conclusive evidence of guilt. Under the more rational system of later times, the fact of flight is merely a circumstance tending to establish consciousness of guilt. It is settled that the defendant may offer any relevant explanation of his act. The accused may, for example, allege, in explanation of his flight; that he was apprehensive of personal violence. The advice of friends may be assigned as the cause of fleeing from the jurisdiction, and, in all cases, the accused is entitled to prove by his own testimony the actual motive which has influenced his conduct."

The author cites the following cases: Webb v. Comm., 4 Ky. Law Rep. 436 (1882); Le-wallen v. State, 33 Tex. Cr. R. 412, 26 S. W. 832; 2 Chamb. Ev. 1399a, note 11; State v. Phillips, 24 Mo. 475; State v. McDevitt, 69 Iowa, 549, 29 N. W. 459; State v. Barham, 82 Mo. 67; People v. Cleveland, 107 Mich. 367, 65 N. W. 216; Sewell v. State, 76 Ga. 836; 2 Chamb. Ev. § 1399a, notes 8 and 9. To these may be added our own case of State v. Malonee, 154 N. C. 200, at page 203, 69 S. E. 786, and 12 Cyc. 610.

We said in the Malonee Case:

"While it is true, as contended by the defendant's counsel, that it was a circumstance from which, in connection with other circumstances, the jury might draw an inference of conscious guilt unless explained (12 Cyc. 610), the whole matter is for them to pass upon, and they must decide what weight they will give to the fact of flight, and, if there was explanatory evidence, to what extent it affects the probative force of the flight as a fact tending to show guilt. The entire charge is not set forth in the record, and we must assume, therefore, that it correctly stated the law of the case to the jury, in the absence of any showing to the contrary. We cannot condemn it by what was said in one or two detached portions, even if they are erroneous, because they may have been explained and corrected in other parts of the charge"—citing State v. Kinsauls, 126 N. C. 1097, 36 S. E. 81.

But we need not prolong the discussion as to this feature of the case, for we have already virtually disposed of this assignment of error by showing that, while the defendant was entitled to explain his flight, by showing the real cause of it—that is, fright—and not a sense of his guilt, upon the theory that the wicked flee when no man pursueth, he had the full benefit of his explanation subsequently, and this is all-sufficient.

We find no error that was committed at the trial, and none in the record.

No error.

TRANSOU v. DIRECTOR GENERAL OF RAILROADS, et al. (No. 354.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 9, 1921.)

1. Trial \S 165—Evidence considered in light most favorable to plaintiff on motion for nonsuit.

On motion for nonsuit, the evidence will be considered in its most favorable light for the plaintiff.

2. Master and servant \S 286(15)—Negligence as to brakeman on car passing platform truck held for jury.

In an action under O. S. § 160, for death of a brakeman, whose body was found beside train at a car ladder which had parts of broken platform truck hanging to it, the question whether the railroad was guilty of negligence contributing to his death held for the jury.

3. Railroads \S 5½, New, vol. 6A Key-No. Series—Not liable for injuries during federal control.

A railroad is not liable for injuries to servant sustained while the road was being operated by the Director General of Railroads.

Appeal from Superior Court, Forsyth County; Webb, Judge.

Action by F. M. Transou, administrator, against the Director General of Railroads, the Southern Railway Company, and another. Judgment of nonsuit as to named defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed as to the Southern Railway Company, and reversed as to the Director General of Railroads.

Plaintiff's intestate on the night of August 15, 1919, was brakeman on the Winston-Salem yards of the Southern Railway Company, which at that time was being operated by the Director General of Railroads.

Just north of Seventh street in Winston-Salem a switch track branched off from the main line of the railroad running south, and on the west side of this industrial track, as it was called, after it crossed Seventh street, was a woodyard building belonging to the defendant Hicks. This building was about 18 feet high. Beside the switch track for a part of the distance of this building is a platform several feet long and about 4 feet high that extended up to within 10 inches of passing trains. The part of the building where there was no platform stood about 5 feet from the track. Hicks' woodyard used a truck for hauling wood around the yard and carrying wood to load and unload cars. The truck was several feet long and 4 feet wide. For some months this truck was left at night, and during the day when not in use, on the platform and on the ground beside the track within 8 or 10 inches of passing cars, and was so placed for some time before the death of plaintiff's intestate.

There was a string of 12 cars on this industrial track, and at about 1 o'clock at night of August 15th the switch engine and crew were to get out 2 of these cars. The engine backed in, coupled up to this string of cars, pulled out, and cut the twelfth car down the main line. The train was to then back into the switch with 11 cars remaining. Plaintiff's intestate was ordered by the conductor in charge to set the brakes on the car placed on the main line and to come over and catch the backing train on the switch track, and get on top, give, receive, and pass signals to the engineman. There was no light on lead end of backing cars, though all members of the train crew had lanterns and it was a clear night. The ladders going to the top of all box cars at the front end as the cars were backing in were on the west side next to the woodyard building.

The deceased set the brakes on the car on the main line, and the train backed into the switch track. The truck was caught by a ladder of the backing train, torn to pieces, and parts of the broken truck were scattered along the track for 15 or 20 feet. The top of the platform at one place was torn up, and the deceased was found on the ground beside the train, right at a car ladder that had parts of this broken truck hanging to it. His clothes were torn to pieces, his legs, arms, head, and entire body bruised and broken, and he was covered with blood.

At the close of plaintiff's evidence, the court entered judgment of nonsuit as to the Director General of Railroads and the Southern Railway Company, and from this ruling plaintiff appealed.

Raymond G. Parker and J. C. Wallace, both of Winston-Salem, for appellant.

Manly, Hendren & Womble, of Winston-Salem, for appellees.

STACY, J. [1, 2] Considering the evidence in its most favorable light for the plaintiff, the accepted position on a motion to nonsuit, we think the case should have been submitted to the jury. True, no one testified with exactness as to how the deceased met his death. But the objective and physical facts speak louder than witnesses. Can there be any doubt of the truth of the allegation that the moving train, the demolished truck, and the torn up platform all played a part in producing the injury which resulted in Transou's death? It would seem that an affirmative answer might be entirely permissible, and not altogether unlikely. At least such is a reasonable inference arising from the attendant conditions and surrounding circumstances. Maybe the jury will take a different view of the matter, and maybe not. At any rate, upon the record—it appearing that the deceased was at the time engaged in the discharge of his duties as a brakeman—we think the question of liability is one for the jury under proper instructions from the court. But, of course, we express no opinion as to how it should be found. Southern Ry. Co. v. Diseker, 13 Ga. App. 799, 81 S. E. 269.

In Brown v. Missouri, K. & T. Ry. Co., 201 Mo. App. 316, 212 S. W. 27, a case somewhat similar to the one at bar, the Supreme Court of Missouri states the law as follows:

"Railroad companies will not be held to have exercised ordinary care to provide reasonably safe conditions for their employees to do their work when they permit standpipes, telegraph poles, fences, buildings, and other structures to be maintained so close to their tracks that employees being on the outside of their moving cars or engines, in the performance of their duties, are crushed by them" —and to which should be added, unless due care is used and proper means are employed to prevent such injuries.

To like effect are our own decisions. Heilig v. Railroad, 152 N. C. 469, 67 S. E. 1009; Williams v. Railroad, 168 N. C. 363, 84 S. E. 408, and cases there cited. The question has been so fully discussed in Williams v. Railroad that we deem it unnecessary to repeat here what has so recently been said there. See, also, Virginian Ry. Co. v. Halstead, 258 Fed. 428, 169 C. C. A. 444, and Sanderson v. Boston & M. R. R., 91 Vt. 419, 101 Atl. 40, cases directly in point.

With the case going back for a new trial, we refrain from further discussion, as we do not wish to prejudice the rights of any of the parties.

[3] The judgment of nonsuit as to the Southern Railway Company will be sustained under authority of the recent decision of the United States Supreme Court in Mo. Pac. R. R. Co. v. Ault, decided June 1, 1921, 256 U. S. —, 41 Sup. Ct. 593, 65 L. Ed. —. But as to the Director General of Railroads the judgment will be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

Affirmed as to the Southern Railway Company.

Reversed as to the Director General of Railroads.

WELLS et al. v. CRUMPLER et al.

SAME v. HART et al.

(No. 283.)

1. Trusts ⇐191(2) — Declaration of trust held to contain power of sale.

Where title to land was taken in the name of one of two persons who both contributed toward the purchase price, the purchase being for the purpose of resale, and the grantee executed a declaration of trust in favor of the other, held that the declaration gave a power of sale to be exercised by the grantee.

2. Estoppel ⇐83(3)—When failure to assert rights, estops one stated.

Where a party, having or claiming a right, abandons it, or fails to assert it when he should, and induces another to believe it does not exist, or that it is abandoned, and, acting on such conduct, as it was intended he should, he is induced to do something whereby he will be prejudiced if the first party is permitted to recall what he has done, equity will protect the party thus misled, and will forbid the assertion of the former right.

3. Trusts ⇐191(3)—Property may be conveyed in trust for sale by trustee under duty to sell.

Property may be conveyed to a trustee in trust for sale, and it is not only the right of the trustee, but his duty, to sell if and when the terms of the power authorize it.

4. Trusts ⇐192—Trustee justified in selling if cestui que trust concurs in desiring it.

Where title to land was taken in the name of one of two persons, both of whom contributed to the purchase price, and the grantee executed a declaration of trust in favor of the other, the purpose of the purchase being to resell, and the grantee subsequently sold the property, even if the sale was not a strict performance of the trust it was justified where the other person, being the only other one having an interest, concurred with the trustee in desiring it.

5. Trusts ⇐61(3)—Equitable interest in land held surrendered.

Where title to land purchased for resale was taken in the name of one of two persons, both of whom contributed toward the cash payment, the grantee executing a mortgage for the balance, whatever equitable interest the other party to the venture had held surrendered by him when he failed to help carry the property and informed the title holder that he could do with the property as he saw fit.

6. Deeds ⇐93—To be construed to effectuate intention of parties.

Deeds and other writings are to be construed so as to effectuate the intention of the parties as ascertained from the language of the instrument.

7. Trusts ⇐17, 18(6)—Written trust to sell land held not within statute of frauds.

Where title to land purchased for resale was taken in the name of one of two persons who both contributed toward the purchase price, and the grantee executed a declaration of trust in favor of the other, reciting an intention to divide profits, and subsequently sold the property, the other not joining in the deed, held that the contract to sell and divide profits was not within the statute of frauds, and that a joinder in the deed was not necessary.

Appeal from Superior Court, New Hanover County; Kerr, Judge.

Action by Percy Wells and others against W. B. Crumpler, B. F. King, Jr., and others, and by the same plaintiffs against Godfrey Hart, B. F. King, Jr., and another. Cases consolidated, and from a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant B. F. King, Jr., appeals. No error.

This appeal is prosecuted by one of the defendants, B. F. King, Jr., from a judgment for plaintiffs in two cases, which were consolidated and tried together by consent of counsel and order of the court.

The two cases were brought by the above-named plaintiffs, one against W. B. Crumpler and Ira Scott, partners trading as Crumpler & Scott, and B. F. King, Jr., and D. R. Foster, and the other by the same plaintiffs against Godfrey Hart, D. R. Foster, and B. F. King, Jr.

The purpose of both actions was the same, and was to have the court declare that the plaintiffs were the owners and entitled to convey the property, which had been conveyed to them by the defendant D. R. Foster, freed from any trust or other claim of B. F. King, Jr., and to compel the defendants Crumpler & Scott and Godfrey Hart to accept a deed and pay the purchase price of that portion of the property purchased by each respectively, and which each had declined to take and pay for on account of an alleged claim by the defendant B. F. King, Jr.; or alternately to make the defendant D. R. Foster liable on his covenants.

To better understand the case it is necessary to make a short recital of the facts: D. R. Foster was engaged in the real estate business in Wilmington, and B. F. King, Jr., was working for him, and, at the instance of said King, and upon his assurance that he had already secured purchasers for the property, the said Foster purchased, on the 16th day of July, 1912, the tract of land, the title to which is in controversy, from A. D. Westsell and wife for the sum of $28,000, of which $6,000 was paid in cash—$1,000 by B. F. King, Jr., and $5,000 by D. R. Foster, who gave his note to the vendors for the sum of $20,000, with interest, payable two years after date, secured by mortgage upon the property for the deferred payments. At the same time D. R. Foster executed and had recorded in the office of the register of deeds of New Hanover county, the following paper writing:

"To B. F. King, Jr., or his assigns. This is to declare that I, D. R. Foster, hold in trust for B. F. King, Jr., or his assigns an undivided one-half interest in the property on South Front street, described in a deed to me from A. D. Wessell, Sr., and wife. We have purchased the property jointly at the price of $26,000.00. I have executed a mortgage for $20,000.00 thereon and have advanced $5,000.00 in cash; King has advanced the balance of $1,000.00. The property is to be sold by us, and after the above cash advances are repaid, the net profits shall be divided equally, loss and expense shall be borne equally.

"In the event of my death or inability, I hereby appoint B. F. King, Jr., or the assignee whom he shall appoint, to execute proper conveyance and otherwise carry out the trust.

"Witness my hand and seal this 16th day of July, 1912.

"D. R. Foster [Seal.]"

The debt secured by the mortgage on this property was not paid, and the land was advertised and sold by the mortgagee, Wessell, and bid off, and a deed taken for it, by Foster, who erroneously thought he thereby became the sole owner of the property, freed from any trust or obligation which might have been created by the above-quoted paper writing; but Foster at the same time offered to allow the said B. F. King, Jr., to retain his one-half interest in the profits on a resale if he would put up $500 to help carry the loan, and this King at first promised, but found himself unable to do, and finally told Foster that he was unable to raise the money and would claim no further interest in the property, and that he could sell it or dispose of it as he saw fit.

The defendant Foster was unable to sell the property, and was compelled to carry it unaided and at considerable expense in the way of insurance, taxes, and repairs, until the rise in price which took place generally in 1918, and on the 14th day of May, 1918, sold and conveyed the property to the plaintiffs for the sum of $30,000, which the verdict finds to be the best price he could obtain, and that the sale was bona fide.

Plaintiffs caused this property to be subdivided into lots, and put up the same and sold them by public auction in the year 1920, and the defendants W. B. Crumpler and Ira Scott became the purchasers of one portion of the property, and the defendant Godfrey Hart of another portion. After the sale by plaintiffs, King made claim to an interest in the property or the profits on these sales, arising out of the paper writing dated July 16, 1912; and Crumpler and Scott and Hart declined to accept deeds and pay the purchase money. Plaintiffs thereupon brought these suits as hereinabove referred to.

The answer of the defendants Crumpler & Scott set up the fact that they are willing to take the property, but that plaintiffs cannot convey a good and indefeasible title free from trusts, etc., because B. F. King, Jr., claims an interest therein; the defendant Godfrey Hart, in his answer, denies that plaintiffs had, and could convey, a good and indefeasible title in fee simple for the same reason; the defendant B. F. King, Jr., in his answer, claims that he was half owner of the property at the time that it was sold by plaintiffs to the defendants Crumpler & Scott and Godfrey Hart, but is willing to affirm the sale to them on condition that he is paid one-half the net profits of the purchase and sale of the property.

The cases were consolidated and tried together before a jury upon the issues set out in the record, and resulted in a finding that King had no interest, by way of trust or otherwise, in said property, and was not entitled to any profits upon a just accounting between him and the defendant D. R. Foster.

The issues as submitted to the jury, with the answers thereto, were as follows:

"(1) Did the defendant, B. F. King, Jr., assent to the sale of the Wessell property, by the defendant Foster? Ans. Yes.

"(2) Did the defendant Foster make a bona fide sale of the property for the best price which he could obtain? Ans. Yes.

"(3) What amount, if anything, is due from the defendant Foster to the defendant B. F. King, Jr., upon a fair and equitable accounting of the purchase and sale of the Wessell property? Ans. Nothing.

"(4) What amount, if anything, is due from the defendant B. F. King, Jr., to the defendant Foster upon a fair and equitable accounting of the purchase of the Wessell property? Ans. Nothing."

From this judgment the defendants Crumpler & Scott noted an appeal, as did also the defendant Godfrey Hart, but their appeals have been abandoned, and this appeal involves only the claim of B. F. King, Jr.

The defendants, B. F. King, Jr., and Crumpler & Scott and Godfrey Hart, insisted that the deed from Wessell and wife to D. R. Foster, dated in 1912, together with the declaration of D. R. Foster hereinbefore recited, constituted Foster a trustee for themselves (Crumpler & Scott and King), as beneficiaries, and this was freely admitted by the defendant Foster, and not controverted by the plaintiffs. But the defendant King insisted, through his counsel, that he is the equitable owner of a one-half interest in the property, and that his equitable estate, or interest in the property, could not be conveyed, terminated, or otherwise disposed of otherwise than by a formal deed of conveyance by him or by some act or conduct of his which would operate as an estoppel, and he denied that there was any such thing, and that he still owned the said interest.

On the other hand, the defendant Foster contended, and a perusal of the record will show that the jury decided, that the property was purchased by Foster from Wessell at the instance of King, to be resold and the profits or losses divided equally. And this view of the case was concurred in by the plaintiffs and adopted by the court. So the whole controversy turns upon the simple point whether the interest of B. F. King, Jr., could be transferred, terminated, or disposed of by a deed from Foster, the grantee and trustee, to a purchaser by and with the assent of King, expressed by word or conduct, or whether King must join in the deed.

The assignments of error state, and restate variously and somewhat redundantly, the actual basis for a recovery on which B. F. King, Jr., relied in the court below, and which is clearly, and sufficiently expressed in the second, sixth, and seventh assignments of error, the seemingly unavoidable repetition being thought necessary to emphasize and clarify his main contention. Those are as follows:

"Second. That the court erred in allowing and permitting the plaintiffs to ask and have Mr. Foster to testify to what he (Foster) said was the exact contract and agreement he had with King regarding the handling and the sale of the property, the title to which is in dispute, as shown by the defendant's second exception, for the reason that it appears that the agreement was in writing under seal, signed and recorded, and that as a matter of law, after the said agreement was entered into, the defendant, B. F. King, Jr., could not convey his interest, or lose his rights in the property, or be cut off from his interest therein, by parol, or oral statement, or without a valuable consideration.

"Sixth. That the court erred in allowing the plaintiffs to ask the witness Foster, 'Now state to his honor and the jury what authority he gave you to sell, and his abandonment of the agreement, if any?' and have the witness answer the same, as shown by the defendant's eighth and ninth exceptions.

"Seventh. That the court erred in allowing and permitting the plaintiffs and the defendant Foster to offer any evidence of the witness Meredith, which in any way tended to cut off the interest of B. F. King, Jr., in the property by parol declaration, as shown by the defendant's tenth exception."

On the trial counsel for Foster and for the plaintiffs admitted that Foster did not relieve himself of the trust, as he at the time erroneously supposed that he did, by purchasing the property at the mortgage sale of Wessell; and they further admitted that by the sale of the property by Foster to the plaintiffs with the concurrence of King the latter was still entitled to one-half of the net profits made, and was obliged to pay one-half of the net loss, if there should be a loss. As said above, this view of the matter was adopted by the presiding judge, and the case was tried on that theory. The jury found by the answer to the third issue that on a just accounting, after making proper deductions, there were no profits and Foster owed King nothing. Judgment upon the verdict, and the defendant B. F. King, Jr., having reserved exceptions, appealed to this court and assigned errors.

Herbert McClammy, of Wilmington, for plaintiffs.

E. K. Bryan and J. C. King, both of Wilmington, for appellant King.

Rountree & Carr, of Wilmington (Geo. Rountree, of Wilmington, of counsel), for appellee Foster.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). The decision of this appeal must turn largely upon the construction, or meaning, of the trust declared by D. R. Foster in the writing dated July 16, 1912. If D. R. Foster purchased the property in his own name for no other purpose than that of a resale by him and a division of the net proceeds of such sale between him and B. F. King, Jr., there can hardly be any doubt that the trial proceeded correctly in the court below, but the defendant King contends that by that instrument an equitable estate was vested in him as to an undivided one-half of the land, and that the sale thereof was to be made jointly by Foster and himself, and consequently that the statute of frauds applied, and that no valid sale, or transfer, of his half interest, or estate, in the land could be made without his joinder in the deed, or other written instrument of conveyance. We cannot concur entirely in this view. The title was validly in Foster, who bought at the Wessell sale, the deed having been made to him alone, with a declaration of trust, as contained in the writing of July 16, 1912. It appears therefrom that Foster paid $5,000 on the purchase price of $28,000 and King $1,000, but the latter was to pay Foster $500 more to help him carry the loan, for which consideration Foster agreed that King might still enjoy the right to share with him in the net profits realized by a resale of the land, according to their prior agreement. But King did not comply with his part of this offer to let him in, so that he might participate in the net profits gained upon a resale of the property, and there is ample evidence to support the finding that B. F. King, Jr., finding that he was unable to carry out his part of the bargain, voluntarily and deliberately waived and abandoned his right thus to share in the proceeds of a resale, the consideration of which was that Foster should assume, and was compelled to assume, and pay King's share of the purchase price, and was otherwise forced to assume the burdens and inconveniences which in law and in equity rested solely upon King. There can be no question as to the sufficiency of the consideration, and King's claim might, perhaps, be otherwise met and overthrown by a resort to the principle of equitable estoppel. He should be thankful that he has been voluntarily let in by Foster at all to enjoy the fruits of the resale, instead of imputing bad motives or conduct to him. He has been treated considerably and even generously in the matter.

There seems to have been but one motive in the purchase of this property, which was to hold the same securely for resale, and, stripping the entire case of all irrelevant matter, it narrows itself down to the one pivotal thought in the mind of the defendant King, and that was, How much can I get out of it? King admits that the property was purchased for a resale, and admits that it was purchased for the purpose of making a quick return, for the evidence discloses a statement by him to the defendant Foster that he had the property as good as sold, or already sold, at least as to one half of it, with a good prospect for the sale of the other half, within 30 or 60 days. This was partly the consideration that moved Foster to buy, or to enter into the deal. When the title passed out of Wessell to Foster, and the sale was not made, as King had represented would be done, and King had surrendered all his right, Foster carried the burden, and, in order to protect himself, had to mortgage other property of his own to prevent the loss of the $5,000 that he had paid on the first installment. Foster's and Meredith's evidence discloses what was done so that Foster might hold the property until the final sale.

[1] There is little room for contention against the existence of a power of sale, residing in Foster, to sell the land he had bought at the Wessell sale. It is implied from the very language of the instrument itself, if not expressly given, and this is demonstrably so, without calling in aid any of the parol evidence. Counsel v. Averett, 95 N. C. 131; Maxwell v. Barringer, 110 N. C. 76, 14 S. E. 516, 28 Am. St. Rep. 668. But even if there was no express power contained in the writing, it could be shown by parol, either that there was such a power, or it could be implied from King's conduct, creating an estoppel upon him.

[2] We cannot imagine a case where the doctrine of equitable estoppel could more justly have been applied than to this one. Where a party who has or claims a right either openly and unequivocally abandons it or does not assert it when he should do so, and induces another by his silence or conduct to believe that the right does not exist, or that he makes no claim to it if he has it, and abandons and surrenders it, and the other party acts upon such conduct as it was intended that he should do, and is induced thereby to do something by which he will be prejudiced if the party who so acted is permitted to recall what he has done, equity steps in and protects the party thus misled to his prejudice, and will forbid the other to speak and assert his former right, when every principle of good faith and fair dealing requires, and even demands, that he should be silent. Faw v. Whittington, 72 N. C. at page 324, where Justice Bynum says for the court:

"Such a renunciation, however, would seem to operate, not as passing an estate or interest in land, which cannot be done strictly under the act without writing, but to operate as an equitable estoppel on the vendee to assert a claim to specific performance, where his conduct has misled the vendor intentionally."

Let us a little more definitely state the real pith of the controversy, and incidentally the reasons advanced in support of B. F. King's position. It would seem that the pivotal question upon which this case must turn and be decided is stated in the latter part of the second assignment of error, appearing in our statement of the case, which is as follows:

"After the said agreement was entered into, the defendant B. F. King, Jr., could not convey his interest therein by parol, or oral statement, and without a valuable consideration."

This embraces fully all that can be said in his behalf, and his learned counsel have lost nothing of its strength by condensing it in the clear-cut paragraph of the assignment above quoted. If the court was correct in its rulings upon this question, then all of its rulings on testimony must necessarily be sound, because the testimony was offered and received to explain the circumstances of the original purchase and throw light upon the meaning of the declaration of trust, and, in addition to that, was offered and accepted for the purpose of showing that the defendant King had surrendered and abandoned all interest in the property and consented to its sale by Foster.

We will defer, for the moment, further discussion of the statute of frauds in its relation to this case. So the question comes back to this: What was the nature of the trust declared by Foster in favor of King, what was its purpose and how could it be executed?

As stated above, the defendant King contends that he could not divest himself of whatever interest he had in the property or its proceeds, save by a deed of conveyance. Is this so? The defendant Foster held the property upon trust to sell it and divide the proceeds equally between himself and King. It was not a naked trust, but a trust coupled with an express power to sell and an interest of his own; and, although it is admitted that the sale could not be made without the assent of King, expressed or implied, that assent might be expressed orally or implied by conduct. As a matter of fact, it is a common transaction, and business men naturally assume that when property is conveyed to one person, on speculation, for resale for the benefit of himself and another, both can orally assent to the sale. Indeed this is the primary meaning of the words of the declaration:

"The property is to be sold by us, and after the above cash advances are repaid, the net profits shall be divided equally, loss and expense shall be borne equally."

This language clearly does not mean that King was to join in the deed with Foster, because Foster alone holds the legal title, and it was so intended. The contention of Foster then is that the sale to the plaintiff conveyed a good title, free from all equities, and whatever rights the defendant King had were transferred to the proceeds; and this for the following reasons:

First. The defendant Foster held the property in trust to be sold by himself and King, and when the sale was made by the consent or concurrence of King this was a strict performance of the trust and an execution of the power of sale therein contained.

Second. That even if the sale to the plaintiffs was a breach of trust—that is, was not a strict compliance with the declaration of trust by Foster—yet the assent, however, testified to by King, ratifies the breach and makes the transfer valid.

Third. That even if the trust was not a trust for sale, but an equitable estate in the property, which could not be transferred by parol, yet whatever interest King had might have been abandoned by him without a deed.

We will consider briefly each of these propositions because they seem to us to be almost self-evident, and if either one of them is sound the sale to the plaintiffs was valid, and the only claim arising from said sale in favor of the defendant King is to share whatever net profits or losses there may have been arising out of the original purchase for $26,000 and the subsequent sale to plaintiffs for $30,000 and the latter conclusion seems to be conceded by King.

[3] 1. It is elementary that property may be conveyed to a trustee in trust for sale, and that it is not only the right of the trustee, but his duty, to sell if and when the terms of the power authorize it. 19 Am. St. Rep. note, page 271, at bottom; 39 Cyc. 335; 28 Ency. of Law, p. 996; Flint's Lewin on Trusts, star page 424; In re Bedingfeld & Herring's Contract (1893), 2 Ch. 332; Eakle v. Ingram, 100 Am. St. Rep. note p. 102.

In this case, as we have said and reiterated, it is clear to our minds that the purpose was for Foster to sell the property whenever he and King found a purchaser, and indeed it was understood in the beginning that King had already found a purchaser, and the sale to Foster was merely a means or process of transferring the property from the original vendor Wessell to the purchaser, by and with the consent of both Foster and King, and dividing the profits. This consent, the jury decided, after full hearing, King gave.

[4] 2. But even if the sale by Foster to the plaintiffs was not a strict performance of the trust and an execution of the power therein contained, he was justified in making the sale if the only other person having an interest in the property concurred with him in desiring it.

This proposition is clearly stated by Mr. Maitland, who is generally regarded as one of the great law-writers of the last quarter century, in his book on "Equity" (Ed. 1909), at page 106. The doctrine is well stated in Butterfield v. Cowing, 112 N. Y. 486, 20 N. E. 369, by Judge Danforth, as follows:

"The strength of the plaintiff's case is in the doctrine which governs the relation of trustee and cestui que trust. Assuming, as, in view of our former decision, we must, that there would have been responsibility on the part of the trustee in omitting to follow the terms of the mortgage by which he undertook to be bound, and that his dealing with the other defendant was a violation of those terms, it was possible for the plaintiff to absolve both the trustee and the other defendant from liability, either by acquiescing in the consummation of that transaction or by a positive adoption of it. Here there was both. * * * It is quite clear that no cestui que trust can allege that to be a breach of trust which has been done under his own sanction, whether by previous consent or subsequent ratification. The general rule is that, either concurrence in the act, or acquiescence without original concurrence, will release the trustees. And there are no circumstances to make the plaintiff's case an exception. Whatever the trustee did which might otherwise have been found the subject of just complaint was done by the assent and sanction of the plaintiff."

See, also, Pomeroy, Equity Jurisprudence, § 1083, last sentence. The jury, as we have before stated, have found that King authorized or concurred in Foster's act.

[5] 3. Whatever equitable interest King had in the property was given up, surrendered or abandoned by him when he refused or failed to help carry the property longer, and informed Foster that he could do nothing further, and that he could go on and sell the property, as testified by Foster and Meredith and found by the jury.

In Gorrell v. Alspaugh, 120 N. C. 362, 27 S. E. 85, Alspaugh sold land to Hine, and the latter then executed a bond for title to Alspaugh for the land, upon payment of certain loans evidenced by notes. Alspaugh could not pay these notes, and surrendered them to Hine. Subsequently Alspaugh's creditors sued him and attempted to reach this property. It was claimed that Alspaugh had no interest in it, but the property belonged to Hine. It was held that:

"While an equitable interest in land may not be transferred by parol, it may be abandoned or released to the holder of the legal title by matter in pais, provided such intention is clearly shown; hence the settlement made in 1894 between H. and A., being in good faith, extinguished A.'s equitable right, and vested in H. a fee-simple title."

In Lewis v. Gay, 151 N. C. 168, 170, 65 S. E. 907, 908, the court says: "Parties . . . may by parol rescind, or by matter in pais abandon" rights in land. See, also, May v. Getty, 140 N. C. 310, 53 S. E. 75; Burns v. McFarland, 146 N. C. 382, 59 S. E. 1011; Matthews v. Thompson, 186 Mass. 14, 71 N. E. 93, 66 L. R. A. 421, 104 Am. St. Rep. 550; Miller v. Pierce, 104 N. C. 389, 10 S. E. 554; and Faw v. Whittington, 72 N. C. 321, where Justice Bynum explains this principle with great clearness and accuracy.

There was ample consideration, as we have above shown, for the abandonment or surrender of this contract or interest in the property by King. The situation was this: King had induced Foster to purchase this property for the purpose of being resold, and, relying upon King, Foster had done so; they were unable to sell, and it became an onerous burden to carry the property, and at the end of two years Wessell was pressing for the payment of his mortgage, and, although repeatedly requested, King would do nothing to help Foster. Wessell agreed, however, that if they would raise $4,000 he would not foreclose, and Foster told King that if he would raise $500 of this amount he would raise the balance, and they could carry the loan on the property until better times came. This King failed to do, and told Foster that he could do nothing further and to let it go. Then it was foreclosed, and Foster became the purchaser, and himself raised $4,000 and gave a mortgage for $18,000.

Foster again offered to recognize the trust and to let King have his original share in the profits, in the event anything was made on the sale of the land, if he would raise $500, within six months, and this King thought he could do and promised to do. Foster, thinking it was necessary to put this agreement on the records, had it, by the consent of King, written on the margin of the records, and King promised to sign it, but failed to do so. Foster continued to press King to put up the $500 to enable him to carry this loan from Wessell, which was secured by a mortgage on the property, and King kept promising, but finally told Foster that he could not raise any money to help, and that he could go on and dispose of the property as he saw fit, and that he hoped he would make something out of it. (This is shown by Foster's testimony, to be found in the record).

In this connection, King also told Meredith, who was then working with Foster, that he (King), who had been and for some time theretofore ceased working with Foster, had left with Foster a souvenir in the shape of this purchase. Meredith also says that after King left Foster he often met King on the street, and he would ask if the Wessell property had been sold, and when he answered no, he would say, "I don't see why you don't sell it," and I suggested that he try to sell it himself, to which he replied something like this, that he had left a souvenir with Foster so that he could remember his days with him while he was there. King stated that he left a souvenir with Foster that would stay with him. King told me that he could not raise anything, and that he was out of it. (This appears by Meredith's testimony, in the record.) Foster was compelled to assume the burden and carry the property upon his own shoulders because King not only would not help, but left the country.

If we are correct in the foregoing view (and we undoubtedly believe it to be the true one), assignments of error, which challenge the correctness of the court's rulings upon evidence, both in admitting and rejecting it, are unsound because the evidence was offered and received merely for the purpose of showing what the actual situation was, and what the conduct of all the parties to it was. The law permits some latitude in such cases.

This includes all assignments of error down to the tenth. The tenth assignment is unsound for the same reason, as is also the eleventh.

The twelfth assignment cannot be sustained, because the proposition therein contained was admitted by the counsel for Foster and plaintiffs and adopted by the court, who charged the jury that Foster had not divested himself of the trust by his purchase at the foreclosure sale.

The thirteenth and fourteenth assignments were given in the general charge, so far as they were proper.

The fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth assignments of error are untenable for the reasons we have already stated.

So far as the eighteenth assignment is concerned, it lays down a rule of law correctly, but it is inapplicable to the case. We believe, and the jury so found, that Foster and King did both assent to the sale by Foster to the plaintiffs.

As to the nineteenth assignment of error, the general charge of the court to the jury contained all on this subject to which the defendant King was entitled, because the court charged that the purchase by Foster at the foreclosure sale did not divest King of his rights, and that he still had the right to share equally in whatever profits were made upon the sale, but was also under obligation to pay one-half of the expenses incurred in the maintenance of the property, and that the jury found upon sufficient testimony, in answer to the third issue, that there was nothing due to King under a just accounting because the maintenance, upkeep, taxes, etc., of the property exceeded the rents which could be, and were, obtained by Foster by more than $2,000.

As to the twentieth assignment of error, in the statement of the record, it is manifest that the court could not have given this charge.

The twenty-first assignment of error. This assignment is a mere repetition of those discussed in the earlier portion of this opinion, and will not again be considered. The third paragraph of that assignment cannot be established as a matter of fact. We cannot agree that the court did what is stated in this assignment, but, on the contrary, the learned judge permitted the jury to find, not only from King's own language, but from his conduct, that he had abandoned whatever equity he might have had. The remaining part of this assignment is without merit, in law and in fact.

The twenty-second assignment of error is but a repetition of the same proposition, already fully discussed.

[6] We promised to revert to the question as to the statute of frauds. In this case there was no contract to convey land, or any interest therein, as between Foster and King, the precise agreement was (excluding all other questions which justify Foster's action) that the land should be sold to some third person, and the net proceeds divided. Foster had the legal title, which he held for the purpose of executing the trust imposed upon it by the written stipulation. It is spoken of therein as an undivided one-half interest in the property held in trust by Foster for King, and that "the property is to be sold by us" (them), that is, Foster and King; but it all plainly means, when the context is considered, that the property was bought at the sale on joint account, and solely for the purpose recited therein, which is, that it should be resold to make what profit there was in the venture, and sold too by Foster the trustee. It is again recited in the instrument that Foster had mortgaged the land, in his own name as mortgagor, for $20,000, and advanced $5,000 in cash, and King the balance of $1,000, and that they were to divide equally the net profits of a resale. There was no objection by King to Foster's mortgaging the property in his own name. The entire instrument, when taken and considered within its four corners, shows conclusively what the parties meant, and that their only intention was that Foster should hold the land in trust to carry out their design of selling the land for the profit that was in it, and there was no thought that Foster should even convey one-half of the estate to King, but that the latter should have one-half of the net profits, "loss and expense to be borne equally." Foster "held it in trust" for the consummation of the joint venture and for no other purpose, and no one of the interested persons was justified in thinking that King had any other right in the transaction. Deeds and other writings are to be construed so as to effectuate the intentions of the parties, as that is ascertained from the language of the instrument. Gudger v. White, 141 N. C. 507, 54 S. E. 386; Triplett v. Williams, 149 N. C. 394, 63 S. E. 79, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 514; Kea v. Robeson, 39 N. C. 427; and especially Id., 40 N. C. 373. In Gudger v. White, supra, it was held, referring to what had been said in prior cases:

"Courts are always desirous of giving effect to instruments according to the intention of the parties, so far as the law will allow. It is so just and reasonable that it should be so, that it has long grown into a maxim that favorable constructions are put on deeds. * * * Words shall always operate according to the intention of the parties, if by law they may, and, if they cannot operate in one form, they shall operate in that which by law shall effectuate the intention. This is the more just and rational mode of expounding a deed, for, if the intention cannot be ascertained, the rigorous rule is resorted to, from the necessity of taking the deed most strongly against the grantor"—citing Kea v. Robeson, supra; Rowland v. Rowland, 93 N. C. 214; Campbell v. McArthur, 9 N. C. 38, 11 Am. Dec. 738; Ritter v. Barrett, 20 N. C. (Anno.) 286.

"Intentio inservire, debet legibus, non legis intentioni," and as far as it may stand with the rule of law it is honorable for all judges to judge according to the intentions of the parties, and so they ought to do (1 Coke, p. 19), and Justice Blackstone in the rules of interpretation laid down by him (vol. 2, p. 286), says: "That the construction be made upon the entire deed, and not merely upon the disjointed parts of it. Nam ex antecedentibus, et consequentibus fit optima interpretatio, and therefore that every part of it (if possible) be made to take effect, and no word but what may operate in some shape or other. Nam verba debent intelligi cum effectæ et res magis valeat quam pareat." And in Jackson v. Blodgett, 16 Johnson, 172, the same rule is announced, "That the construction must be made on the entire instrument, after looking, as the phrase is, at the four corners of it." See, also, 2 Smith's Leading Cases, 466, where numerous authorities are cited upon the subject."

that the case, so far as respects the statute of frauds, falls within the principle of Michael v. Foil, 100 N. C. 178, at page 188, 6 S. E. 264, at page 268 (6 Am. St. Rep. 577), where a similar agreement was made, and it was held that a contract to sell land and divide the profits was not within the statute. Manning v. Jones, 44 N. C. 368. Justice Davis says in Michael v. Foil, supra:

"In Trowbridge v. Wetherbee, 11 Allen's Mass. Rep. 361, it is said that a parol promise to pay to another a portion of the profits made by a promisor on the purchase and sale of real estate is not within the statute of frauds, and may be proved by parol. See, also, Sherrill v. Hagan, 92 N. C. 345."

We have, at this term, in Newby and Weeks v. A. C. Realty Co., 182 N. C. —, 182 S. E. 323, discussed fully this question, as to the application of the statute of frauds to agreements of this kind, and we there held that the statute had no application whatever. Our language was this:

"The parties contracted with reference to the profits to be realized upon a resale of the land, and not with the view of acquiring title to any part of the land. They already had the title, and the land itself was to be held in trust, for the purpose of realizing the profits by another sale of it."

No further comment is required.

That King expected Foster to sell the land by himself, and without the joinder of Foster, can well be inferred from the last paragraph but one of the written agreement dated July 16, 1912, where Foster designates King to act if Foster should die before consummating the matter, or bringing it to a final conclusion. Besides, it appears, as we have already stated in a former part of this opinion, that King was willing to affirm the sale if he is allowed one-half of the net proceeds, and, whether he so expressly agreed or not, his words and conduct plainly demonstrate that it was all he expected to be done. There is no way of looking at the case that does not disclose that in any event the sale was to be valid, even if he had a legal or equitable estate in the land, and was legally entitled to join in the sale of it. Judged by his own conduct throughout the course of his dealing with Foster, as to the land and its sale, his case is cut up by the roots.

The defendant Foster agreed to let King come in and share in the net profits of sale, but the jury have found that upon a fair and just accounting, when he is charged with his part of the costs and expenses and what he agreed to contribute, there will be nothing left for him. Foster was generous towards him in agreeing to account to him, when he had clearly given up and abandoned his former right, but, however this may be, the jury have settled the matter against him after he has had a fair opportunity to be heard, and has been fully heard upon all questions involved.

There is no reason for disturbing the verdict or judgment.

(182 N. C. 339)

LEFKOWITZ v. SILVER et al. (No. 361.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 2, 1921.)

1. Trusts §111—Whether defendant purchased property for himself after agreeing with plaintiff that land should be bought for their joint benefit held for the jury.

In action to establish a parol trust, whether defendant secretly bought the property for himself and took deed to himself and his mother after making agreement with plaintiff that they should buy the land together for their joint benefit, and each contribute one-half of the purchase money, and while their agent was negotiating for the purchase, held for the jury.

2. Trusts §99—Purchaser of land in own name after making agreement with another that land be purchased for their joint benefit held land subject to parol trust in favor of the other.

Where plaintiff and defendant agreed that land be bought for their joint benefit, and that each contribute one-half of the purchase money, and where defendant, while their agent was negotiating for the purchase pursuant to such agreement, secretly bought the property for himself and took deed to himself and his mother, the defendant and his mother held the land subject to an enforceable parol trust in favor of plaintiff.

3. Trusts §91—"Trust ex maleficio" defined.

A trust ex maleficio is a trust growing out of fraud, misdoing, or tort, and is a constructive trust arising entirely by operation of law without reference to any actual or supposed intention of creating a trust, and often directly contrary to such intention.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Trust Ex Maleficio.]

4. Trusts §110—Evidence to establish parol trust must be strong, cogent, and convincing.

The evidence to establish a parol trust must be strong, cogent, and convincing, a mere preponderance being insufficient.

Appeal from Superior Court, Forsyth County; Webb, Judge.

Action by Abe Lefkowitz against Milton Silver and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. New trial.

This action, in the nature of a suit in equity, was brought by the plaintiff to set up a parol trust in an undivided one-half of the tract of land described in the pleadings, and in order to pass upon the motion of the defendants to nonsuit the plaintiff, it will be advisable to state the issues and the contentions of the parties, which will be done almost in their own language, and at least substantially so. There was evidence, we think, to support the respective claims of the parties. The verdict was as follows:

(1) Did the defendant, M. Silver, verbally agree with the plaintiff that they would purchase and hold jointly the premises described in the complaint at the price of $40,000? Ans. Yes.

(2) Did the plaintiff, Lefkowitz, by any words or act on his part, or failure on his part to comply with the terms of his contract, waive or abandon his rights under the contract, if you find there was such a contract? Ans. No.

(3) If so, did the defendant, M. Silver, in violation of that agreement, purchase said premises and take title to himself and to his codefendant? Ans. Yes.

(4) Was the plaintiff ready, able, and willing to pay his part of the purchase price? Ans. Yes.

(5) Did the plaintiff demand of the defendant, M. Silver, that he convey, or cause to be conveyed to him, the one-half undivided interest in said premises? Ans. Yes.

(6) Did the defendant, M. Silver, acquire, and does he now hold title to one-half undivided interest in the premises described in the complaint, as a trustee for plaintiff as alleged in the complaint? Ans. Yes. (The court answered Yes.)

1. Plaintiff contended that the verdict of the jury establishes that the plaintiff and the defendants verbally agreed that they would purchase and hold jointly the premises described in the complaint at the price of $40,000; that the plaintiff did not waive or abandon his rights under that agreement by any words or acts on his part, or by his failure to comply with the terms of the contract; that the defendant, in violation of the agreement, purchased the premises, took title to himself and to his codefendant; that the plaintiff made demand on the defendant to convey to him, in accordance with the original agreement, a one-half undivided interest in the premises; and that the plaintiff was ready, able, and willing at all times to pay his part of the purchase price. Upon the foregoing findings of fact by the jury, the court, as a matter of law, by answering the sixth issue, adjudged that the defendant acquired and held title to a one-half undivided interest in the premises described in the complaint as a trustee for plaintiff. In support of the allegations of the complaint, and as a basis of the foregoing findings of fact by the jury, the plaintiff offered evidence showing that the defendant, a resident of High Point, came to the plaintiff's place of business in Winston-Salem, seeking a business location in that city. After discussing the matter generally, and in answer to defendant's inquiry as to whether the plaintiff knew of a piece of property in Winston-Salem that could be bought, the plaintiff told the defendant that he thought the property described in the complaint could be bought at $40,000. As a result of this conversation, the defendant proposed that they buy it together—the property belonging to Mr. Harris, of Baltimore. Whereupon, the plaintiff and defendant went to the office of Mr. Fletcher and employed him to negotiate the purchase with Mr. Harris. This visit to Mr. Fletcher's office was on September 18th, and that afternoon Fletcher called in Mr. Hurdle, of the Hurdle Loan & Insurance Company, and in the presence of Mr. Hurdle, Mr. Fletcher dictated a letter to Mr. Harris, which will be found in the record, and had Mr. Hurdle to sign it. A reply to this letter was received from Mr. Harris in two or three days, which was shown to Fletcher and by him communicated to Lefkowitz. Another letter was written under similar conditions on September 22d, and Harris' reply to that letter was shown to Fletcher. While these negotiations were going on, the defendant, through his brother, who was in Baltimore, opened up direct negotiations with Harris, and on the 22d day of September, 1919, entered into a contract of purchase for the land in behalf of himself and his mother, which contract of purchase was later followed by a deed from Harris. Claiming that under the circumstances the defendant could not, without a breach of confidence and his agreement with the plaintiff, purchase the property for himself, plaintiff brought this suit, seeking to have the defendant declared a trustee to the extent of a one-half undivided interest and a conveyance from the defendant to the plaintiff for that interest in the land. Silver came to Lefkowitz, seeking information as to where he could buy a store in Winston-Salem. Lefkowitz informed him that he knew of such a store, and that he desired to become associated with Silver in his purchase. Upon Silver consenting to this, Lefkowitz disclosed to him the property in question. It was agreed that, if the property could be bought for $40,000, or less, that a joint purchase of it should be made. The parties went to Mr. Fletcher and arranged with him to negotiate with the owner for the property upon the terms just stated. While these negotiations were under way, Silver buys the property for himself. Silver secured the information which enabled him to make the purchase by agreeing with Lefkowitz that he should become a joint owner.

2. The defendants' version of the case was, and they so contend, that the defendant Silver was a resident of High Point; he called on the plaintiff, Lefkowitz, in Winston-Salem the latter part of August, 1919, and asked him if he knew of a store for rent. The plaintiff suggested renting the Winston Clothing Company's building, but the rent the defendant would have had to pay was considered too high. About the first week in September following, the defendant returned to Winston-Salem and again saw the plaintiff; he suggested to plaintiff that the best thing to do would be to buy the Winston Clothing Company's place, but that he could not do so alone, and suggested that they buy it together. Defendant asked plaintiff where they could get information about the building, and plaintiff suggested going to see Mr. J. H. Fletcher. They went together to see Mr. Fletcher, and secured from him the name of the owner, the size of the lot, and of the building, and such other information as Mr. Fletcher could give. Upon leaving Mr. Fletcher's office, defendant asked plaintiff if he meant business, and, if he did, that each would put up $500 to pay cost of negotiating the trade, and they would get some one to go to Baltimore to see if they could buy the property. The plaintiff replied, according to the contention of the defendant, that he was not able to buy the building, and the plaintiff and defendant had no further transactions in regard to the purchase. Two days later, the defendant's brother went to a hospital at Baltimore, and the defendant had him to get in touch with the owner. After several interchanges of messages, terms were agreed to, and on September 22, 1919, the defendant went to Baltimore and bought the building for himself and mother at the price of $40,000; but he concealed the fact from Lefkowitz.

The plaintiff contends, however, that no suggestion was made to him by the defendant to put up any money to negotiate the trade with the owner, and that he did not waive any of his rights to become the purchaser with the plaintiff under the original agreement.

The court charged the jury as follows:

"The first issue submitted for your consideration is this: Did the defendant, M. Silver, verbally agree with the plaintiff that they could purchase and hold jointly the premises described in the complaint at the price of $40,000? How do you find that issue to be? The burden of that issue is on the plaintiff to satisfy you, by the greater weight of the evidence or by the preponderance of the evidence, that such an agreement was made by and between the plaintiff and defendant, and if the plaintiff has satisfied you by the greater weight of the evidence that such an agreement was made by and between the plaintiff and defendant—that is, that the plaintiff and defendant agreed between themselves that they would purchase the property in controversy, that they should be joint owners of it, that each one was to pay half of the purchase price and it was agreed between them that the deed should be made to them as tenants in common, made to both of them—if plaintiff has satisfied you by the greater weight of the evidence that such a contract and agreement was made, though verbally, it would be your duty to answer the first issue 'Yes.'"

Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appealed.

Carter Dalton, of High Point, Swink & Hutchins and O. O. Eford, all of Winston-Salem, for appellants.

Hastings & Whicker, Holton & Holton, and Manly, Hendren & Womble, all of Winston-Salem, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1-2] The substance of the plaintiff's contention is that there was an agreement between him and Silver that they should buy the land together, for their joint benefit, each contributing one-half of the purchase money, the deed for the land to be made to them as tenants in common, or each to own an undivided one-half thereof, and that the defendant Milton Silver thwarted their plan, and the consummation of their purpose, while Fletcher, as their agent, was negotiating for the purchase, by circumventing Fletcher and the plaintiff and buying the property for himself, taking the deed from Harris to himself and his mother in equal moieties. Silver did not notify plaintiff of what he intended to do, and afterwards did not, but acted in that respect secretly and clandestinely, with a view of concealing his actions and enabling him thereby to secure the legal title before plaintiff was aware of what he was doing, or had done. If the plaintiff can establish these facts, and there are other pertinent ones of which there was evidence, he is entitled to go to the jury upon the allegation of his complaint as to the trust. Whether there was such fraud and circumvention, or evil practice on the part of Silver, as would constitute him a trustee ex malificio as to an undivided one-half of the land for the plaintiff, or not, we will discuss later in this opinion, as there is evidence of a parol trust created before the transmutation of the possession, or the conveyance of the legal title, to Silver and his mother, which will carry the case to the jury. Sykes v. Boone, 132 N. C. 199-202, 43 S. E. 645, 95 Am. St. Rep. 619. Why do not the facts thus appearing and found create a parol trust in favor of the plaintiff which is enforceable in a court of equity? We think they did. It is familiar learning that a trust may be created in any one of four modes:

(1) By transmission of the legal estate, when a single declaration will raise the use or trust.

(2) By a contract based upon valuable consideration, to stand seized to the use or in trust for another.

(3) By covenant to stand seized to the use of or in trust for another upon good consideration.

(4) When the court by its decree converts a party into a trustee on the ground of fraud. Wood v. Cherry, 73 N. C. 110.

With reference to this classification by Chief Justice Pearson, we held in Sykes v. Boone, supra:

"The trust in this case comes within the first class, as a declaration of trust was made at the time of the execution of the deed and the conveyance of the legal estate. A trust when so declared is not within the state of frauds. * * * Nor does it require a consideration to support it. If the declaration is made at or before the legal estate passes, it will be valid even in favor of a mere volunteer"—citing Blackburn v. Blackburn, 109 N. C. 488, 13 S. E. 937; Pittman v. Pittman, 107 N. C. 159, 12 S. E. 61, 11 L. R. A. 456.

In the Blackburn Case, it was held:

"2. The grantor, before the delivery of a deed which he had signed conveying a tract of land to another, made, under seal, this indorsement: 'I, the said E. B., do hereby certify that S. B., a daughter of said E. B., doth hold a lifetime possession in the said deed.' Held, to amount to a declaration of a trust in favor of the said S. B., and that the grantee took the title subject thereto.

"3. An oral declaration of a trust, made contemporaneously with the transmission of the title, may be established, even without a consideration. No particular form of words is necessary."

Justice Shepherd says substantially in the opinion, and referring to Pittman v. Pittman, supra, as deciding the same thing:

"We think however (without passing upon the question whether the language used can be construed into a covenant to stand seized to uses) that the judgment of his honor may be sustained on the ground that the indorsement, made before or at the time of the delivery, amounted to a declaration of trust, to wit, that the grantee should hold the land for the use of the said Sarah for life. Even without consideration, an oral declaration of trust in favor of a third person, made contemporaneously with the transmission of the legal title will, when established by competent testimony, be recognized and enforced in a court of equity. Pittman v. Pittman, 107 N. C. 159.

"If this is so, a fortiori will the court give effect to such a contemporaneous declaration when made in writing under seal and for a good consideration. No particular form of words is necessary to establish such a trust. The intent is what the courts look to," citing Fonblanque on Equity, 36, note 3; Vesey, Jr. 9; Bispham on Equity, 98."

He then adds:

"The language in our case is very similar to that used in Fisher v. Fields, 10 Johns. 494, which was held to be sufficient, and, indeed, upon looking over the many cases in the reports, there can be no doubt upon the question. The grantee, then, taking the title accompanied with this contemporaneous declaration, must be declared seized of the land in trust for Sarah Blackburn for the term of her natural life."

It will be observed that the very able justice (who was profoundly learned both in the principles of equity, as well as in those of the common law) states that an oral declaration, under our statute of frauds, which does not include trusts, as does the English statute, is just as valid, and enforceable as one that it written, so that those cases are directly applicable here, and they may also be relied on as meeting fully another objection of the defendant that there was no consideration for the agreement upon which the trust is founded.

Justice Shepherd, who also spoke for the court in Pittman v. Pittman, supra, said in substance in that well-considered case:

"Trusts and uses were raised in the same manner, and if a feoffment was made without consideration, a use resulted to the feoffor, unless the use or trust was declared at the time of the conveyance. Now, it must be observed that no consideration was necessary to a feoffment. The conveyance itself raised the use and separated it from the legal estate. The use so raised would, however, as we have said, in the absence of a consideration, result to the feoffor, unless declared at [or before], the time of the feoffment, and this declaration might be voluntarily made by parol, either in favor of the feoffee or of a third person. But there was a great difference, in this respect, between a conveyance which operated by transmuting the possession, and the covenant to stand seized, which had no operation but by the creation of a new use; and, as this was raised by equity, and equity never acts without a consideration, [one] was always necessary to the transfer of the interest by this conveyance; whereas, in the case of a feoffment or fine, the use arises upon the conveyance itself. * * * It seems, therefore, that at common law, only the solemn conveyance, by livery or record, could raise the use by its own virtue, and dispense with the deed declaring it, as well as the consideration for raising it. Roberts on Fraud, 92. It appears, then, that at common law no use or trust can be raised in lands without a consideration, except in the single instance of a conveyance operating by transmutation of possession, the character of the conveyance alone being sufficient to raise the use, and to dispense with the necessity for a consideration."

There are numerous cases approving and affirming those we have cited.

The same justice in the Pittman Case, considers very fully the effect upon parol trusts in this state produced by our failure, or refusal, to adopt the seventh section of the English statute of frauds, and he argues on the assumption that the writings in that case contained no evidence of a declaration of trust contemporaneous with the transmission of the legal title, or of any other antecedent obligation. He then states that we are confronted with the interesting question whether the legal owner of land can be divested of his property by a simple voluntary parol declaration that he holds it in trust for another (which, of course, means after the legal title has vested in him). The seventh section of the statute of 29 Charles II, requiring that "all declarations or creations of trusts or confidences of any lands, tenements, or hereditaments shall be manifested and proved by some writing signed by the party," etc., has been very generally adopted in the United States, and the doctrine of the declaration of express trusts, as laid down by the various text-writers, is based almost entirely upon decisions of the courts since the enactment of the said statute. As the above provision is not embraced in our statute of frauds, it therefore becomes necessary that we should inquire into the manner in which express voluntary trusts in land could be created at common law. Foy v. Foy, 3 N. C. 131. Doubts were at one time entertained whether trusts could be created by parol, but it is well established that this could be done at common law, both as to real and personal property. A trust in reality, like a use, was, in technical language, averable; that is, could be created by word of mouth. The better opinion is, however, that this is only true of those cases in which the legal estate could be created by feoffment, where, of course, no writing was necessary. But where a deed was requisite for the conveyance of the legal estate (as in covenant to stand seized to uses), these uses and trusts were not averable, but could be created only in the same manner as legal estates. Bispham's Pr. of Equity, 95; Hill on Trustees, 86; Gilbert on Uses, 270. We must not overlook the fact that now, and for a long time past, registration operates in lieu of livery of seizin. Pell's Revisal, § 979, notes and cases.

The cases we have cited (Sykes v. Boone and others) as to parol trusts have since been specially approved by this court. Avery v. Stewart, 136 N. C. 426, 48 S. E. 775, 68 L. R. A. 776; Gaylord v. Gaylord, 150 N. C. 222, 63 S. E. 1028; Harrell v. Hagen, 150 N. C. 242, 63 S. E. 952, and other cases, some of them being cited in Avery v. Stewart, supra, 136 N. C. at pages 439-441, 48 S. E. 775, 68 L. R. A. 776. See, also, 39 Oyc. pp. 82-85, and notes where the cases in this and other jurisdictions are collected. Justice Avery said in Cobb v. Edwards, 117 N. C. 245, at page 251, 23 S. E. 241, 243:

"It is not material whether the proof in this case does or does not come up to the strict requirement in that class of cases [just considered], since a different rule is applicable where the plaintiff simply seeks by evidence of a previous or contemporaneous agreement to engraft upon the deed of a purchaser at a judicial sale a trust to hold the legal estate for others who are to repay the purchase money advanced by him. In such cases the proof of an agreement existing at the time of the sale that the purchaser was to buy for the benefit of the claimants must be strong, clear, and convincing, and must be supported by evidence equally strong of facts or circumstances inconsistent with a purpose on the part of the purchaser to hold the land for himself, but the latter purpose may be manifested by conduct subsequent to the sale. As to the quantum of proof required, the rule is the same as where the equity grows out of furnishing the purchase-money to another who takes title to himself, though, as already stated [and as this forms a resulting trust], no agreement need be shown in the latter class of cases," citing Williams v. Hodges, 95 N. C. 32; Ferguson v. Haas, 64 N. C. 772; Link v. Link, 90 N. C. 235; Mulholland v. York, 82 N. C. 510; Vestal v. Sloan, 76 N. C. 127; Vannoy v. Martin, 41 N. C. 169, 51 Am. Dec. 418.

"The judge has no more right, when the testimony if believed is sufficient to be submitted to the jury, to determine in the trial of civil actions what is strong, clear, and convincing proof than he has in the trial of a criminal action to express an opinion as to whether guilt has been shown beyond a reasonable doubt."

The rule as to strong, cogent, and convincing evidence must be given to the jury, but they must say at least whether it is such.

[3] But whether we should hold this to be a parol trust, or a trust ex maleficio (that is, one growing out of fraud, misdoing, or tort), which perhaps it more strictly is, the rule of evidence, and intensity of proof, is the same, because in both cases there is parol evidence, or may be. The latter kind of trust, called a trust ex maleficio, or ex delicto, is also known as a constructive trust and arises entirely by operation of law without reference to any actual or supposed intention of creating a trust, and often directly contrary to such intention. It is entirely in invitum and is forced upon the conscience of the malefactor who will be declared a trustee because of his wrong or fraud, for the purpose of working out right and justice, or frustrating the fraud. It is otherwise defined as a trust not created by any words, either expressly or impliedly, evincing a direct intention to raise a trust, but by the construction of equity in order to satisfy the demands of justice; or a trust raised by construction of law, or arising by operation of law, as distinguished from an express trust; or one that arises when a person clothed with some fiduciary character, by fraud or otherwise, gains some advantage to himself; or is such as is raised by equity in respect to property which has been acquired by fraud, or where, though acquired originally without fraud, it is against equity that it should be retained by him who holds the legal title. 39 Oyc., p. 27, and notes 86 and 87.

Whether a parol, express, resulting, or constructive trust, it is established by the same kind of evidence, not in the deed, but extraneous thereto, or dehors the deed, as we say. But the result is the same. It is not an attempt to set aside the deed. That relief is not prayed, but plaintiff asks that defendant be declared to hold the legal title he has acquired by his fraud "in trust for the use and benefit of the plaintiff, as to one-half interest in the said property, and that he be ordered to convey one-half fee-simple interest in the same to him." If he had merely asked that the deed be set aside, for fraud practiced upon him, the case of Harding v. Long, 103 N. C. p. 1, 9 S. E. 445, 14 Am. St. Rep. 775, would apply, and the evidence of plaintiff would be required to preponderate only. Justice Avery said in the case of Cobb v. Edwards, supra, 117 N. C. p. 253, 23 S. E. 244.

"If, as counsel insisted, there is any language used in the obiter statement of the rule in Harding v. Long [supra], or in Ely v. Early, 94 N. C. 1, repugnant to what we have said, such expressions must be considered so far modified as to bring those cases into perfect harmony with the law as it has been formulated in this case."

Let us apply these principles. The plaintiff contends that Silver holds the legal estate in trust upon these grounds, because of his wrong or fraud in betraying the plaintiff's confidence in him:

"(1) There was an express agreement that the property should be purchased and held jointly.

"(2) Silver obtained the information that enabled him to make the purchase, as a result of the confidence Lefkowitz was induced to repose in him because of Silver's promise that the purchase should be joint.

"(3) Silver was the agent of Lefkowitz to buy one-half interest"—citing Allen v. Gooding, 173 N. C. 93, 91 S. E. 694; Russell v. Wade, 146 N. C. 116, 59 S. E. 345. See also 28 R. C. L. 1233 et seq; Wilson v. Jones, 176 N. C. 205, 97 S. E. 18; Brogden v. Gibson, 165 N. C. 16, 80 S. E. 966.

These positions may be well founded, and two of them perhaps are.

[4] But we think the judge committed an error as to the intensity of the proof when he charged that a mere preponderance was sufficient to set up a parol trust, as the evidence must be strong, cogent, and convincing. This has been thoroughly and finally established by our cases. Cobb v. Edwards, supra, and cases cited in the note to the annotated edition.

Justice Allen said in Taylor v. Wahab, 154 N. C. 219, at pages 223 and 224, 70 S. E. 173, 175:

"We also think there was no error in the charge of his honor and that the rule laid down for the guidance of the jury as stated in the part of the charge quoted follows the decisions of this Court. McNair v. Pope, 100 N. C. 408; Hamilton v. Buchanan, 112 N. C. 471; Kelly v.

McNeill, 118 N. C. 353; Wilson v. Brown, 134 N. C. 405. It is well settled in this state that, where competent evidence is introduced to establish a parol trust, it is the duty of the judge to submit it to the jury, and it is for the jury to say whether it is 'clear, strong, cogent, and convincing.' Cobb v. Edwards, [supra]; Lehew v. Hewitt, 130 N. C. 22; Avery v. Stewart, 136 N. C. 430. The enforcement of parol trusts is recognized in this state, but it is a jurisdiction in the exercise of which there is much danger. As said by Pearson, J., in Kelly v. Bryan, 41 N. C. 286: 'Courts of equity enforce parol trusts to prevent fraud, but the jurisdiction is exercised sparingly and, many think, with very doubtful policy.' The court, in Avery v. Stewart, supra, while discussing the rule as [the intensity of the] proof required, says: 'The security of titles required the adoption of this rule.' As a further safeguard, the law clothes the presiding judge with the power to supervise the verdict and to set it aside in proper cases.

"The doctrine is fully and clearly discussed in the case of Avery v. Stewart, cited above, and in the case of Sykes v. Boone, 132 N. C. 199, both of which are conclusively against the plaintiff."

"A higher degree of proof than a mere preponderance of evidence is required to establish an express trust. Some of the cases go to the extent of requiring the evidence to be so conclusive as to exclude all reasonable doubt; but the more common requirement is that the evidence be clear, explicit, and convincing, not only as to the existence of the trust, but as to its terms and conditions. The rule requiring the evidence to be clear and satisfactory is especially applicable where the trust is attempted to be proved by parol evidence, as well as where it is sought to convert into a trustee a person holding the legal title to property ostensibly as absolute owner."

—because, according to this view, it tends to alter, add to, or vary the deed. Lehew v. Hewitt, 138 N. C. 6, 50 S. E. 459, where the rule of evidence is stated to be that the trust must be shown by proof strong, cogent, and convincing, but after giving this rule to the jury, they must decide whether it measures up to the standard required, just as they decide in ordinary civil cases whether the proof of plaintiff preponderates, or in criminal cases whether the state has established the crime beyond a reasonable doubt. There are very many cases of this character, but we will cite only two more of them, Lamm v. Lamm, 163 N. C. 71, 79 S. E. 290, and Boone v. Lee, 175 N. C. 384, 95 S. E. 659, as the learned counsel for plaintiff supposed there was some inconsistency between the last two cases; but we are of the opinion that there is absolutely none, and that the supposition that there is must be more imaginary than real. The Lamm Case was cited in the Boone Case, as directly sustaining the rule as we have herein stated it to be, and in the very opening of the opinion, the learned judge who delivered it so states the distinction most clearly between the two classes of cases just as it is stated in the Boone Case, and in all those cited by us, without any variableness or shadow of turning. Both the cases are in perfect line with our former decisions, without the least deviation therefrom.

The error of the court as to the intensity of the proof entitles the defendant to another trial, and it is so ordered.

New trial.

STATE v. McCANLESS. (No. 350.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 9, 1921.)

1. Larceny \S 68(1)—Receiving stolen goods \S 9(1)—Evidence sufficient for submission of case to jury in prosecution for larceny of automobile.

In a prosecution for larceny of automobile and for receiving the automobile knowing it to have been stolen, evidence held sufficient for submission of case to jury.

2. Criminal law \S 413(2)—Defendant's declaration that he had bought alleged stolen automobile inadmissible as self-serving declaration.

In prosecution for larceny of automobile, refusal to allow deputy sheriff to answer question whether when arrested defendant did not say that he had bought the automobile from a named person held proper, since such testimony would have been incompetent as a self-serving declaration.

3. Criminal law \S 1120(3)—Refusal to permit witness to answer question not considered in absence of record disclosing answer witness would have made.

Exception complaining of refusal to permit witness to answer question is not available, where record does not disclose what answer witness would have made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Rockingham County; Webb, Judge.

Roy McCanless was convicted of larceny of an automobile and of receiving it knowing it to have been stolen, and he appeals. Affirmed. No error.

The defendant was convicted of the larceny and receiving of a Ford car, the property of H. D. Winn.

Mr. Winn had his car stolen at the Leaksville Fair, September 28, 1920. It was a new 1920 model Ford car in excellent condition with a full complement of tires and many extras. Its engine number, when he bought it, was 4,100,416. When he got it back the number was changed to 4,101,027, and you could see distinctly where the change had been made.

In the early part of January, 1921, he found this car in Greensboro. He details in his testimony the marks by which he identified it when discovered in Greensboro. There can be no doubt that the car found was the car which had been stolen from him. When he got the car back, all the extras and tools were gone.

The defendant, Roy McCanless, sold this car for $300 to one Gardner, who lived at Proximity Mills, on December 8th. It had cost Winn with all its extras in July, 1920, $908, and he testified that it was worth $850 at the time it was stolen.

Hobbs, a deputy sheriff of Guilford, arrested the defendant, at his father's house.

"As I drove up, the front of the house fronts the road. Mr. Gardner was in the car and says, 'Yonder he is now,' and I saw somebody get up and start out of the back door. I went around the corner of the house and caught him in the back yard."

He found a lot of automobile tools, such as wrenches, etc., a large steering wheel at the grainhouse hanging under the shed, fenders, shock absorbers in the loft of the smokehouse. There was also a large box full of wrenches; there was no garage there.

The defendant himself testified that the tools, wrenches, belonged to his father. His father, O. L. McCanless, testified:

"There were no fenders on my place; there were some tools. I don't run a garage. * * * Tools did not belong to me, belong to Farley Lowe."

The defendant's object in saying that these things belonged to his father is apparent from what he said in that immediate connection, on top of page 11:

"My father had owned two cars, a Dodge and a Ford, about three weeks before they (officers) came down there."

The defendant himself testified that he bought this car from Percy Newman the second week in October, and paid $500 for it. His father testified that as well as he remembered the time was October 8th, and Farley Lowe testifies to the same effect. The latter witness also claimed the chest of tools at McCanless'. Percy Newman lived about one mile from McCanless and defendant had known him all his life.

The latter seems to have been an intimate friend of Newman and visited Newman's sister. He borrowed a car from Newman, so he says, to take this girl to ride and was stopped by the officers and the car taken as the car of a Mr. Gentry of Rockingham county. Newman was convicted of automobile stealing and sentenced to the penitentiary. It does not appear exactly when, but it was since Christmas, 1920, and since the Ford car was stolen.

Glidewell & Mayberry, of Reidsville, for appellant.

J. S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HOKE, J. [1] We have given the cause most careful consideration and find no reversible error on the record. There was ample evidence for the state to carry the case to the jury, and the issue was submitted in a comprehensive charge by his honor in which every position favoring the defendant and arising on the testimony was sufficiently and fairly presented.

[2, 3] The objections to the rulings of the court on questions of evidence are without merit. The only one at all debatable—the refusal to allow Deputy Sheriff Hobbs to answer the question whether, when arrested, the defendant did not say he had bought the car from Percy Newman at the time asked—was incompetent as tending to draw out a self-serving declaration, and if it became so later in corroboration of defendant's direct testimony, it was not again offered. And in any event the exception is not available, as the record does not disclose what answer the witness Hobbs would have made.

There is no error, and the judgment below is affirmed.

No error.

STATE v. DUDLEY. (No. 161.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 26, 1921.)

1. Constitutional law §62—Power to establish facts on which statute depends may be delegated.

While legislative power may not be delegated, except in case of municipal corporations exercising governmental functions on local matters, the Legislature may delegate to an administrative board the power to establish the pertinent facts or conditions upon which a statute makes its own action depend.

2. Constitutional law §62—Statute empowering Fisheries Commission Board to regulate fishing not an unauthorized delegation of legislative power.

C. S. §§ 1865-2078, creating the Fisheries Commission Board, and giving it general control of fisheries, held not an unwarranted attempt to delegate legislative power.

3. Indictment and Information §32(4)—Indictment for violating rule of Fisheries Commission Board held sufficient, although not alleging that default was contrary to statute.

An indictment for violating a rule of the Fisheries Commission Board by taking escallops by drags in forbidden waters, held sufficient, in view of the statute of Jeofails (C. S. § 4625), although it might have been better form to have added that the default was also contrary to the statute.

4. Fish §11—Jurisdiction of Fisheries Commission Board stated.

The jurisdiction of the Fisheries Commission Board created by C. S. §§ 1865-2078, extends to all the public waters of the state or over which it has control, notwithstanding that particular waters are also specified.

5. Fish §2—Escallops are "fish" within fisheries regulations.

Escallops are fish within the regulations of the State Fisheries Commission Board and of the statute creating it.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Fish.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Carteret County; Horton, Judge.

Henry Dudley was convicted of violating the fishing laws, and he appeals. No error.

Defendant was convicted under the following bill of indictment:

"The jurors for the state upon their oath present: That Henry Dudley, late of the county of Carteret, on the 28th day of December, 1920, did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously take escallops with drags or scrapes in that territory in Bogue Sound lying between Spooners Point and Brant Island, the same being that territory designated as unlawful or forbidden grounds, in violation of orders, rules, regulations, etc., of the Fisheries Commission Board, at meeting held October 7, 1919, and known as Regulation No. 13, contrary to the form of regulations of said commission board and against the peace and dignity of the state. And the jurors for the state upon their oaths aforesaid do further present did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously violate Regulation 5 of the orders, rules, and regulations of the Fisheries Commission Board, passed at various meetings held from April 29, 1915, to July 5, 1920, contrary to the form of the regulations of said Fisheries Commission Board."

From judgment on the verdict, the defendant appealed, assigning for errors chiefly the refusal to quash the bill for that same did not state a criminal offense; refusal to instruct the jury that on the entire evidence, if accepted by the jury, no criminal offense has been established.

Thomas W. Bickett, of Raleigh, James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HOKE, J. In recognition of the great importance of fish and fishing industries connected therewith in the public waters of the state as a source of food supply to the people and of the impelling necessity for authoritative and intelligent regulation concerning them, the General Assembly has made elaborate statutory provisions on these subjects, the same, general and special, appearing principally in Consolidated Statutes, chapter 37, §§ 1865 to 2078, inclusive, and, recognizing further that it is impossible in a fixed and formal statute to foresee and provide for all the administrative details sure to be required under such extended and ever-varying conditions, the Legislation referred to creates a commission to be termed the "Fisheries Commission Board," giving it the general control of the subject, and in addition to other special provisions conferring general powers in terms as follows:

"The Fisheries Commission Board is hereby authorized to regulate, prohibit, or restrict in time, place, character, or dimensions, the use of nets, appliances, apparatus or means employed in taking or killing fish; to regulate the seasons at which the various species of fish may be taken in the several waters of the state, and to prescribe the minimum sizes of fish which may be taken in the said several waters of the state, or which may be bought, sold, or held in possession by any person, firm, or corporation in the state; and such regulations, prohibitions, restrictions and prescriptions, after due publication, which shall be construed to be once a week for four consecutive weeks in some newspaper in North Carolina, shall be of equal force and effect with the provisions of this act; and any person violating the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, shall be fined or imprisoned, at the discretion of the court." Section 1878.

And in further enforcement of the law, section 1901 makes provision as follows:

"Upon failure of any person, firm or corporation to comply with any of the provisions of this article, or any of the fisheries laws, any license issued to any such person, firm or corporation may be revoked by the Fisheries Commission, and upon satisfactory settlement may be reinstated, with the consent of the board. All such persons violating the provisions of this article or of the fisheries law shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

Under the powers so conferred and in promotion of the general purposes of the statute, the Fisheries Commission Board made and established a formal rule or regulation, which prohibited the taking of scallops with drags, or scrapes in a certain portion of Bogue Sound between Spooner's Point and Brant Island, and designating such locality as unlawful and forbidden territory. And on the trial there was evidence of the state tending to show that at the time specified, the ground having been properly staked off as forbidden ground, defendant was employed in taking scallops in the manner prohibited, and on this evidence, accepted by the jury, defendant was duly convicted of the offense charged in the bill, and from judgment on the verdict has appealed.

[1] It was chiefly and very earnestly contended before us that this conviction cannot be sustained because it presents an unwarranted attempt to delegate legislative power. It is well recognized that except in the case of municipal corporations when in the exercise of governmental functions on local matters, legislative power may not be delegated. But if it be conceded that the board in question here, the Fisheries Commission Board, as a mere administrative board, does not come within the exception stated, it is firmly established in this jurisdiction and fully recognized in authoritative cases elsewhere that, though legislative powers may not be in strictness delegated to a board of that character, it is fully competent for the Legislature to delegate to such a board the power to "establish the pertinent facts or conditions upon which a statute makes its own action depend." This statement of the principle taken from 8 Cyc. p. 830, was directly approved and applied in State v. Railroad, 141 N. C. 846-851, 54 S. E. 294, a decision upholding the conviction of defendant for violation of the administrative regulations of our Department of Agriculture. And a forcible and striking illustration in approval of the same position is presented in the recent case of State v. Hodges, 180 N. C. 751, 105 S. E. 417, sustaining regulations of the same department in reference to eradication of cattle ticks.

It has been applied also in reference to regulations of the Health Department, as in the case of compulsory vaccination. Morgan v. Stewart, 144 N. C. 424, 57 S. E. 149, citing State v. Hay, 126 N. C. 999, 35 S. E. 459, 49 L. R. A. 588, 78 Am. St. Rep. 691; Hutchins v. Durham, 137 N. C. 68, 49 S. E. 46, 2 Ann. Cas. 340; Morris v. Columbus, 102 Ga. 792, 30 S. E. 850, 42 L. R. A. 175, 66 Am. St. Rep. 243.

And in Express Co. v. Railroad, 141 N. C. 463, 16 S. E. 393, 18 L. R. A. 393, 32 Am. St. Rep. 805, it was fully recognized as justifying the Legislature in delegating to the Corporation Commission the power of establishing transportation rates, etc. Similar decisions resting upon the same principle appear in U. S. v. Grimaud, 220 U. S. 506, 31 S. Ct. 480, 55 L. Ed. 563; Isenhour v. State, 157 Ind. 517, 62 N. E. 40, 87 Am. St. Rep. 228, and in many other authoritative cases, and may be considered as the generally accepted rule on the subject.

"Congress cannot delegate legislative power [citing Field v. Clark, 143 U. S. 692], but the authority to make administrative rules is not."

delegation of legislative power, and such rules do not become legislation because violation thereof are punished as public offenses."

And so it is here. The Commission, as stated, under authority conferred, have established the regulation that these escallops shall not be taken in drags in certain designated localities. And the statutes referred to enact that to take these fish or mollusks contrary to this administrative rule shall constitute a misdemeanor, and it is on this that the conviction is lawfully made to rest.

[3] It is argued in support of the defendant's position that the indictment is for violating the rule and not otherwise, but the suggestion is without merit. It may have been the better form to have added to the bill that the alleged default was also "contrary to the statute in such case made and provided," but this, if it be a defect, is one cured in express terms by our Statute of Jeofails, Consolidated Statutes, § 4625.

[4] It is further insisted for defendant that the locality to which this regulation applies is nowhere mentioned or designated in the law, and the same is not therefore included in the powers conferred upon the board. But a perusal of the statute, and more particularly section 1878, which appertains more directly to the question, will disclose that the jurisdiction of the board extends to all the public waters of the state, or over which it has control. "The several waters of the state" is the precise language of the section referred to and the numerous portions of the law in which places are expressly mentioned are not in restriction of the general words of the principal section, but these places are only mentioned because special provision is made as being desirable or necessary for those places, and this objection also must be overruled.

[5] It cannot for a moment be maintained that escallops, the subject-matter of the inquiry, are not within the powers conferred. In the portion of the statute defining the terms and subjects of the chapter in question, the word "fish" is made to include "porpoises, and other marine mammals, fishes, mollusca, and crustaceans." Not only do escallops come within this comprehensive definition, being a "mollusk of the species pectinidae," but in a later part of the chapter, they are expressly mentioned as being within its provisions. This objection therefore is overruled.

We have given the case most careful consideration, and, owing to the very great importance of this industry to the state and its people, it is gratifying that the conviction can be upheld in accord with accepted principles of constitutional and statutory construction. It is a subject that has deservedly received the fullest consideration of our Legislatures, and under the capable, courageous, and impartial enforcement of the law that has prevailed for the past several years there is reason to believe that substantial and ever-increasing benefits may be expected.

There is no error, and the judgment below is affirmed.

No error.

(192 N. C. 831)

STATE v. VANHOOK. (No. 322.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 2, 1921.)

1. Constitutional law §63(2)—When legislative power may be granted to municipal corporations stated.

The General Assembly may delegate legislative power to municipal corporations when the power granted is such as relates to the exercise of governmental functions of limited or local character, or to other legitimate and proper municipal purposes.

2. Municipal corporations §611—Dance hall ordinance held valid exercise of police power.

Municipal ordinance, forbidding operation of dance hall where admission fees were charged without a permit from the board of aldermen, held a valid exercise of the police power of the state, in view of C. S. c. 56, and of section 2787 thereof, giving cities power to license, regulate, or prohibit dance halls.

3. Municipal corporations §591—Municipal dance hall ordinance not invalid as conferring arbitrary power on aldermen.

A municipal ordinance forbidding the operation of dance halls where admission fees are charged, without a permit from the board of aldermen, held not invalid as conferring unlimited discretion upon the board in granting or refusing permits; the discretion of the board being a limited legal discretion, although not subject to control by the courts in the absence of abuse.

Appeal from Superior Court, Durham County; Horton, Judge.

James Vanhook was convicted of operating a dance hall without a permit and he appeals. No error.

The warrant issued by the recorder is as follows:

"G. W. Proctor, being duly sworn on information, says that James Vanhook, on or about the 26th day of May, 1919, with force and arms, acted in the county aforesaid, and within Durham township, did willfully, maliciously, and unlawfully conduct the business of dance hall, at which an admission fee was charged, he, the said James Vanhook, not having a permit for said dance from the board of aldermen against the statute in such cases made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state."

On May 7, 1919, the board of alderman of the city of Durham adopted the following ordinance:

"Be it ordained by the board of alderman of the city of Durham that no person, firm, corporation, club or organization shall give, conduct or hold any dance, or conduct or maintain any dance hall within the city of Durham for which a charge shall be made to those attending, which charge is either in the form of admission or entrance dues paid to the person, firm, corporation, club or organization giving or holding the said dance or conducting the said hall or clubroom, without first having obtained the consent of the board of alderman."

After this ordinance was adopted the defendant applied to the board for a license to conduct a dance hall in the city, and the license was refused. There was evidence for the defendant tending to show that he was "the social leader of the colored people of the city"; that he had "cultivated the fine art of dancing"; that he had "let them (aldermen) know he was a man of good character"; and that the board passed upon each application and granted or refused license in their discretion. There was evidence for the state tending to show that there had been "disturbing elements" in the defendant's dance hall, "fights and cursing," and that some arrests had been made there. The defendant kept the hall open without a license. On appeal from the recorder's court he was convicted in the superior court, and after judgment was pronounced he excepted and appealed. The only question presented is whether the ordinance is a valid exercise of the police power

R. O. Everett, of Durham, for appellant.
James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

ADAMS, J. It is conceded that the police power, regarded as an attribute of government, is inherent in the states, and is not a grant derived from the written organic law. The difficulty of drawing the boundary line which divides the police power from the other functions of government has often been recognized, but Judge Cooley's definition of the police power of a state has met the approval of many courts. He says that—

This expression "embraces the whole system of internal regulation, by which the state seeks, not only to preserve the public order and to prevent offenses against the state, but also to establish for the intercourse of citizens with citizens those rules of good manners and good neighborhood which are calculated to prevent a conflict of right and to insure to each the uninterrupted enjoyment of his own so far as is reasonably consistent with a like enjoyment of rights by others."

The police power has been described as the law of necessity, and as the power of self-protection on the part of the community. 6 R. C. L. 186. Upon the proper exercise of this power depend the life, safety, health, morals, and comfort of the citizen, the enjoyment of private and social life, the beneficial use of property, and the security of social order. Slaughterhouse Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 21 L. Ed. 394. In Pearsall v. Railway, 161 U. S. 666, 16 Sup. Ct. 705, 40 L. Ed. 838, it is said:

"And so important is this power, and so necessary to the public safety and health, that it cannot be bargained away by the Legislature, and hence it has been held that charters for purposes inconsistent with a due regard for the public health or public morals may be abrogated in the interests of a more enlightened public opinion."

[1] The legal right of the General Assembly to delegate legislative power to municipal corporations is well settled, when the power granted is such as relates to the exercise of governmental functions of limited or local character, or to other legitimate and proper municipal purposes. State v. Austin, 114 N. C. 857, 19 S. E. 919, 25 L. R. A. 283, 41 Am. St. Rep. 817; State v. Dudley, 109 S. E. 63, at this term.

[2] Chapter 56 of the Consolidated Statute is divided into three subchapters. The first deals with regulations which are independent of the act of 1917, the second, with the Municipal Corporation Act of 1917, and the third with the Municipal Finance Act. By section 2623 (7), in the first subchapter, a city or town is authorized to provide for the municipal government of its inhabitants in the manner required by law, and by section 2673 the commissioners are empowered to make ordinances, rules, and regulations for the better government of the town, not inconsistent with the law of the land. By section 2786, which is in the second subchapter, the provisions of article 15 are made applicable to all cities and towns whether or not they have adopted the plan of government, and the powers therein granted are declared to be in addition to and not in substitution of the existing powers of cities and towns. Section 2787 provides that in addition to and co-ordinate with the power granted to cities in subchapter 1, and any acts affecting such cities, all cities shall have power "to license, prohibit, and regulate pool and billiard rooms and dance halls, and in the interest of public morals provide for the revocation of such licenses." The ordinance in question was enacted in pursuance of this authority, and is clearly a valid exercise of the police power of the state. Instances of a similar exercise of the police power may be found in ordinances which prohibit disorderly conduct, or abusive or indecent language, or the entrance of an unmarried minor into a saloon, or the pursuit of one's ordinary business on Sunday; or which regulate the weighing of cotton, or the running at large of bird dogs during the closed season for quail, or vaccination for the public health, or which deal with various other situations affecting the health, comfort, morals, and safety of the people. State v. Sherrard, 117 N. C. 717, 23 S. E. 157; State v. Earnhardt, 107 N. C. 789, 12 S. E. 426; State v. Austin, 114 N. C. 855, 19 S. E. 919, 25 L. R. A. 283, 41 Am. St. Rep. 817; State v. Tyson, 111 N. C. 687, 16 S. E. 238; State v. Hay, 126 N. C. 999, 35 S. E. 459, 49 L. R. A. 588, 78 Am. St. Rep. 691; State v. Blake, 157 N. C. 609, 72 S. E. 1080; State v. Burbage, 172 N. C. 876, 89 S. E. 795.

[3] The counsel for the defendant contends that the ordinance confers upon the board of aldermen unlimited discretion in granting or refusing license, that it prescribes no uniform rule by which the board shall be guided, and that the aldermen consequently pass upon each application "according to their own pleasure." But the board is not clothed with arbitrary or unlimited discretion. Whether a license shall be granted upon application is a matter within the limited legal discretion of the board. It is true that in the absence of abuse such discretion cannot be controlled by the courts, but the ordinance is not for that reason void. Brodnax v. Groom, 64 N. C. 244, Key v. Board of Education, 170 N. C. 125, 86 S. E. 1002. Of course uniformity of operation upon all alike is essential, but this requirement is met by the express language of the ordinance.

In view of the evidence tending to show the "disturbing elements" in the defendant's hall, the "fighting and cursing" and the arrests that had been made there, we must assume that due regard for the public welfare impelled the aldermen in the exercise of their limited legal discretion to refuse the license.

The defendant's counsel relies chiefly on State v. Tenant, 110 N. C. 609, 14 S. E. 387, 15 L. R. A. 423, 28 Am. St. Rep. 715. In that case it appears that the city of Asheville had enacted the following ordinance:

"That no person, firm or corporation shall build or erect within the limits of the city any house or building of any kind or character, or otherwise add to, build upon or generally improve or change any house or building, without having first applied to the aldermen and obtained a permission for such purpose."

This ordinance was held void on the ground that it was an unwarranted interference with the ordinary incidents of ownership at the arbitrary will of the board of aldermen without valid reason, and that it had no reasonable relation to the exercise of the police powers vested in the board for the well ordering of the city. This objection cannot avail the defendant in the case before this court. Brunswick Co. v. Mecklenburg, 181 N. C. 388, 107 S. E. 317.

MANUFACTURERS' FINANCE CO. et al.
v. AMAZON COTTON MILLS CO. et al.
(No. 388.)

1. Acknowledgment ¶30—Certificate omitting venue upheld where place ascertainable by inspection of whole instrument.

A certificate of acknowledgment of a sales contract was not insufficient because it did not state the venue, where the place was stated in the contract, the notary's seal showed him to be a notary public of the county therein stated, and the clerk of the superior court certified that he was such, a literal compliance with the statute not being required if the certificate substantially conforms to the statutory provisions as to the material facts, and, if the place can be ascertained with reasonable certainty by inspection of the whole instrument, the certificate will be upheld.

2. Acknowledgment ¶36(1)—Failure to name party sworn immaterial, where name appears on same paper and refers to instrument certified.

Failure to name the party sworn in a certificate of acknowledgment is immaterial when the name appears on the same paper and refers to the instrument certified by the notary to have been subscribed before him.

3. Acknowledgment ¶29—Certificate "subscribed and sworn to before me" held sufficient.

A notary's certificate that an instrument had been "subscribed and sworn to before me" was a sufficient acknowledgment, though in the form of an affidavit and the word "acknowledge" was not used, as suggested by C. S. § 3323, a certificate that the paper was subscribed in the officer's presence being sufficient, and the additional words "and sworn to" not invalidating it, being mere surplusage.

Appeal from Superior Court, Davidson County; Webb, Judge.

Action by the Manufacturers' Finance Company and another against the Amazon Cotton Mills Company and others to recover the balance due on sale of a motor truck, and for the possession of the truck, title to which was retained as security. The purchaser, who is insolvent, having sold the truck to his codefendant, the cotton mills, the only defense set up is by said cotton mills that the acknowledgment to the contract retaining title is insufficient. The court so held, and plaintiffs appealed. Reversed.

Brooks, Hines & Smith, of Greensboro, for appellants.

Raper & Raper, of Lexington, and H. R. Kyser, of Thomasville, for appellee cotton mills.

CLARK, C. J. The sufficiency of the acknowledgment to the conditional sale retaining the title to the truck is the sole question. The instrument is full and in regular form in all respects, and was registered at the time the sale was made, as was required. C. S. § 3312. Said contract begins with the heading "State of North Carolina, County of Davidson," and specifically stipulates, "The title to said property is to remain in the vendor until the notes are fully paid." It is signed by the purchaser under seal, and has this acknowledgment:

"Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of ——. Subscribed and sworn to before me this April 17, 1920. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal, this day and date above written. R. L. Pope, N. P."

Here follows the seal of the notary public, with the addition of the sentence, "My commission expires Oct. 13, 1921," and the following:

"North Carolina, Davidson County, in Superior Court. The foregoing certificate of R. L. Pope, N. P. of Davidson County, attested by his official seal is adjudged to be in due form, and according to law. Let the instrument and certificate be registered. Witness my hand this April 24, 1920. S. J. Smith, C. S. C."

The paper was filed for registration on that same day and duly recorded as certified by the register of deeds.

The defendants objected on the ground that said contract was improperly acknowledged and not entitled to registration. The court sustained the objection, to which the plaintiff excepted and submitted to a voluntary nonsuit, which ruling is assigned as error. The defendants contend that acknowledgment is insufficient in that the venue is not stated; that the name of the grantor does not appear in the body of the acknowledgment and the acknowledgment does not mention the instrument to which it relates; that the word "acknowledge" is not used; that the identical words used in the statute (C. S. § 3323) are not used in the acknowledgment which is in the form of an affidavit.

[1] The authorities are uniform that the certificate will be upheld if the place can be ascertained with reasonable certainty by an inspection of the whole instrument. 1 R. C. L. 283; 108 Am. St. Rep. 543, note.

"It is a rule of universal application that a literal compliance with the statute is not to be required of a certificate of acknowledgment, and that, if it substantially conforms to the statutory provisions as to the material facts to be embodied therein, it is sufficient." 1 Cyc. 582.

The venue is stated in the beginning of the contract as North Carolina, Davidson county; the seal of the notary shows him to be a notary public of that county, and the clerk of the superior court certifies that he is such.

[2, 3] The failure to name the party in the certificate of acknowledgment is not material when, as here, it appears on the same paper and refers to the instrument which is certified by the notary to be "subscribed before him." 1 R. C. L. 284; Frederick v. Wilcox, 119 Ala. 355, 24 South. 582, 72 Am. St. Rep. 927. The use of the word "acknowledge" is not essential if its equivalent is used. The officer certifies that this paper was subscribed in his presence, which is a sufficient acknowledgment, and the fact that it is sworn to in no wise detracts from the sufficiency. This was unnecessary and surplusage.

In this state we have cases exactly in point. In Starke v. Etheridge, 71 N. C. 240, where a deed was proven before the clerk of the court who wrote opposite the witness' name the word "jurat" and the clerk testified that the witness did in fact acknowledge the deed, this was held sufficient. This case was cited and approved in Quinnerly v. Quinnerly, 114 N. C. 147, 19 S. E. 99, which held that the recital in the probate that the mortgagees "had procured the [paper] to be proved" was sufficient. In Devereux v. McMahon, 102 N. C. 287, 9 S. E. 636, where the certificate was simply that "the execution of the * * * deed was this day proven," it was held sufficient; the court saying that, if the essential elements appear, the certificate will be upheld regardless of mere form. In Moore v. Quickle, 159 N. C. 130, 74 S. E. 927, the court approved the above authorities and held that a presumption arises from the registration of the deed that the probate was by the proper officer, and was properly proven by him. The same authorities are cited and approved in Power Corp. v. Power & Light Co., 168 N. C. 221, 84 S. E. 398.

The simple question therefore is whether the above certificate of the notary public, who was certified to be such by the clerk of the superior court (and which was on the instrument duly admitted to registration by the register of deeds, on the adjudication of the clerk), that the instrument had been "subscribed and sworn to" before him, was equivalent to its being acknowledged. It certainly amounted to this, and even more; but, like the young lawyer who swore to his demurrer, this did not invalidate it.

Sir Jonah Barrington (Judge), in his "Irish Sketches," says that an affidavit before him for resisting an officer in serving a writ, in the wilds of Connemara, averred that—

"The defendant poked his gun at the affiant through a crack in the door, and with an oath said that if the affiant did not leave there immediately the defendant would send the affiant's soul to hell, which the affiant verily believes he would have done."

The judge did not quash the warrant on account of the surplusage.

The paper, being duly certified by the notary as "subscribed" before him, was a plenary acknowledgment, and the additional words "and sworn to" certainly could not make it invalid.

Reversed.

FELLOWS v. DOWD et al. (No. 420.)

1. Appeal and error §701(1)—Objection to charge not available in view of record.

An objection to a charge that maintaining a boiler on land and pumping water therefrom was not sufficiently notorious to constitute adverse possession was not available to defendant on appeal, where it did not appear when such occupation commenced nor how long it continued.

2. Appeal and error §900—Presumption against error.

There is a presumption against error.

3. Appeal and error §692(1)—Objections to rulings on questions not considered where witness' answer not shown.

Error in ruling on objection to question cannot be considered, where the witness' answer is not suggested nor made to appear.

Appeal from Superior Court, Moore County; Ray, Judge.

Action by B. M. Fellows against J. L. Dowd and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

L. B. Clegg, of Carthage, for appellants.

H. F. Seawell, of Carthage, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. We have carefully considered the record and find no valid reason for disturbing the results of the trial. On the issue as to title, plaintiff offered in evidence a grant to Lewis Grimm of date December 16, 1881, and mesne conveyances from the grantee to plaintiff with evidence tending to show that the grant included the land in controversy and continuous possession of plaintiff and those under whom he claimed, with assertion of ownership under his deed, etc., and deeds to the time of trial.

Defendant claiming title offered evidence tending to show that the land granted to said Grimm in 1881 was included in an older grant to David Allison of date in 1796 and also a deed from one John McLeod to Josiah Wallace of date November 26, 1852, registered on August 26, 1886, covering 10 acres of land, lying within the boundaries of plaintiff's deeds, and mesne conveyances from Josiah Wallace to defendants. Defendant showed no deed connecting his claim with the Allison grant. There was evidence tending to show possession of defendants, or those under whom they claimed, of this 10 acres, asserting ownership under these deeds from January, 1903, to January, 1906. There was also evidence to show that defendant or his predecessors at some time prior to this period had a boiler and engine on this 10 acres for the purpose of pumping water through pipes to a sawmill situated on an adjoining tract, but neither the time nor the duration of this last occupation is disclosed in the record.

Upon this, the testimony chiefly pertinent, his honor without objection noted, submitted the issue of plaintiff's title on the evidence and charged the jury that if this were established, evidence of adverse occupation by defendant from 1903 to 1906 was not sufficient to mature title in defendant's favor, the law requiring seven years under color for that result.

[1, 2] Objection is also made for that his honor charged the jury that maintaining a boiler on the land and pumping water therefrom would not constitute adverse possession of a kind to mature title, same not being sufficiently notorious. On the record, the objection as stated is not available to appellant, as it is nowhere made to appear when this occupation commenced nor how long continued. There is a presumption against error, and if this instruction is erroneous, the evidence concerning it is too indefinite to enable the court to say that any harm has been wrought by the ruling.

[3] The objections to the decisions of the court on questions of evidence are without merit. Some of them could have had no possible effect on the results of the trial, and in others the objection is to the question, and the answer of the witness not being suggested or made to appear, the court is unable to determine the significance of his honor's ruling or allow the same for error. On the record the judgment for plaintiff is affirmed.

No error.

In re NEAL'S WILL. (No. 363.)

Wills 6220—Public administrator not entitled to file caveat to will until he has qualified as administrator of particular estate.

Under C. S. §§ 17, 29, 30, the public administrator is not sufficiently interested in the estate of a decedent to file caveat to alleged will of a nullius filius, under section 4158, until he has been appointed and has qualified as administrator of the particular estate, under section 20; the right to represent the public interest, if there is a default of heirs and distributees, being in the University of North Carolina, under sections 6, 5784-5786, and Const. art. 9, § 7.

Appeal from Superior Court, Forsyth County; Long, Judge.

In the matter of the Will of John Neal, deceased. A caveat to an alleged will was filed by Charles E. Hamilton, public administrator, and from judgment of dismissal he appeals. Affirmed.

John Neal, born in Winston, N. C., a nullius filius, died in Omaha, Neb., leaving an estate estimated to be of the value of $800,000 or over. On October 19, 1920, what was claimed to be a copy of a lost or destroyed will, disposing of his property and appointing the Wachovia Bank & Trust Company executor and trustee, was admitted to probate in the superior court of Forsyth.

The caveat was duly filed to said will by Jenny Beckerdite, of Washington, D. C., claiming to be the mother of said John Neal, and by one Mary Harbin McCoy and her son, Tharry McCoy, of Okmulgee, Okl., claiming to be the wife and son of said John Neal, and in addition, on April 19, 1921, the appellant, Charles E. Hamilton, public administrator of Forsyth, filed his petition for caveat, upon the ground that he was entitled to qualify and that his interest in the commissions which would accrue was such "interest in the estate" as would entitle him to maintain a caveat to contest the validity of the copy of the alleged will, and also to contest the claim of Jenny Beckerdite to be the mother of the deceased and of Mary Harbin McCoy and her son to be the wife and son of the deceased. The court dismissed the petition of said Charles E. Hamilton, public administrator, and he appealed.

Lindsay Patterson and H. G. Hudson, both of Winston-Salem, for appellant.

Manly, Hendren & Womble, of Winston-Salem, for Wachovia Bank & Trust Co.

L. M. Swink, of Winston-Salem, and B. S. Royster, of Oxford, for residuary legatees.

M. L. Learned, of Omaha, Neb., and Craige & Vogler, of Winston-Salem, for special legatees.

CLARK, C. J. The petition was properly dismissed. A party entitled to file a caveat under C. S. 4158 must be some one "entitled under such will, or interested in the estate." It being admitted that the deceased was nullius filius, there could be no one coming within that designation except (1) his mother, if living; (2) his wife and child, if proven to be such; and (3) the University of North Carolina, should it be found that the deceased left neither mother nor wife nor children.

A public administrator is a position created by chapter 113, Laws 1868-69, now C. S. 17. He has no interest in or control over any estate until appointed thereto by the clerk and qualified. C. S. 20. It is not necessary to discuss whether his prospective commissions are such an interest as would entitle him to caveat the will, for he has not been appointed administrator of this estate, and has no interest whatever therein.

Under C. S. 20, the public administrator can apply for letters of administration "when the period of six months has elapsed from the death of any decedent, and no letters testamentary, or letters of administration or collection, have been applied for and issued to any person," and even then such public administrator is not entitled in all cases to be appointed. See citations under that section.

In this case the Wachovia Bank & Trust Company has already been appointed, and there is no ground upon which the public administrator can be entitled to qualify unless such administration is set aside upon a caveat of the will or by order of the clerk for other sufficient cause.

In the trial of the caveat now pending, it must be determined whether the mother is living, or whether the deceased left a wife and child, as alleged, and in the trial of such caveat the University of North Carolina is a proper party, as, in view of the claims of the first two parties being negated, the University would be entitled to the property, if the will is set aside, by the terms of the charter of that institution in 1789 (chapter 305), which conferred upon it all property escheating for lack of heirs and distributees, or otherwise. If the contest should be decided in favor of either of these three parties and the alleged will should be set aside, the administration would be conferred upon the successful contestant, or some one selected at the request of such party. In no event has the public administrator any right to be appointed to administer until the successful party has waived its right to do so, C. S. 29 and 30. The position of public administrator confers no right to administration until the parties having the prior right to qualify have waived their right or been adjudged unfit by the clerk. He has no interest in the estate and no right to qualify unless and until appointed to the particular estate by the clerk. Until so appointed he is simply an "eligible" for appointment upon the default of the parties who have a prior right to appointment. 24 Corpus Juris, p. 1201, § 2873, note (a).

The right of succeeding by escheat to all property, when there is no wife or parties entitled under the statutes of descent and distribution, was conferred upon the University by its charter in 1789 (chapter 306, § 2), and has been confirmed since by the state Constitution (article 9, § 7), and has been extended by several statutes, which are now C. S. 5784, 5785, and 5786. This is a most valuable right, which will become more and more a source of revenue to the University as the state grows in wealth and population. One of the first cases in which the matter was presented is University v. Johnston, 2 N. C. 373, and among those since have been two recent cases, one from Wilmington and the other from Goldsboro (Grantham v. Jinnette, 177 N. C. 229, 98 S. E. 724), out of which the University became entitled, under decisions of this court, to receive very considerable sums.

The University therefore is the proper, if not necessary, party to represent the public interest, if there is a default of heirs and distributees; but the public administrator is not when he has not been appointed and qualified upon the estate in question. C. S. 6.

This contest turns upon the validity of the alleged will, a copy of which has been probated in common form in lieu of the alleged original will. The parties who are entitled to urge the caveat to set aside this probate are, as already stated, the alleged mother, the alleged wife and son, and the University of North Carolina.

The judgment dismissing the petition of the public administrator is affirmed.

STACY, J., concurs in result.

STATE v. SKEEN. (No. 381.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 9, 1921.)

1. Criminal law § 448(11)—Testimony as to appearance of defendant held admissible.

In prosecution for larceny of automobile in which defendant claimed an alibi, testimony of witness who had tracked the stolen automobile to defendant's house eleven or twelve miles, that defendant's clothes were damp, that his shoes were muddy and looked as if they had not been unlaced in several days, held admissible as against contention that testimony should have been confined to a statement of facts without witness giving any opinion or stating impression gathered from the circumstances as they appeared to him at the time.

2. Larceny § 70(3)—Receiving stolen goods § 9(2)—Instruction that defendant was guilty if he had aided and abetted others held warranted by evidence.

In prosecution for larceny of automobile and receiving same knowing it to be stolen, where defendant claimed some one else had stolen the car and left it in his yard, evidence held to warrant instruction authorizing conviction if defendant aided or abetted others in stealing the automobile.

3. Criminal law § 56(5)—Persons who aided and abetted each other and are present during commission of crime are "principals."

Where two persons aid and abet each other in the commission of a crime and are both present when crime was committed, they are both principals and are equally guilty.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Principal.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Davidson County; Finley, Judge.

Harrison Skeen was convicted on an indictment charging larceny and receiving stolen property knowing it to have been stolen, and he appeals. No error.

The indictment charged the defendant with the larceny of a Ford automobile, with a count in the bill charging him with receiving same, knowing it to have been stolen. The defendant entered a plea of not guilty and offered evidence tending to establish an alibi, or that, at the time in question, he was some 12 or 15 miles from the scene of the crime. Upon the traverse, thus joined, there was a verdict and judgment against the defendant, from which he appealed.

Raper & Raper, of Lexington, and Hastings & Whicker and McMichael & Johnson, all of Winston-Salem, for appellant.

J. S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

STACY, J. [1] The defendant's first exception is to the admission, over his objection, of the following evidence:

T. A. Sink testified:

"Am a neighbor of Mr. Stuart—not related to him. Heard about stolen car about 20 minutes after one. Got up and dressed. Met them and got in car. Tracked car to Skeen's house, 11 or 12 miles. Skeen's in Abbott's Creek township. Got out of Nifong's car and tracked car to house. Skeen came out; clothes damp; shoes muddy; looked like. Didn't look like they had been unlaced in several days."

Defendant bases his objection to this evidence upon the ground that the witness should have been confined to a statement of the facts without giving any opinion, or stating what impressions he gathered from the circumstances as they appeared to him at the time. We do not think the testimony of this witness is objectionable as incompetent opinion evidence. He stated the facts leading up to the meeting, and then undertook to describe the defendant's appearance:

"His clothes were damp; shoes muddy; looked like. Didn't look like they had been unlaced in several days."

This was only a shorthand method of giving the facts as they appeared to the witness. It was proper for him to state "the instantaneous conclusions of the mind as to the appearance, condition, or mental or physical state of persons, animals, and things, derived from observation of a variety of facts presented to the senses at one and the same time." McKelvey, Ev. 174; Hudson v. R. R., 176 N. C. 488, 97 S. E. 388.

"It would be a hopeless task for the most gifted person to clothe in language all the minute particulars, with their necessary accompaniments and qualifications, which have led to the conclusion which he has formed." Dewitt v. Barley, 9 N. Y. 371; 22 O. J. 551; State v. Spencer, 176 N. C. 709, 97 S. E. 155.

[2] The second exception is to the following portion of his honor's charge:

"If you are satisfied from this testimony beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant is guilty of stealing the car, either by stealing it himself (or aiding and abetting others in stealing it) you will find him guilty; if not so satisfied, you will find him not guilty."

[3] The defendant objects to the expression in parenthesis, "or aiding and abetting others in stealing it"; but we are unable to see any error in this statement. The defendant contended that some one else had stolen the car and left it in his yard. This was entirely sufficient to support the charge, especially when coupled with evidence of the defendant's damp clothes and muddy shoes, from which it could reasonably be inferred that he too had been riding. The law is well settled that where two persons aid and abet each other in the commission of a crime, both being present, both are principals and equally guilty. State v. Jarrell, 141 N. C. 722, 53 S. E. 127, 8 Ann. Cas. 438; State v. Fox, 94 N. C. 928.

The other exceptions are without merit; and, upon consideration of the whole case, we conclude that the trial in the superior court must be upheld.

No error.

BLACKNALL v. HANCOCK et al. (No. 98.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 9, 1921.)

1. Mortgages \S 176—Deed of trust valid as against others only from date of registration, notwithstanding their knowledge thereof.

Under C. S. \S 3311, providing that no deed of trust or mortgage on real estate shall be valid to pass any property as against creditors or purchasers for value from the mortgagor, but from the registration thereof in the county where the land lies, no notice, however full or formal, shall avail to defeat a prior registration.

2. Mortgages \S 163(2)—Priority of mortgage liens determined by dates of registration.

Plaintiff's trust deed, executed March 24, 1920, proved and filed for registration March 26, 1920, indexed in March, but date not given, but appearing on the index docket after the deed under which the defendant claims, which latter deed was executed March 23, 1920, proved and filed for registration March 23, 1920, appearing on the index docket above plaintiff's deed, defendant has the prior lien on the face of the record, prevailing by reference to time of filing March 23, 1920, as against March 26, 1920, the date when plaintiff's deed was filed, C. S. \S 3311, providing that the date of registration determines priority.

3. Subrogation \S 26 — Subrogation does not prevail in favor of volunteer.

The principle of subrogation does not prevail in favor of a mere volunteer.

4. Subrogation \S 33(2)—Party substituted acquires only rights of person for whom substituted.

In a suit to have plaintiff's deed of trust declared a prior lien to defendant's, the latter deed having been first registered, plaintiff's claim of subrogation to the rights of a creditor whose claim plaintiff's money had paid off could not prevail against the duly registered deed of defendant, the claim paid never having been a lien to which plaintiff could be substituted.

5. Mortgages \S 183—Reference to lien of prior deed not a recognition of prior lien to defeat registration laws.

As respects right to have plaintiff's deed declared a prior lien to defendant's, the latter's deed first having been registered, reference in the latter deed to the incumbrance of plaintiff's deed does not recognize the validity of a superior lien, except it comply with the registration laws.

Appeal from Superior Court, Vance County; Cranmer, Judge.

Suit by C. L. Blacknall against F. W. Hancock and others, to restrain sale under deed of trust. On motion to dissolve restraining order and counter motion to make same permanent. Restraining order dissolved, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Civil action heard on motion to dissolve a restraining order, and counter motion by plaintiff to make same permanent, and by consent, before his honor E. H. Cranmer, judge, at chambers in Henderson, N. C., on March 17, 1921. Plaintiff, holding a debt of $1,579.87, secured by a deed of trust on realty in said county, brings the action to restrain the sale by defendant Hancock under a deed of trust on same property, to secure two notes of $850 each, and have the latter deed declared a lien subsequent to that of plaintiff and to remove same as a cloud to plaintiff's claim and interest under his deed. The facts more directly pertinent and the ruling of the court thereon are embodied in the judgment as follows:

"This action coming on to be heard before Hon. E. H. Cranmer, judge, at Chambers, in Henderson, N. C., on the 17th day of March, 1921, and the same being heard on the motion of the plaintiff for a permanent injunction against defendants foreclosing a trust deed executed by J. H. Harvey and wife on the 20th day of March, 1920, to F. W. Hancock, trustee, which trust deed was filed for registration on March 23, 1920, unless or until the said trustee or Harvey shall pay to plaintiff the sum of $1,579.87, with interest from March 24, 1920; the court, having heard the evidence and arguments of counsel, doth find the following facts:

"That J. H. Harvey contracted to buy 64 acres of land from Miss Martha Edwards, and paid the purchase money thereof, except the sum of $1,075 as of March 8, 1920; before the transaction was closed, Miss Edwards died, and after her death her heirs executed a deed in fee for said land, which deed was dated March 8, 1920; upon the execution of the said deed to said Harvey he at once executed and delivered to T. T. Hicks a deed in trust upon said land to secure the balance of the purchase money, $1,075, with 6 per cent. interest thereon, said trust deed bearing date March 8, 1920; the said deed and trust deed were both duly probated, the registration fees paid, and they were filed for registration contemporaneously in the office of the register of deeds for Vance county on the 10th day of March, 1920; the trust deed was never actually recorded upon the books, and no index thereof was made.

"On the 20th day of March, 1920, the said J. H. Harvey and wife executed and delivered to F. W. Hancock a deed in trust upon the said land to secure the payment of two notes for $850 each, due November 1, 1920, and November 1, 1921, being the balance purchase price due for one Kline automobile. The said trust deed was duly probated and filed for registration in the office of the register of deeds for Vance county on the 23d day of March, 1920, at 5 o'clock p. m., and appears of record in said county in Book 99, at page 317; the date of actual registration on the book is not given, but it is indexed, and the word 'March' is written on the line of its index at the beginning of the line. A deed in trust filed April 8, 1920, is recorded, on the page next before it. The Hancock trust deed is indexed three lines above the $1,579.87 trust deed, which also has the word 'March' at the beginning of its line. On the 24th day of March, 1920, the said J. H. Harvey and wife executed and delivered to T. T. Hicks a deed in trust upon the same above-mentioned land to secure the payment of the sum of $1,579.87. This trust deed was duly probated and filed for registration in the office of the register of deeds for Vance county on the 26th day of March, 1920, at 4:30 o'clock p. m. and appears of record in said county in Book 95, p. 415; the date of actual registration on the book is not given, but it is indexed in March, 1920, after the trust deed to F. W. Hancock.

"The plaintiff paid off the amount of balance due for purchase money on said land out of the $1,579.87 loaned said Harvey, and on March 28, 1920, the date the trust deed securing said $1,579.87 was filed for registration, and after its filing, the trustee, finding the $1,075.00 trust deed was not recorded, withdrew it from the office of the register of deeds; that is the one which had been filed for registration March 10, 1920, but which had never been actually registered or indexed upon the record. The debt secured in the trust deed to Hancock has not been satisfied.

"Upon the foregoing findings of fact the court doth adjudge that the restraining order issued in this action by Hon. John Kerr, judge, be, and the same is hereby, dissolved, the court being of opinion that the trust deed executed by said J. H. Harvey and wife to F. W. Hancock on the 20th day of March, 1920, and filed for registration on 23d day of March, 1920, is a first and prior lien on the land described in the complaint herein, and that plaintiff is not entitled to be subrogated to the rights of Edwards under the $1,075 trust deed.

"The plaintiff is taxed with the costs of the action."

Plaintiff excepted and appealed.

T. T. Hicks & Son, of Henderson, for appellant.

F. W. Hancock, Jr., of Oxford, and A. C. & J. P. Zollcoffer, of Henderson, for appellees.

HOKE, J. [1] The statute applicable (section 3311, Consolidated Statutes) provides in effect that no deed of trust or mortgage on real estate, etc., shall be valid to pass any property as against creditors or purchasers for value from the donor, bargainor, or mortgagor, but from the registration thereof in the county where the land lies, and the court decisions in this state construing the law have insistently held that no notice, however full or formal, shall avail to defeat a prior registration. Fertilizer Co. v. Lane, 173 N. C. 184, 91 S. E. 953; Blalock v. Strain, 122 N. C. 283, 29 S. E. 408; Quinerly v. Quinerly, 114 N. C. 145, 19 S. E. 99.

[2] From a perusal of the facts stated in the judgment it appears that the deed of trust under which plaintiff directly claims, being the deed to secure $1,579.87 from Harvey and wife to T. T. Hicks, trustee, was executed March 24, 1920, proven and filed for registration March 26, indexed in March, 1920, exact date not given, but appearing on the index docket after the deed under which defendant claims. That the deed of trust to defendant, F. W. Hancock, trustee, to secure the $850 notes, executed March 23, 1920, was duly proven and filed for registration March 23, 1920, appearing on the index docket of the county registry as of March, 1920, above the deed to T. T. Hicks, trustee, and presumably prior thereto.

From these findings, therefore, and by express provision of the statute, as between the two, the deed of defendant has the prior lien, and in any event, on the facts of this record, the priority of defendant's deed should prevail by reference to the time of filing, March 23, 1920, as against March 26, the date when plaintiff's deed was filed. Power Co. v. Power Co., 175 N. C. 668, 96 S. E. 99; Glanton & Cotton v. Jacobs, 117 N. C. 427, 23 S. E. 335.

[3, 4] It is urged on behalf of plaintiff that, inasmuch as a portion of the money advanced on the security of plaintiff's present deed of trust to the amount of $1,075 was used in payment of the original purchase money to the Edwards heirs, and that a deed of trust to secure the same had been proved and filed for registration March 10, 1920, to that extent plaintiff should of right be subrogated to this claim as a prior lien on the property; but in our opinion the position cannot be maintained. It is recognized that the principle of subrogation does not prevail in favor of a mere volunteer, but if it be conceded that the position might arise to plaintiff by reason of a permissible inference that he paid off the Edwards debt at the request of the debtor, and under an implied agreement that he might thus acquire the benefits of the lien (see Liles v. Rodgers, 113 N. C. 190, 18 S. E. 104, 37 Am. St. Rep. 627, citing 2 Beach on Modern Equity Jurisprudence, § 801) the position would not avail plaintiff on the facts of this record, for, as against defendant, holding under a duly registered instrument, the Edwards heirs never acquired any lien, and there is none to which plaintiff can be substituted. The facts showing that, before same was ever put on the registry, or indexed, the deed securing the Edwards debt was withdrawn from the files and the purchase money paid in full.

The position referred to is very well stated in 27 American Encyclopedia of Law (2d Ed.) at page 206, as follows:

"The rights acquired by a party entitled to subrogation cannot be extended beyond the rights of the party under whom subrogation is claimed, subrogation contemplating some original privilege on the part of him to whose place substitution is claimed, and where no such privilege exists, or where it has been waived by the creditor, there is nothing on which the right can be based."

[5] Again, it is insisted that plaintiff's claim to the extent of the purchase money debt paid to the Edwards heirs should be held superior because the deed of trust under which defendant claims is in recognition of the Edwards lien, and under the principle approved in Hinton v. Leigh, 102 N. C. 28, 8 S. E. 890, but on the facts presented, this exception also must be overruled. In Hinton v. Leigh, the court held that the claim under a later registered mortgage should be preferred to claims secured by a subsequent deed of trust, but which had been first registered, but this was on the ground that, by correct interpretation, the deed of trust fully recognized the validity of the mortgage and conveyed the land to the trustee only as subject to the mortgage lien. But the position does not prevail from the fact that in the instant case the deed of trust to defendant in the covenant against incumbrances merely excepts the claim then existent in favor of the Edwards heirs. The present comes clearly within Piano Co. v. Spruill, 150 N. C. 166, 63 S. E. 723, and that class of cases which hold that a mere reference to the existence of a prior incumbrance does not recognize its validity as a superior lien except as it may comply with requirements of our registration laws.

We deem it not improper to refer to a statute of the recent session of the Legislature (Pub. Laws 1921, c. 114), amending 3553 of Consolidated Statutes, and which may have an important bearing on the priority of liens as determined by the date of filing in connection with the indexing and cross-indexing of instruments. The matter is not further pursued as the law does not seem to affect the rights of the parties to this controversy. We deem it desirable, however, that the attention of the profession and officials shall be called to the existence of the statute.

We find no error in the present record, and the judgment for defendant is affirmed.

Affirmed.

STATE v. MARTIN. (No. 352.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 9, 1921.)

1. Criminal law §752½—In motion to dismiss for insufficient evidence, only evidence favorable to state considered.

On motion to dismiss a prosecution because the evidence taken as a whole was not sufficient to sustain a conviction, only such evidence as was favorable to the state is considered.

2. Abortion §11—Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction for procuring.

In prosecution for procuring an abortion, evidence of defendant's acts, statements, and communications held sufficient to sustain a conviction.

3. Witnesses §211(4)—Presiding judge may compel testimony of physician as to statements of defendant if necessary to administration of justice.

C. S. § 1798, providing that no physician shall be required to disclose information acquired in his professional character unless in the opinion of the presiding judge such disclosure is necessary to the administration of justice, the testimony of a physician, attending a patient for whom an alleged abortion has been procured, of the statements and admissions of the defendant are admissible.

4. Criminal law \S 407(1), 736(2)—Statements of woman on whom abortion was performed, made in defendant's presence, admissible, and question whether defendant heard her is for jury.

In prosecution for procuring an abortion testimony of the physician as to statements made by the woman in the presence of defendant are properly admitted, it being in the province of the jury to determine from the evidence whether the woman's statements were made in the presence and hearing of defendant, whether they were understood by him, and whether he denied them or remained silent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Forsyth County; Long, Judge.

Robert Martin was convicted of procuring an abortion, and he appeals. No error.

The defendant was prosecuted for a breach of sections 4226 and 4227 of the Consolidated Statutes upon the following bill of indictment:

"The jurors for the state upon their oath present: That Robert L. Martin, late of the county of Forsyth, on the 28th day of June, in the year of our Lord 1921, with force and arms, at and in the county aforesaid, unlawfully and willfully and feloniously did administer to Rosa Yow, a woman pregnant and quick with child, and did prescribe for said Rosa Yow and advised and procured said Rosa Yow to take certain medicines, drugs, and other substances, and used and employed other instruments and money with intent to destroy said child, the same not being necessary to preserve the life of the mother, contrary to form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state.

"And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath, do further present that Robert L. Martin, at time aforesaid, with force and arms, at and in county aforesaid, unlawfully, willfully, and feloniously did administer to Rosa Yow, a pregnant woman, and prescribe for said pregnant woman, and advise and procure said Rosa Yow to take medicine, drugs, and other things, with intent thereby to procure the miscarriage of said Rosa Yow, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state."

The jury convicted the defendant, who, after judgment was pronounced, appealed. He has assigned several errors, among them the refusal of his honor to dismiss the action as in case of nonsuit. The state introduced only two witnesses, Dr. Mimms and W. P. Yow, a brother of Rosa. The defendant offered no evidence. The evidence most favorable to the state tended to show the facts to be as herein stated. Rosa Yow was 18 or 19 years of age. Several months before the indictment she had married a man named Howard Daye, with whom she lived only a short time. On Saturday she went to her brother's house, which was 4 or 5 miles from Winston-Salem, and on the next Monday at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, suffered an abortion, or miscarriage. On Monday night Dr. Mimms was called to see her, and found her in bed slightly bleeding. At the time of the abortion, or miscarriage, she was advanced in pregnancy from two to four months. The defendant accompanied Dr. Mimms on this visit, and told him that another doctor had charged $200 for the operation, one-half of which the defendant had paid by a check which he had destroyed after it was cashed. On this visit Dr. Mimms and the defendant went into Rosa's bedroom, the defendant seating himself on a sofa in one corner of the room. The defendant was drinking, and occasionally "opened up and said something," and Dr. Mimms, while not positive, thought the defendant was awake, and, if awake, could hear Rosa's conversation with the witness. In the presence of the defendant Rosa told Dr. Mimms that since becoming pregnant she had desired a miscarriage, and had called on a physician, who charged her $200; that the defendant had given her a check for $100, which, with $100 of her own money, she had paid this physician; that the physician when the money was paid took her into a room, laid her on a table, used some kind of instrument in packing something in her womb, and gave her medicine to take. She said this doctor, after getting his money, refused to visit her, and the defendant said he had phoned him to go, and he ought to have gone. At one time the defendant paid Dr. Mimms $60. Defendant made another visit with Dr. Mimms. On the second Saturday night next preceding the first visit, the defendant and Rosa called at Dr. Mimms' office, but left there while he was attending a call; and five or six days before this visit Rosa had come to his office alone. In the presence of others she addressed the defendant in endearing terms, and they were very affectionate. There were other circumstances tending to show their intimate relation.

ADAMS, J. [1, 2] The defendant's motion to dismiss the action was based on the conception that the evidence taken as a whole was not sufficient to sustain a conviction; but in deciding this motion we need consider only such evidence as was favorable to the state, without special regard to that on which the defendant relied. The immediate question is whether the evidence, when given a liberal yet reasonable construction, had legal sufficiency to convict. If it was sufficient to support the charge in either count, it was not permissible to withdraw it from the jury. Considering the evidence as correctly portraying the circumstances under which the abortion or miscarriage was accomplished, we are of opinion that the verdict of the jury was amply justified, and that his honor properly denied the defendant's motion. The association of the defendant and the woman, their call at Dr. Mimms' office a week before she went to her brother's home; the defendant's payment of one-half the fee charged by the physician who "packed something in her womb," and prescribed the "black medicine," and his subsequent solicitude in urging this physician to attend her; the defendant's visits to her in company with Dr. Mimms, together with various other circumstances, were sufficiently convincing to warrant the jury in connecting the defendant with the unfortunate occurrence. State v. Carlson, 171 N. C. 818, 89 S. E. 80; State v. Clark, 173 N. C. 745, 91 S. E. 872; State v. Bridgers, 172 N. C. 882, 89 S. E. 804.

[3] Dr. Mimms related the circumstances attending his first visit to Rosa Yow, described her physical condition, and testified to certain statements made by her in the defendant's presence tending to implicate the defendant in the commission of the crime. To this evidence the defendant excepted, on the ground that it divulged information which the witness had confidentially acquired in his professional capacity.

At common law no privilege existed as to communications between physician and patient. The physician, when called upon to testify, had no right to decline or refuse to disclose information on the ground that such information had been communicated to him confidentially in the course of his attendance upon or treatment of his patient in a professional capacity. The public interest in the disclosure of all facts relevant to a litigated issue was deemed to be superior to the policy of recognizing, for the benefit of the patient, the inviolability of confidential communications. Hence, statutes have been enacted in practically every jurisdiction making communications between physician and patient privileged from compulsory disclosure. Fuller v. Knights of Pythias, 129 N. C. 323, 40 S. E. 65, 85 Am. St. Rep. 744; Smith v. Lumber Co., 147 N. C. 63, 60 S. E. 717, 125 Am. St. Rep. 535, 15 Ann. Cas. 580; 28 R. O. L. 517. In some jurisdictions the privilege is absolute, and in others qualified. Our statute is in the latter class.

"No person, duly authorized to practice physic or surgery, shall be required to disclose any information which he may have acquired in attending a patient in a professional character, and which information was necessary to enable him to prescribe for such patient as a physician, or to do any act for him as a surgeon: Provided, that the presiding judge of a superior court may compel such disclosure, if in his opinion the same is necessary to a proper administration of justice." C. S. § 1798.

In Smith v. Lumber Co., supra, this statute has been construed as extending not only to information orally communicated by the patient, but to knowledge obtained by the physician or surgeon through his own observation or examination while attending the patient in a professional capacity, and which was necessary to enable him to prescribe. In that opinion Justice Hoke further said:

"And it is further held, uniformly, so far as we have examined, that the privilege established is for the benefit of the patient alone, and that same may be insisted on or waived by him in his discretion, subject to the limitations provided by the statute itself:

"(1) That the matter is placed entirely in the control of the presiding judge, who may always direct an answer, when in his opinion same is necessary to a proper administration of justice.

"(2) That the privilege only extends to information acquired while attending as physician in a professional capacity, and which information is necessary to enable him to prescribe for such patient as a physician. 4 Wigmore, § 2286c."

If the privilege is for the benefit of the patient alone, how can the defendant invoke its aid? Even if it be contended that the privilege was available to him on the ground that some of the communications were made in his presence, that Rosa became a party to the crime by consenting to the abortion, that she is living, and that the physician's testimony would tend not only to convict him but to discredit her, and that the evidence objected to was for these reasons incompetent, a complete answer is found in the proviso of the statute, and in his honor's statement that in his discretion he not only permitted but required Dr. Mimms to testify when called as a witness for the state. His honor no doubt did so because in his opinion the testimony of Dr. Mimms was necessary to a proper administration of justice.

[4] The testimony of this witness as to statements made by the woman in the presence of the defendant was properly admitted. True, the witness said that the defendant had been drinking, and was sitting in a corner of the room when the statements were made; but he testified also that the defendant, while near enough the woman to hear her remarks, occasionally said something himself, and that the witness, although not positive, thought the defendant was awake. It was the province of the jury to determine from the evidence whether the woman's statements were made in the hearing as well as in the presence of the defendant, whether they were understood by him, and whether he denied them or remained silent. State v. Bowman, 80 N. C. 437; State v. Crockett, 82 N. C. 599; State v. Burton, 94 N. C. 948; State v. Raudall,

170 N. C. 762, 87 S. E. 227, Ann. Cas. 1918A, 438.

We have given due consideration to the remaining exceptions, and find them to be without merit. His honor presented both the law and the evidence in such manner as to enlighten the jury concerning the nature, scope, and merits of all matters in controversy between the state and the defendant. We find no error, and this will be certified to the superior court of Forsyth county.

No error.

BOARD OF COM'RS OF STOKES COUNTY
v. GEORGE. (No. 395.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 9, 1921.)

1. Jury ⇨10—Provision as to inviolability of "trial by jury" in all "controversies at law" respecting property construed; "trial."

Const. art. 1, § 19, providing, "In all controversies at law respecting property, * * * trial by jury * * * ought to remain sacred and inviolable," guarantees such trial only as to every issue of fact properly raised by the pleadings in a civil action, "controversies at law" including all such actions in which facts involving either legal or equitable elements are pleaded, but not questions of fact or proceedings which are purely equitable, "trial" referring to a dispute and issue of fact, and "trial by jury" not necessarily signifying that every legal controversy is to be determined by a jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Controversy; Trial; Trial by Jury.]

2. Jury ⇨19(1)—Act requiring ascertainment of damages to personalty by freeholders held not to abridge right of trial by jury.

C. S. § 1681, requiring the county commissioners, on complaint of injury to or destruction of property by a dog, to appoint three freeholders to ascertain the amount of damages and reasonable expenses, and to order payment of the same from the dog tax, requiring the owner of the dog to "reimburse the county to the amount paid out," and authorizing the commissioners to sue therefor, is not in violation of Const. art. 1, § 19, guaranteeing trial by jury in all controversies at law respecting property, the dog owner's right to such trial being protected by the provision empowering the commissioners to bring suit, and the requirement as to reimbursement importing, not that he is bound by the freeholders' award, but that the commissioners shall not recover more than the amount paid.

3. Animals ⇨88—Costs payable by dog owner reimbursing county for "amount paid out for injury."

Under C. S. § 1681, requiring county commissioners, on complaint of injury to property by a dog, to appoint freeholders to ascertain damages, including reasonable expenses, and to order payment thereof from the dog tax, requiring the dog owner to reimburse the county to the "amount paid out for such injury," and authorizing the commissioners to sue therefor, the commissioners may recover not only the amount of damages assessed by the freeholders, but the reasonable costs incurred; the "amount paid out for such injury" importing the amount paid out on account thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Amount.]

4. Evidence ⇨320, 501(8)—Testimony of nonexpert witness based on personal observation admissible, and not hearsay.

In county commissioners' action to recover amount paid by county, pursuant to C. S. § 1681, for the death of sheep killed by defendant's dog, testimony of a nonexpert witness based on personal observation of the carcasses as to the time that had elapsed since the death of the sheep was admissible, and not hearsay, and was not an expression of a theoretic or scientific opinion or a deduction from the testimony of others.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stokes County; Finley, Judge.

Section 1681 of Consolidated Statutes is as follows:

"The money arising under the provisions of this article shall be applied to the school funds of the county in which said tax is collected: Provided, it shall be the duty of the county commissioners, upon complaint made to them of injury to person or injury to or destruction of property by any dog, upon satisfactory proof of such injury or destruction, to appoint three freeholders to ascertain the amount of damages done, including necessary treatment, if any, and all reasonable expenses incurred, and upon the coming in of the report of such jury of the damage as aforesaid, the said county commissioners shall order the same paid out of any moneys arising from the tax on dogs as provided for in this article. And in cases where the owner of such dog or dogs is known or can be ascertained, he shall reimburse the county to the amount paid out for such injury or destruction. To enforce collection of this amount the county commissioners are hereby authorized and empowered to sue for the same."

C. H. Lunsford made complaint that certain of his sheep had been killed by dogs, and the board of commissioners appointed three freeholders to ascertain the amount of his damages. These freeholders made the following report:

"To the Board of County Commissioners of Stokes County, North Carolina: Jurors appointed by the board in the above-entitled matter to make inquiry into and assess the damages of C. H. Lunsford most respectfully report to the board:

"That in obedience to the order, and after due notice to the claimant, and also to Walter George, the alleged owner of the dogs, they met at Capella, in Stokes county, N. C., on the 31st day of January, 1920, and proceeded to hear the evidence offered, and find the said claimant lost four sheep killed by dogs, and had one other sheep injured, and upon the evidence we find that Walter W. George's dogs were in the sheep pasture, but no evidence that they killed the sheep, and they assess the damages sustained by the claimant at $43.

"Respectfully reported this, the 31st day of January, 1920.

"R. B. Tuttle.

"D. F. Tillotson.

"J. H. Covington.

"Fees for services:

J. H. Covington.....	$4.00
D. F. Tillotson.....	4.00
R. B. Tuttle.....	4.00"

In May, 1920, the plaintiff brought suit against the defendant before a justice of the peace to reimburse the county to the amount paid out on account of the sheep killed and injured. On appeal the case was tried in the superior court, the issue and the answer being as follows:

"Is the defendant indebted to the plaintiff, and, if so, in what amount? A. $55."

Judgment was entered, and the defendant, having noted exceptions, appealed to this court.

McMichael & Johnson, of Winston-Salem, for appellant.

N. O. Petree, of Danbury, for appellee.

ADAMS, J. The defendant's counsel denounces the validity of the statute in question on the ground that it deprives his client of rights and privileges guaranteed by the organic law. His chief objection is based on the proposition that the statutory provision for the assessment of damages by three freeholders is an express denial of the right of trial by jury. We do not understand the defendant's counsel to contend that the provision is in conflict with the "due process clause" of the federal Constitution, for the Supreme Court of the United States has held that the Seventh Amendment relates only to trials in the federal courts, and that trial by jury in suits at common law in the state courts, is not a privilege or immunity of national citizenship which the states are forbidden by the Fourteenth Amendment to abridge. Walker v. Sauvinet, 92 U. S. 90, 23 L. Ed. 678; Montana Co. v. Mining Co., 152 U. S. 171, 14 Sup. Ct. 506, 38 L. Ed. 398; Marvin v. Trout, 199 U. S. 212, 26 Sup. Ct. 81, 50 L. Ed. 157. But he insists that the statute conflicts with article 1, § 19, of the Constitution of North Carolina, which is as follows:

"In all controversies at law respecting property, the ancient mode of trial by jury is one of the best securities of the rights of the people, and ought to remain sacred and inviolable."

[1] The words "controversies at law" include all civil actions in which facts, involving either legal or equitable elements, are put in issue by the pleadings, but they do not include questions of fact, or proceedings which are purely equitable. Porter v. Armstrong, 134 N. C. 447, 46 S. E. 997; Caldwell v. Wilson, 121 N. C. 425, 28 S. E. 554; Worthy v. Shields, 90 N. C. 192.

[2] "Trial" refers to a dispute and issue of fact, and the expression "trial by jury" as used in the statute does not necessarily signify that every legal controversy is to be determined by a jury. The section under consideration guarantees to the citizen the right to have submitted to and determined by a jury every issue of fact properly and legally raised by the pleadings in a civil action. If the statute before us were in conflict with such constitutional provision, it could not be sustained. But it does not purport to abridge the defendant's right. Conceding that the defendant, although duly notified, was not required to attend the hearing before the freeholders, and therefore was not barred by their award, still it does not necessarily follow that the provision for the assessment of damages is for this reason in conflict with the Constitution. The statute is a police regulation evidently designed as between the claimant and the county to fix a limitation upon the demand of the former and upon the liability of the latter. When the claimant invokes the aid of the statute and elects to abide by the method therein prescribed, he cannot thereafter claim either from the county or from the owner of the animal any damages in excess of the amount awarded by the freeholders. But the amount awarded the claimant is not an estoppel upon the owner of the dog. The latter's right of trial by jury is not denied, but is amply protected by the provision which empowers the commissioners to bring suit. When such suit is brought, the owner of the dog may submit to the jury any issues joined upon the pleadings, and by this means preserve his constitutional right. The sentence, "He shall reimburse the county to the amount paid out for such injury or destruction," imports, not that the defendant is bound by the freeholders' award, but that the commissioners shall not in any event recover more than the amount paid to the claimant.

Upon the trial it would be incumbent upon the commissioners to show by the preponderance of the evidence that the defendant was the owner of the dog, as well as the amount of the damage; and it would be open to the defendant to rely upon failure of the plaintiff's proof, and, if necessary, upon evidence offered in rebuttal. This construction of the statute affords the owner of the dog the opportunity to present every defense he would be entitled to in case of suit brought by the owner of the injured or destroyed sheep.

[3] The freeholders assessed the claimant's damages at $43; the fees of the freeholders were $12. His honor instructed the jury that they might award damages "not exceeding the $43 and the $12 cost." The defendant excepted to this instruction on the ground that the statute provides for reimbursement to the extent of the amount paid by the county "for such injury or destruction," and not for cost. The expression "amount paid out for such injury or destruction," construed in connection with other provisions in the statute, imports the amount paid out on account of such injury or destruction. If the defendant had insisted on his right to have the jury find whether the cost was reasonable, we should have been inclined to sustain his exception; but his proposition is that the plaintiff as a matter of law cannot recover the cost which is properly incurred.

[4] Testimony as to the length of time that had elapsed between the death and the discovery of the sheep was properly admitted. It was not hearsay evidence; it was an expression of the judgment or estimate of a nonexpert witness based upon personal observation of the carcass, and not an expression of a theoretical or scientific opinion, or a deduction from the testimony of others. *Ives v. STERN & SWIFT v. HYMAN BROS. (No. 389.)

Attorney and client — 143—Contract for compensation during existence of relations void.

A contract for compensation made by attorney and client during the existence of the relation is void, as against public policy; and unless a contract for amount of compensation was made before entering into the relation, the amount is to be assessed on the basis of a reasonable compensation for the services rendered and the benefits received.

Appeal from Superior Court, Guilford County; Finley, Judge.

Action by S. J. Stern and another, law partners as Stern & Swift, against A. L. Hyman and others, partners as Hyman Bros. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Error.

This is an action by the plaintiffs, attorneys at law, to recover $5,050 as a fee for services claimed to have been rendered in adjusting the loss by fire on a stock of goods with certain fire insurance companies. The complaint alleges that the defendants employed the plaintiffs to adjust said losses with the insurance companies, and that afterwards, pending the said adjustment, the defendants agreed to pay the plaintiffs 20 per cent. on the amount recovered, which the plaintiffs claim was $25,250, on which they seek to recover a fee of $5,050. The defendants deny the making of such contract, and allege that the only contract ever made with the plaintiffs was to pay them $200 for their services in making proofs of loss and in assisting in adjusting the same, which was all the service the plaintiffs rendered. The defendants further allege that the basis of $25,250 on which the plaintiffs demand $5,050 as 20 per cent. fee was never recovered; that in fact the insurance companies took over $15,000 of goods and $550 for fixtures, and agreed to pay $9,700 in cash loss by fire, of which $3,250 has not been paid, and allege not only that there was no contract for 20 per cent., and that if there was it should be computed only on the cash actually recovered, but they contend further that, if there were any contract for 20 per cent., it was made during the time the plaintiffs were acting in pursuance of their employment, and was void, and the plaintiffs are entitled only to reasonable compensation for their services to be assessed by the jury.

W. P. Bynum and R. C. Strudwick, both of Greensboro, for appellants.

Wilson & Frazier, of Greensboro, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. The record is voluminous, and there are many exceptions, but we need consider but one, which we think entitles the defendants to a new trial, for the others may not arise on another trial.

The defendants except and assign for error the refusal of his honor to give the third instruction requested by the defendants, to wit:

"It being admitted that at the time of the alleged contract between the plaintiff Stern and the defendants (as claimed by plaintiffs) the relation of attorney and client existed between them, the plaintiffs would not be entitled to recover from the defendants any sum for their services which was not fair and reasonable under all the circumstances of the case, no matter what sum was mentioned in the said contract."

This prayer should have been granted. It is, and should be, well settled that, where the relation of attorney and client exists, and the contract sued upon by the attorney is made during the existence of the relationship, and more especially when the contract is for a portion of the subject-matter contended for, as here, the attorney can recover no more than a reasonable compensation for his services, no matter what kind of a contract he has made with his client or induced him to enter into. This rule is based upon the confidential relations existing between attorney and client, and is enforced, not upon the ground that there was fraud, but in order to prevent fraud, and as a matter of sound public policy.

While the relationship exists an attorney cannot bind his client in any manner to make him greater compensation for his services than he would have the right to demand if no contract had been made during the existence of the relationship. Weeks on Attorneys (2d Ed.) § 368; Elmore v. Johnson, 143 Ill. 513, 32 N. E. 413, 21 L. R. A. 366, 36 Am. St. Rep. 401. His honor disregarded this principle as pointed out by exceptions 5, 7, 9, and 16 in the record.

In a contract of this kind, the burden is on the plaintiff to show that it was fair and reasonable and not upon the defendant to show to the contrary. Lee v. Pearce, 68 N. C. 81, 87; McLeod v. Bullard, 84 N. C. 516; Pritchard v. Smith, 160 N. C. 84, 75 S. E. 803; 2 R. O. L. p. 966, § 42, and page 1038; Shirk v. Neible, 83 Am. St. Rep., note on pages 161, 162, and cases there cited.

According to the complaint and the testimony of the plaintiff, Stern himself, the contract he sets up was entered into after the establishment of the relation of attorney and client between the parties and during the continuance of this relationship. Under such circumstances, the client would be at a serious disadvantage if the attorney should throw up the case after acquiring knowledge of his plaintiff's case, and while the conduct of the case was in medias res. The parties did not stand upon an equal footing. 2 Thornton on Attorneys, §§ 428, 432.

This wholesome principle is that the parties to a contract must stand on an equal footing, and that therefore, as a matter of law—

"Certain known and definite fiduciary relations, that, for instance, of trustee and cestui que trust, attorney and client, guardian and ward, and general agent, having the entire management of the business of the principal, are sufficient under our present judiciary system to raise a presumption of fraud as a matter of law, to be laid down by the judge as decisive of the issue, unless rebutted. Other presumptions of fraud are matters of fact to be passed upon by a jury." Lee v. Pearce, 68 N. C. 76.

The able opinion in this case by Chief Justice Pearson laid down the eternal principle of equity and fair dealings from which this court has never deviated. On page 87 of 68 N. C., in that opinion the court instances other fiduciary relations which do not amount to a presumption of fraud as a matter of law, but merely raise a presumption of fraud as a matter of fact to be passed upon by a jury.

That case has been cited and affirmed by this court in a long line of cases cited in the Anno. Ed., and the principle is universally recognized. The fact of the existence of the relationship of attorney and client at the time the contract is alleged by the plaintiffs to have been made appears from the complaint, and by the evidence of the plaintiff himself, Stern, and the judge should have held the alleged contract, if made, to have been void, as a matter of law. And unless the jury rejected, as it would seem that they did, the defendants' allegation that there was a contract made prior to entering into the relationship for $200, then the case should have been submitted to the jury upon the third prayer of the defendants as above set out, and the jury should have assessed the plaintiffs' recovery upon the basis of a reasonable compensation for the services rendered by the plaintiffs and the benefits received by the defendants.

The verdict and judgment must be set aside, and a new trial is granted for this error.

YORK & FENDERSON v. Z. M. L. JEFFREYS & SONS. (No. 102.)

Sales @81(4)—Delay in shipment because of war conditions no defense where contract exonerated sellers from responsibility for delays beyond control.

Although potatoes sold were shipped, not by open bill of lading, which would have vested title in the buyers and thereby have imposed the risk of delay upon them, but by bill of lading to the sellers' order, "notify" the buyers, the sellers did not lose their right to sue for the purchase price of the potatoes because of the fact that they were delayed by war conditions of shipping, where the sales contract agreed that the sellers should not be held "liable or responsible" for any delay over which they had no control.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wayne County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by York & Fenderson against Z. M. L. Jeffreys & Sons. From judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. No error.

During the month of January, 1918, Messrs. Maley & Carolin, brokers, of New York, negotiated a contract between the plaintiffs and defendants as follows:

"Agreement between York & Fenderson, of Mars Hill, Me., and Jeffries & Sons, Goldsboro, N. C., as to one car of potatoes, as follows: 150 10-peck sacks red Bliss seed potatoes, balance of car consisting of about 150 sacks seed Cobblers at the following prices: Three dollars and fifty cents per cwt. for the red Bliss and three dollars and ten cents per cwt. for the Cobblers, shipment to be made about the 1st of February and delivered Goldsboro, N. C., at above-mentioned prices. The said Jeffries & Sons agree to pay $3.50 per cwt. for the red Bliss and $3.10 per cwt. for the Cobblers in the following manner: Amount draft and bill lading attached.

"It is further agreed that the said York & Fenderson will load and ship the potatoes, using all possible means available to get them out on time, but will not be held liable or responsible for delays occasioned by the railroads being unable to furnish cars for the transportation of said potatoes or for other delays over which said York & Fenderson have no control.

"In witness whereof the parties hereto have hereunto subscribed their names the day and year above written. York & Fenderson.
"Jeffries & Sons."

The above contract is dated January 23, 1918, but was not forwarded to the defendants until January 31, 1918, as will appear by letter. The contract was thereupon returned to Maley & Carolin, brokers, by the defendants, and on February 4, 1918, mailed to these plaintiffs by said Maley & Carolin. While it is true that the contract provides for shipment about February 1, it is admitted by the defendant Z. M. L. Jeffreys that he did not actually sign the contract until February 1st, at which time he attached thereto an additional order for 200 bags of Cobblers to be shipped in the same car. He knew at the time that the contract was to be mailed from Goldsboro, N. C., to Maley & Carolin, New York City, thence by Maley & Carolin to these plaintiffs at Mars Hill, Me., and the defendant Z. M. L. Jeffreys further admitted that plaintiffs could not possibly have shipped any potatoes under this contract, even if there had been no embargoes, before February 6th or 7th.

Immediately upon receipt of the contract, plaintiffs wrote to the defendants that their favor of the 30th to Maley & Carolin had been forwarded to them for attention, and in reply they begged to advise that just at that time there was an embargo on the M. & M. T. Co. from Boston to Norfolk, and, as this was the route that their shipment had to take, they were unable to move it just then; besides the weather was extremely cold, and plaintiffs did not believe that defendants would want them moved under such conditions; that plaintiffs had the matter before them, and would move defendants' car just as soon as conditions would permit, which they trusted would be satisfactory, and that the potatoes would reach defendants in plenty of time for their requirements. To the above letter the defendants made no reply.

On February 15th, the plaintiffs, in accordance with said contract, shipped to the defendants one carload of potatoes and advised the defendants by letter of some date in substance as follows:

"We hand you herewith the invoice for your first car of potatoes and are pleased to advise, as you will see, that we were able to get a large car and have given you the 200 bags of Cobblers which you asked for. We used the freight rate as given us by the transportation people, but, if there is any difference from what we have allowed, if you will send paid freight bill we will send you check to cover. We trust that the stock will arrive in good season and be satisfactory, as we feel sure it will."

It appears by the undisputed testimony that plaintiffs made application for car immediately upon receipt of the contract and shipped the potatoes in the first available car, and that the potatoes were U. S. grade No. 1. There was delay in transit, and the potatoes did not arrive in Goldsboro until about the 23d day of March, 1918. On March 9, 1918, and before the potatoes arrived, the defendants wrote the plaintiffs that they had asked the A. C. L. Ry. to trace the car of potatoes (M. O. E. 65030), and had been informed that the car left Boston on Clyde Line via Charleston, S. C., on March 4th. "Why did you ship this car via Clyde line? It seems to us that we are entitled to damages. Planting season is virtually over with us, and no probability of getting potatoes in some time. We had sold these potatoes before we gave orders for same. All our orders have been canceled. Am satisfied charges will be much more than you deducted."

Again, on March 19th, defendants wrote the plaintiffs that, should the car of potatoes arrive, they would notify plaintiffs by wire; that Mr. D. H. Dixon, broker, was a good man to turn them over to; he had handled 50 cars that season; that defendants were turning car down upon the ground that planting season was over and the people they had sold to had bought elsewhere; that defendants had lost their profit, and plaintiffs could look to transportation company. And on March 23d, when the potatoes arrived, the defendants wired the plaintiffs as follows: "We are not going to accept potatoes."

It appears from the evidence that the normal time for delivery of potatoes from Mars Hill, Me., to Goldsboro, N. C., is 14 days, and if the delivery had been made within the usual time, the potatoes would have reached Goldsboro in ample time for the planting season. The plaintiffs contend that at the time this contract was entered into both parties knew that the world war was being waged, and both knew that embargoes were frequent, and that delays were the rule rather than the exception, and, under such conditions, it was but natural and prudent that every shipper should safeguard himself against delays by railroads that were engaged primarily and preferentially in the transportation of soldiers. The defendants testified that the potatoes lay on the docks in Boston for three weeks, and that, if the potatoes had arrived three weeks earlier, they would have been in time for planting season. Examination of the record will disclose that the potatoes were refused because they did not arrive in time for the planting season, and it will appear, and it does appear, that if the potatoes had been transported within the usual time that they would have arrived in ample time for the planting season in Eastern North Carolina.

The judge charged the jury as follows:

"If you find from this evidence, the burden being on the plaintiffs so to satisfy you, that the plaintiffs shipped the potatoes according to its contract, that there was no unreasonable delay in the shipment, and that they shipped by the route that at that time was open and available, and that the delay in the arrival at Goldsboro was no fault on the part of the plaintiffs, why then it would be your duty to answer this issue whatever you may find the amount to be according to the contract. Plaintiffs contend that the amount is $1,508.84."

Defendants excepted.

Verdict for plaintiffs assessing damages at $1,508.83. Judgment thereon, and appeal by defendants.

Teague & Dees, of Goldsboro, for appellants.

Langston, Allen & Taylor, of Goldsboro, for appellees.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). This is a case of great apparent hardship, as will appear from our recital of the facts, but it is a misfortune which has come to the defendants through no legal fault of the plaintiffs, and therefore must be borne with patience and patriotic resignation, as it was caused by the pressing needs of our government for immediate and rapid transportation in the movement of men and materials for war purposes. This alone would not exonerate the plaintiffs, but defendants entered into a contract with them which appears in the statement, by which they agreed that the plaintiffs should not be held "liable, or responsible" for any delay over which they had no control, and occasioned by the railroads' being unable to furnish cars, because of prior government demands upon them to supply transportation for war purposes.

The defendants asked for two instructions

(which were practically identical) to the effect that, as the potatoes were shipped, not by open bill of lading, which would have vested the title to them in the defendants and thereby imposed the risk of delay upon them, but by bill of lading "to their own order, notify Jeffreys & Sons," the risk of any delay was assumed by the plaintiffs, because they retained the title to the potatoes during the course of transportation and until delivery to the defendants upon payment of the draft, which was drawn to order with bill of lading attached. But this view leaves out of consideration the important and very essential fact that this shipment moved under special contract excluding the ordinary liability of a shipper by a carrier, and containing a clause therein which protects them from delay in transportation in certain circumstances, which have already been stated. It appears first that the defendants agreed that the shipment should be made as it was—that is, "Amount draft and bill of lading attached"—and specially stipulated that the plaintiffs should not be considered in fault when any delay was caused by conditions and circumstances beyond their control, such as the preferential right of the government to all means and methods of transportation. The ordinary rules of law do not prevail in such instances, for "inter arma leges silent." Where the preservation of the government is at stake, all private rights must give way and be subordinate to it. This is not only the law of war, but the call of patriotism. Ordinarily the maxim is that "private good yields to public," and the interest of an individual should give place to the public good ("privatum commodum publica cudit," Jenk. Cent. p. 223, case 80); and the other version of it is that private inconvenience is made up, or compensated for, by public benefit ("privatum incommodum publico bono pensatur"). But on another ground, which is somewhat related to those we have stated, the safety of the people is the supreme law, and as such entitled to the first consideration, and it is the inexorable law that regard be had to the public welfare, and, in times of war and peril, to the public safety, for in such instances an interference with private rights is obviously dictated and justified by the immediate urgency of the occasion and the highest necessity. Broom's Legal Maxims (8th Ed.) pp. 2 to 5. The rights and supreme power of the government in times of war, which may be exercised for its own safety and the protection of its people, must be conceded, and among those rights is the one which permitted it to commandeer the existing means of transportation for its own purposes in prosecuting the war which it had declared against the Central Empires, and to the extent of seizing the railroads or subjecting them to its use and control for war purposes, and the exercise of this power was the reason for inserting the special clause in this contract exempting the plaintiff from liability or responsibility for delays in transportation beyond its control. It was a valid stipulation, and must be enforced, and, if any losses have been sustained by the defendants because the goods could not be shipped with the usual and customary expedition, by reason of such delays, the defendants must submit to them, for there is no measure of redress, as they came within the class of losses where there is no technical injury, and within the designation of the contract of shipment—that is, “delays beyond plaintiffs’ control.” If there had been no such provision in the contract, the plaintiffs might not have been protected against recovery of damages by the defendants, and perhaps could not have themselves recovered for the price of the potatoes. But the government, under its war power and the “National Defense Act” of the Congress, had the right to take over all transportation facilities and thereby prevent or obstruct the regular and usual course of carriage by rail and water. If the plaintiff had exempted itself from “liability” only, the result might have been different, but it was relieved from “responsibility” as well, and the parties meant by the use of this word something more than mere “liability,” or exposure to a suit, or counterclaim for damages. They intended to relieve the plaintiffs of all fault whatever when the shipment was delayed by an embargo on transportation caused by the necessities of the government in the exercise of its war powers as authorized by Congress.

This subject is fully discussed in Roxford Knitting Co. v. Moore & Tierney (C. C. A.) 285 Fed. 177, 11 A. L. R. 1415; Kneeland-Bigelow Co. v. Michigan C. R. Co., 207 Mich. 546, 174 N. W. 605; Primos Chemical Co. v. Fulton Steel Corp. (D. C.) 266 Fed. 945; Bernhardt L. Co. v. Metzloff, 113 Misc. Rep. 288, 184 N. Y. Supp. 289; Prescott & Co. v. Powles & Co., 193 Pac. (Wash.) 680. The question is also considered in an elaborate note to Roxford Knitting Mill v. Moore & Tierney, supra, as reported in 11 A. L. R., at page 1429, to which we refer. It was held in Chemical Co. v. Steel Corp., supra, that a vendor of a crane, to be manufactured under a contract calling for delivery at a specified time, and providing that the vendor did not assume liability for loss from any cause beyond its control was held not entitled to recover for the crane, which was not delivered at the time agreed, although the delay might have been due to orders before contracted for, as to which priority certificates had been issued by the government. The court recognized, however, that such a cause would constitute a defense to an action by the vendee for damage due to the delay. And in Prescott & Co. v. Powles & Co., supra, the court stated that, had the vendor been sued for damages for failure to ship the full order, the government’s act might have afforded a defense, but that, having sued on the contract, it was essential to a recovery that a full performance be shown, and that no excuse not provided for in the contract would justify a recovery where the performance was partial only, save an act of the vendee rendering performance impossible, or a waiver by it.

I forbear to further pursue this part of the discussion, as in this case there is a clause in the contract which, in our opinion, exempts and exonerates the plaintiffs from all blame and required the defendant to pay for the potatoes. They cannot object that the plaintiffs retained the title to the potatoes under the terms of the draft and bill of lading annexed, for they deliberately consented to this form of shipment, and their real promise, therefore, was to pay the draft when the potatoes arrived, take up the bill of lading, and receive the potatoes, and, even if they had not so promised, the clause of exemption in the contract would require them to do so, as by its terms, and the finding of the jury as to the embargo preventing an earlier delivery, the plaintiffs were in no fault, having delivered the potatoes as soon as they could do so, and the contract exempted them not only from liability, but also from “responsibility,” for not delivering before the end of the planting season.

The jury’s verdict has disposed of all other questions concerning defendants’ liability for the price of the goods, as, for one example, the shipment by the Clyde Line to Charleston, S. C., it appearing that the Merchants’ & Miners’ Tr. Line, the usual one, had been closed by the government to private transportation.

There is no contention, as we understand the case, that the potatoes were of inferior quality when they were delivered to the carrier for shipment, and there does not appear to be any ground upon which to hold the plaintiffs “responsible” for dilatory conduct on their part. There seems to be no negligence legally imputable to them. Waddell v. Reddick, 24 N. C. 424.

Whether the defendants have any right over against the carriers, or any one of them, is a question not now pertinent. As to their rights under the contract of purchase and the other facts, not now necessary for us to consider, see Richardson v. Woodruff, 178 N. C. 46, 100 S. E. 173, and Gwyn v. R., 85 N. C. 429, 39 Am. Rep. 708, where there is a general discussion of the matter.

The other exceptions are either merely formal, or devoid of any genuine merit. Upon the whole, we conclude that the case was correctly tried below, and the result is in accordance with the relevant and controlling principles of law.

No error.

STATE v. McNEILL. (No. 401.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 16, 1921.)

Intoxicating liquors \Leftrightarrow 227, 238(4)—Evidence of general reputation of defendant's place admissible, and weight of testimony was for jury.

In a prosecution for possessing liquors for sale, where defendant's witnesses testified he was away from home when whisky and jugs were found on his premises, and that they had been brought there without his connivance, evidence as to general reputation of defendant's house as a place for illicit sale of whisky, though incompetent to establish defendant's reputation, was a circumstance which, under O. S. § 3383, authorizing proof of violations of section 3378, relative to handling liquor for gain, by circumstantial evidence, was admissible in corroboration of inference arising from the finding of the liquor, and the weight of the testimony was for the jury.

Hoke and Stacy, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Scotland County; Ray, Judge.

Nathan McNeill was convicted of having in his possession spirituous and intoxicating liquors for sale, and he appeals. No error.

Walter H. Neal, of Laurinburg, for appellant.

J. S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

CLARK, C. J. The indictment charged that the defendant "unlawfully and willfully did have and keep in his possession, for the purposes of sale, certain spirituous and intoxicating liquors." The evidence for the state was as follows:

Lamar P. Smith, deputy sheriff, testified for the state:

"I went up to the defendant's house and I drove up in the yard. There was a man there; there were several in the yard; Lee McNeill and two other fellows and one woman, I believe; and I noticed one of those fellows go over to some bushes like they wanted to hide something, and I asked him what he hid, and then I walked to where he went and found two quarts of whisky there where he had stuck it down in the broom straw, and I brought it back and went in the house and found in the kitchen two jugs.

"I believe that the man who walked out there to the bushes said his name was McLean, and I went in the house, and there was two jugs in there that smelled strong with whisky sitting in a little kitchen. They were gallon jugs, and under the table I found a quart pot and funnel that was wet with whisky, looked like it had just been poured out, and that smelled strong with whisky, and right outside the kitchen door at the bottom of the steps I found a 10-gallon keg, and it was also strong with whisky, and while I was in the yard I saw a fellow leave the yard and go behind the garden toward the little ditch, and I went around there and found a gallon jug full of whisky, and I brought it back, and there was about a quart of whisky out of the jug. I was by myself. This was at the defendant's house. I searched his house one other time and found a quart of blockade whisky in a jug.

"Q. Look over these items and jugs and things here and state how much of it you found at Nathan McNeill's house. A. I found it all there. I found these two bottles, and this jug is the one I found in the ditch. These other two jugs were in the kitchen, and this funnel and the measuring cups were on the table.

"Q. Is that liquor in there? It looks like kerosene. A. It smells like whisky. This is the jug I found, and it smelled high with whisky."

The state then introduced in evidence the jugs, bottles, measuring cups, funnel, and other articles and exhibited before the jury.

Cross-examination:

This defendant then testified that the diagram then submitted to him was a reasonably correct diagram of the premises and surroundings starting up at Mr. Fairley Patterson's.

"I found a part of the liquor in the house. I found in the house, what is in these two jugs. They smelled strong of whisky.

"Q. How much is there of it? A. A quart, maybe.

"Q. Between a quart and a pint in both of them. Is there a ditch that runs sorter catty-cornered from Nathan's house? Now will you please indicate on the plat about where the garden is? A. Right along there (pointing out the ditch on the diagram). I found the glass jug of liquor in the ditch right back of the garden. The whisky which I found in the briars or bushes was not in that direction at all. It was back on the opposite side of the house. The man who had it was standing in the yard when I drove up and he walked to the bushes. I think he said his name was McLean. I do not remember. He was the one who had the two pints of whisky. I think it was 10 or 15 steps in the briars and about that far from the road where I found the two pints of whisky. I found it in the briars. I saw him go down there like he wanted to hide something, and when he came back I went to see what he had hid, and that is what I found. Nathan McNeill was not at home. I do not know who carried these receptacles and jug and the measuring pot and other things to the house, and I do not know who was in charge of the keys of this house. I found these things in the kitchen, and just outside the kitchen there was a wagon standing next to the garage, which had some household goods on it. * * * (State rested.)"

The evidence for the defendant was an attempt to show that the whisky found in the ditch was not on the defendant's land, but just over the line, and that the whisky and vessels were carried to the defendant's house that day while he was away.

In rebuttal, the deputy sheriff was asked:

"State, if you know, what the general reputation of Nathan McNeill's place is relative to selling whisky."

Over the defendant's objection, the sheriff was allowed to testify, the court adding, "If it has such a general reputation," and the sheriff responded:

"Yes; it is bad; it has been bad for several years."

On this the court said:

"Gentlemen, that is allowed, not as primary or substantive evidence, but merely to corroborate, if it does corroborate or tend to corroborate, this witness in that he found the articles which the state has introduced in evidence here, consisting of two or three bottles of whisky, jugs, and a keg and measuring pot and funnel, which the state contends, and the witness testifies, smelled of whisky, if it tends to corroborate him, and is allowed for that purpose only."

The court refused a motion to strike out the above question and answer thereto, and defendant excepted.

Another witness, Manly Russell, testified to the same effect that he "knew the general character of Nathan McNeill's place as to the sale of whisky, that is, what the people say about his place, and that it was bad." The defendant objected to the question and moved to strike it out, and excepted from the refusal to do so, the court saying to the jury:

"Gentlemen, this evidence is allowed to corroborate the witness Smith, who went on the stand and testified that he found the liquor offered in evidence here and is allowed for the purpose of corroborating, if it corroborates or tends to corroborate, and for that purpose only."

These questions were not asked as to the general reputation of the defendant, and would have been incompetent for that purpose, for he had refrained from going upon the stand, but they were admitted in corroboration of the state's evidence, which tended to prove that the whisky and the vessels, being found on the premises of the defendant, were in his possession, and the evidence was pertinent and important for that purpose, as tending to show that this place was in effect a well-known illicit place for the sale of liquor, and was competent like evidence of previous transactions of the same kind in corroboration.

C. S. 3378, under which the defendant was indicted, is as follows:

"3378. Handling Liquor for Gain.—It is unlawful for any person, firm, corporation, or association, by whatever name called, to engage in the business of selling, exchanging, bartering, giving away for the purpose of direct or indirect gain, or otherwise handling spirituous, vinous or malt liquors in the state of North Carolina."

The illicit sale of liquor being done usually clandestinely, secretly, and by resort to many evasions and ingenious devices, the lawmaking power found it necessary to enact C. S. § 3383, referring to above section 3378, as follows:

"3383. Indictment and Proof.—In indictments for violating the first section of this article [C. S. 3378] it shall not be necessary to allege a sale to a particular person, and the violation of law may be proved by a circumstantial evidence as well as by direct evidence."

The evidence introduced by the defendant was an attempt to prove that the liquor found at that place was not the property or under the control of the defendant. The evidence of the general reputation that it was a notorious place used by him for that purpose was therefore properly admitted as "a circumstance" tending to corroborate the inference to be drawn from the testimony of the officer that the defendant is responsible. There was no attempt to convict the defendant by showing the bad reputation of his place as a whisky resort, but merely to corroborate the inference which would naturally arise that the defendant was responsible for the liquor found on his premises, which inference the defendant had attempted to rebut by evidence tending to show that he was away that day and that the whisky and the jugs and vessels had been brought there without his connivance. The general reputation of the defendant's house as a notorious place for the illicit sale of whisky was "circumstantial evidence" to corroborate the inference arising upon the testimony of the officer of finding the whisky and vessels at the defendant's house.

Four other witnesses, Mack Patterson, S. H. Dunlap, C. C. Sneed, and E. P. Covington, also testified that they "knew the general reputation of Nathan McNeill's place as to the sale of whisky, and it was bad, and had the reputation of being a notorious liquor place." The testimony of each of these, when offered, the court admitted over the defendant's exception, but cautioned the jury in each instance:

"This evidence is allowed to go to you for the purpose, as I have explained before, of corroborating the witness Smith and the exhibits offered, if it does corroborate or tend to corroborate them, and is allowed for your consideration for that purpose only."

The court further in the charge charged the jury fully as to reasonable doubt and the burden of proof. He stated fully the defendant's contention that he had no whisky there, that he was absent from home at work at the time, and only returned afterwards, and added that by reason of the rule laid down in State v. Ingram, 180 N. C. 672, 105 S. E. 3, he had—

"allowed the state to offer for consideration of the jury the reputation of the home of the defendant as to keeping liquor for sale—the general reputation. This testimony is allowed, not to prove its character other than the day in question, but to corroborate the witness Smith, and to corroborate the amount of whisky which the state alleges and contends was found at his place. It is not direct or substantive evidence, but is allowed for the purpose of corroborating, if it does corroborate or tends to corroborate, the witness Smith, and to strengthen his testimony, and to corroborate by the amount of whisky that was found there that day, and in evidence as an exhibit, and it is allowed to the jury solely for that purpose and predicated upon the doctrine laid down in State v. Ingram, and to be considered by the jury in that light."

In State v. Ingram, 180 N. C. 673, 105 S. E. 3, on an indictment for the sale of intoxicating liquors, the state was allowed to introduce such testimony as the learned judge admitted in this case, this court saying:

"The evidence of drinking in the crowds frequenting the place of business of the defendant was competent in corroboration of the witness Norton, who testified to the sale, and whose testimony was impeached. In State v. Mostella, 159 N. C. 459, one of the questions asked the witness was, 'State the character of the people that usually frequent this pool-room.' This was asked to show drunkenness about the premises, and was admitted and affirmed on appeal."

In the present case the whisky and jugs and other vessels found on the premises were in proof in corroboration of the testimony of the deputy sheriff and to rebut the defense set up by the defendant's witnesses (the character of some of whom was shown to be bad) that the defendant was absent that day, and that hence there was no presumption against him of possession or responsibility. The state was allowed to show, on the above authority, by at least six witnesses, that the defendant's place had the general reputation of being used by him for the sale of whisky. This was as pertinent as testimony of defendant's absence that day, from which he sought to draw an inference that he was not responsible.

In State v. Price, 175 N. C. at page 807, 95 S. E. 480, Walker, J., in a very learned opinion, with full citation of authorities, showed that the reputation of a house is competent on indictments for keeping a house of ill fame, independent of our statute to that effect, saying:

"It is only a circumstance which the jury are permitted to consider in passing upon the defendant's guilt."

Neither in that case nor in this would the reputation be sufficient for conviction, and the judge in this case was careful to caution the jury on the admission of the evidence of each of the six witnesses who testified to the bad reputation of this place for the sale of whisky, and again repeated the caution in his charge that it could be only considered as a circumstance in corroboration of the inference arising from the evidence of the sheriff as to the whisky and vessels being found at the defendant's home, which it was sought to contradict by the testimony that others than the defendant owned the whisky.

The same principle seems to be universally recognized. In 16 Cyc. 1209, it is said:

"Reputation is relevant when it arises in a community acquainted with the facts upon subjects in which the general community is interested, and concerning which it has no motive to misrepresent. Where these two conditions are fulfilled, reputation may be more probative than a mere unsworn statement. The fact that the statements on a matter of general interest have been so uniform, reiterated, and dominant against all counter statements as to create a general reputation through the community may well give rise to an inference"—enumerating as "among them" a long list of subjects concerning which reputation has been held admissible.

The scope of the subjects as to which reputation has been held admissible will certainly embrace the general reputation that a place was known generally as one at which liquor was habitually sold upon the circumstances of this case. 16 Cyc. 1209, 1210, quotes in the notes authority that—

"General reputation is not a form of hearsay, but in itself a relevant circumstance in many instances."

On page 1211 it is pointed out that—

"The elements of relevancy and necessity are prerequisites to the admissibility of reputation as evidence, and hence specific facts of limited general interest cannot be established in that way."

In this case, where the defendant sought to show by the testimony offered that he was away from home when the whisky and jugs were found there, and by the testimony of other parties to rebut the inference of his ownership or control of the whisky and jugs, it was competent, as corroborating testimony, to show as a circumstance the general reputation that the house was "notorious" as a place for the illegal sale of whisky. The weight of all the testimony was for the jury.

In McKelvey on Evidence (2d Ed.) § 126, it is stated that, while reputation for a particular act is not general reputation, and such evidence not admissible on the question of the truth of the charge, general reputation would be legitimate to establish many matters of public interest or notoriety.

On the disputed question at issue, upon the evidence as above stated, the general reputation of the defendant's house as a place notorious for the illicit sale of whisky was a "circumstance" which under C. S. § 3383, the jury were entitled to consider in corroboration of the state's evidence, it having been restricted by the judge to be strictly in corroboration only, if the jury believed it, of the inference the jury could draw from the testimony of the deputy sheriff as to the finding of the liquor, jugs, and other vessels upon the defendant's premises.

No error.

LANE v. SOUTHERN RY. CO. (No. 390.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 9, 1921.)

Railroads \Leftarrow 5½, New, vol. 6A Key-No. Series —Company not liable for injuries during federal control.

Under Federal Control Act March 21, 1918 (U. S. Comp. St. 1918, U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, §§ 3115¼a-3115¼p), a railroad company is not liable for injuries to an employé sustained during operation of the road by the Director General.

Appeal from Superior Court, Guilford County; Finley, Judge.

Action by E. L. Lane against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Action dismissed.

It appeared from the plaintiff's evidence that, at the time of the accident and injury complained of, the plaintiff and those in charge of the train upon which the injury occurred were employed by and working for the Director General of Railroads under the United States Railroad Administration. The Director General has not been made a party to this action, and the Southern Railway Company is the only defendant.

There was a motion to dismiss upon the ground that the Federal Control Act 1918 (U. S. Comp. St. 1918, U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, §§ 3115¼a-3115¼p) did not impose any liability upon the defendant on any cause of action arising out of the operation of its system of transportation by the United States government, and that therefore a suit for such an injury could not be maintained as against it. This motion was overruled; and upon the usual issues of negligence, contributory negligence, and damages being answered by the jury in favor of the plaintiff, and from a judgment rendered thereon, the defendant, Southern Railway Company, appealed.

BOARD OF DRAINAGE COM'RS OF MAT-TAMUSKEET DIST. v. CREDLE, County
Treasurer. (No. 24.)

1921.)

1. Counties \Rightarrow 74(3)—Commissions for handling drainage district funds not recoverable without allowance thereof by county commissioners.

In absence of a showing that the board of county commissioners allowed him amount sought to be recovered, a county treasurer could not recover commissions for handling drainage district funds on the theory that he was entitled thereto under C. S. § 3910, providing that county treasurer shall receive as compensation such a sum not exceeding specified percentages on moneys received and disbursed as the commissioners may allow.

2. Counties \Rightarrow 74(3)—Statute held not to entitle county treasurer to commissions for handling drainage district funds.

C. S. § 3910, fixing county treasurer's compensation as such a sum not exceeding specified percentages on moneys received and disbursed by him as the county board of commissioners may allow, did not entitle a county treasurer to commissions for handling drainage district funds prior to repeal of Pub. Laws 1909, c. 442, § 36, by Pub. Laws 1917, c. 152, § 2, though such section 36, after fixing compensation of named persons, not including treasurer, provided that "all other fees and costs incurred under the provision of this act shall be the same as provided by law, for like services in other cases," and that "the board of drainage commissioners shall issue warrants therefor," since county commissioners had no authority to allow treasurer commissions for such services under such section 36, and since Pub. Laws 1911, c. 67, § 13, fixes his compensation for services rendered a drainage district.

Appeal from Superior Court, Hyde County;
Bond, Judge.

Controversy submitted without action by the Board of Drainage Commissioners of Mattamuskeet District against Jeff Credle, County Treasurer. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff excepts and appeals. Reversed.

This action was brought to ascertain and declare by our judgment the commissions which the defendant, as treasurer of the county, is entitled to receive for collecting and disbursing what are known in the drainage law of the district (Acts 1909, c. 442; Acts 1911, c. 67; Acts 1917, c. 152) as assessments for maintenance, etc. The claims of the respective parties are set out in the case agreed, this being a controversy submitted without action, the plaintiff's contention being: (1) That the treasurer is not authorized to receive or disburse any of the funds of the said district, and he assumed this charge upon his own responsibility; and (2)

if he is entitled to receive and disburse said funds by virtue of his office as treasurer of Hyde county, he is entitled to receive only such commissions as are specifically provided for by the general and special drainage laws. While the defendant contends that the treasurer (defendant in this case) is entitled to one-half of 1 per cent. for receiving the funds raised by the taxes or assessments levied for the payment of construction bonds of said district, and to one-half of 1 per cent. for receiving taxes or assessments levied for maintenance purposes, and 2½ per cent. for disbursing taxes or assessments levied in the district, and to one-half of 1 per cent. for disbursing any money that may have been borrowed by the said district and repaid out of funds provided for maintenance purposes by the collection of maintenance taxes or assessments, or to the same commission provided by law for receiving and disbursing other public or general taxes that come into the hands by virtue or color of his office.

The court was of the opinion, and so adjudged, upon the case agreed:

"That the defendant, treasurer of Hyde county, is entitled to one-half of one per cent. for his services in receiving the funds raised by the taxes levied and collected for payment of construction bonds of said district, and to one-half of one per cent. for receiving and two and one-half per cent. for disbursing the maintenance taxes or assessments levied and collected for said district, or the same commissions provided by law for receiving or disbursing other public or general taxes that came into his hands by virtue or color of his office as treasurer of Hyde County."

It will be necessary to a full understanding of the matter to set out the terms of two statutes supposed to be applicable to the case: The first is Acts 1909, c. 577, §§ 1 and 2, which amended Revisal 1905, § 2778, and which, as thus amended, is section 3910, Consol. Statutes. We will state it in the terms of the latter section, as follows:

"The county treasurer shall receive as compensation in full for all services required of him such a sum, not exceeding one-half of one per cent. on moneys received and not exceeding two and a half per cent. on moneys disbursed by him, as the board of commissioners of the county may allow. * * * In counties where the treasurer's total compensation cannot exceed two hundred and fifty dollars per annum the treasurer may be allowed, in the discretion of the board of county commissioners, and of the board of education, as to the school fund, a sum not exceeding two and one-half per cent. on his receipts and not exceeding two and one-half per cent. on his disbursements of all funds handled by him; but the compensation allowed by virtue of the provisions of this last proviso shall not be operative to give a total compensation in excess of two hundred and fifty dollars per annum to such treasurers."

The other statute is section 13 of chapter 67 of the Public Laws of 1911, which is really the only provision in the drainage laws dealing with the treasurer's compensation, and is as follows:

"That the fee allowed the sheriff or other county tax collector for collecting the drainage tax [or assessments], as prescribed in section thirty-four of chapter four hundred and forty-two of the Public Laws of one thousand nine hundred and nine [the same being for construction of drainage canals, etc.], shall be two per cent. of the amount collected, and the fee allowed the county treasurer for disbursing the revenue obtained from the sale of the drainage bonds shall be one per cent. of the amount disbursed: Provided, no fee shall be allowed the sheriff or other county tax collector or county treasurer for collecting or receiving the revenue obtained from the sale of the bonds provided for in section thirty-four of chapter four hundred and forty-two of the Public Laws of one thousand nine hundred and nine, nor for disbursing the revenue raised for paying off the said bonds: Provided further, that in those counties where the sheriff or tax collector and treasurer are on a salary basis, no fees whatever shall be allowed for collecting or disbursing the funds of the drainage district."

Plaintiff excepted and appealed.

Spencer & Spencer, of Swan Quarter, and Small, MacLean, Bragaw & Rodman, of Washington, N. C., for appellant.

Mann & Mann, of Swan Quarter, and Manning, Bickett & Ferguson, of Raleigh, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] It is well to notice and clearly understand in the beginning the defendant's contention. His first proposition is this, that under Acts 1909, c. 442, § 36, after fixing, in that section, the compensation of the engineer, and the various rodmen, axmen, chainmen, and other laborers, it is provided as follows:

"All other fees and costs incurred under the provisions of this act shall be the same as provided by law for like services in other cases. Said costs and expenses shall be paid, by the order of the court, out of the drainage fund provided for that purpose, and the board of drainage commissioners shall issue warrants therefor when funds shall be in the hands of the treasurer."

That section (36), it is admitted, was repealed by Acts 1917, c. 152, § 2. It is deduced from the provisions of section 36, c. 442, of the Laws of 1909, that the defendant, so far at least as services already rendered by him before the repeal of that section are concerned, is entitled to compensation for such services as provided by Revisal, § 2778, as amended by Acts 1909, c. 577, it being section 3910, Consol. Statutes of 1919, all of which is recited fully in the statement of the case. But we find ourselves unable to agree with this view of the matter. The precise contention is that, as section 36, c. 442, of the Acts of 1909 (the drainage act) provides for compensation as for like services where no special provision is made in the drainage act for the particular service, it necessarily refers to the kind of services the compensation of which is provided for in Consol. Statutes § 3910 (which we will hereafter refer to, for the sake of brevity and convenience, by the number of the section only). But that section (3910) is placed under the title of "Salaries and Fees" where the compensation of county treasurers for their ordinary services is fixed, and not for any special service rendered under the drainage act, which was something apart from their ordinary duties and stood in a class to themselves, as contended by the plaintiff, and we are strongly inclined to accept this interpretation of the statutes when considered together, though we do not decide the question, as it is not essential that we should do so, for, even if section 3910, Consol. Statutes, applies, and should receive the construction advanced by the defendant, we yet are of the opinion that he has not brought his case within the provision of that section or the laws from which it was compiled, for the reason that it provides that the amount of the compensation to be allowed shall be "in the discretion of the county commissioners" or "as said commissioners may allow" (the maximum only being fixed), and the language, therefore, being thus substantially the same.

[2] There is no admission in the case, or even allegation by the defendant, that the board of county commissioners, even if they had the power, had declared what the compensation should be. Besides the language quoted above from section 3910, Consol. Statutes, shows, we think, clearly that section 36 of Laws of 1909 did not refer to services provided for in section 3910, as the county commissioners have no power or authority in the premises given by the drainage act, and the compensation, under section 36, is payable "out of the drainage fund provided for that purpose [by order of the court], and the board of drainage commissioners shall issue warrants therefor when funds shall be in the hands of the treasurer." It appears to be manifest from this language that the provision in section 36 does not refer to section 3910, Consol. Statutes. So that it comes to this, that the special ground upon which the defendant relies is not at all tenable, even if he be entitled to any compensation for the special services he claims to have rendered, as stated in his cause of action, and we conclude that he is not, upon a careful consideration of Acts 1911, c. 67, § 13, which is copied in our statement. That section provides but one compensation for all services, and expressly denies compensation for certain services therein enumerated.

The defendant's counsel inquire as to why the Legislature mentioned only two instances where compensation is denied, and not all of them; the answer being that no express provision is made for compensation in any other case where the treasurer handles drainage funds, and we are not at liberty to supply the omission. The general rule is, "expressio unius, est exclusio alterius," and when the Legislature explicitly provides that only one "fee" shall be paid, we have no right to say or to imply—that is, infer—that more was intended than what is expressly given.

The case of Koonce v. Com'rs, 108 N. C. 192, 10 S. E. 1038, has no application to this case, but referred to a different class of services rendered by the treasurer, and was decided long before this drainage act was passed. It is true, as said in Koonce's Case, that the policy of this state has been to compensate its officers fairly and justly for their services, and it may be well inferred that the Legislature thought it had done so in this instance, by allowing 1 per cent. on the amount realized from the sale of the drainage bonds, and it is to be noted in this connection that section 3910, on which defendant relies, sets a limit to his compensation for such services rendered by him as are described in that section. The fact, if it be true, that the county treasurer may also be ex officio treasurer of the drainage district, is not at all important in the discussion, as we have assumed, for the sake of argument, that he is, and Carter v. Com'rs, 156 N. C. 183, 72 S. E. 380, and Com'rs v. Lewis, 174 N. C. 528, 94 S. E. 8, are therefore irrelevant. Plaintiff contends that the State Treasurer is treasurer of this district. But we need not decide how this is, as it is immaterial in our view.

Even though it should be true that the maximum prescribed by the act has in fact been allowed by the commissioners of Hyde county as compensation to the treasurer (which does not appear and is not admitted), yet this would not give the defendant a right to commissions for handling drainage district funds.

This case is not like Drainage Commissioners v. Davis, Sheriff, 108 S. E. 506, decided at this term, upon a somewhat similar question, though the cases are not alike. We held there that the sheriff was entitled to commissions of 2 per cent. on collections of assessments for maintenance purposes, because such an inference as to the intention of the Legislature to that effect was clearly to be drawn from the drainage act of 1909 itself for the reasons stated in the opinion of the court, which are not applicable here. There we held the sheriff to be entitled to commissions of 2 per cent. on collections for maintenance of the district, because there was some ambiguity in the laws, and there was a legislative construction of them which extends the right to commissions beyond collections for organization, etc., to such collections for maintenance, and there seemed to be no disposition of the Legislature to limit this compensation, as in the case of the treasurer, by section 3910 of Consol. Statutes, because, as we presume, the sheriff's duties are more onerous. He must collect and pay out to the treasurer, while the latter merely receives the money and pays it out, taking receipts for the same, and making proper entries on his books—a much less difficult and responsible service. There were some other considerations which moved us there which are not present in this case.

It may be that the defendant should have more compensation, and, if so, the Legislature will hear him, as he has a strong equity upon which to base his appeal to it for relief. But such relief we cannot grant, as we have no power of legislation.

The judgment below will be reversed, as defendant is not entitled to recover anything upon the case agreed, and it will be so certified.

Reversed.

BOARD OF DRAINAGE COM'RS OF MATTAMUSKEET DIST. v. BRINN, County Treasurer, et al. (No. 26.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 9, 1921.)

Appeal from Superior Court, Hyde County; Bond, Judge.

Controversy submitted without action by the Board of Drainage Commissioners of Mattamuskeet District against Charles Brinn, Treasurer of Hyde County, and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

This is a controversy between the board of drainage commissioners of Mattamuskeet district in Hyde county and Charles Brinn, treasurer of Hyde county prior to the first Monday in December, 1916, and S. S. Mann, receiver, submitted without action upon agreed facts.

It is admitted that plaintiff is a duly constituted drainage corporation created under the general drainage law (chapter 442, Public laws of North Carolina Session of 1909), and that prior to the first Monday in December, 1916, defendant Brinn was treasurer of Hyde county.

The only questions for the court's consideration are:

(1) Was defendant, as treasurer of Hyde county, entitled to commissions of one-half of 1 per cent. for receiving $84,970.03, derived from assessments levied in Mattamuskeet drainage district for payment of bonds issued for construction work?

(2) Was defendant, as treasurer of Hyde county, entitled to commissions of one-half of 1 per cent. for receiving $14,997.14, derived from assessments levied in said district for maintenance, and commissions of 2½ per cent.

for disbursing $8,066.84 of such maintenance assessments?

(3) Was defendant, as treasurer of Hyde county, entitled to commissions of one-half of 1 per cent. for receiving and commissions of 2½ per cent. for disbursing $305.48 of canal tolls collected in said district?

The plaintiff board of drainage commissioners contends that the defendant treasurer was not entitled to such commissions. The defendant treasurer contends that he was thereto entitled.

The court below held with defendant, and plaintiff appealed.

Spencer & Spencer, of Swan Quarter, and Small, MacLean, Bragaw & Rodman, of Washington, N. C., for appellant.

Mann & Mann, of Swan Quarter, and Daniel & Carter, of Washington, N. C., for appellees.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). It will be perceived on a perusal of this case that it is not substantially unlike Board of Drainage Commissioners v. Credle, 109 S. E. 88, at this term. The questions involved are the same, except as to the canal tolls, and that one is fully covered by what is said in the opinion filed in Credle's Case. This being so, it is unnecessary to discuss the matter further, as it would be a mere repetition of what has already been said in that case.

It would serve no useful purpose to go over in detail the excellent briefs filed by the counsel in these cases, as what we have said in the opinions filed by us at this term in the above case and Drainage Comm'rs, v. Davis, 108 S. E. 506, covers fully the entire ground of inquiry and investigation.

The judgment is therefore reversed, as the defendant is not entitled to the commissions or compensation he claims, and it will be so certified.

Reversed.

FORD v. McANALLY. (No. 387.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 16, 1921.)

1. False imprisonment §31—Evidence held sufficient.

In action for false imprisonment, evidence held to support finding that defendant caused the arrest and prosecution of plaintiff.

2. False imprisonment §39—Issues of malice and amount of damages held for jury.

In action for false imprisonment, the issues whether the arrest of plaintiff was malicious and the amount of damages to which he was entitled held for the jury.

3. Damages §91(1)—"Punitive damages" denied.

"Punitive damages," sometimes called smart money, are allowed in cases where the injury is inflicted in a malicious, wanton, and reckless manner.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Punitive Damages.]

4. Damages §91(1)—When punitive damages authorized stated.

For punitive damages to be awarded, defendant's conduct must have been actually malicious or wanton, displaying a spirit of mischief towards plaintiff, or of reckless and criminal indifference to his rights.

5. Damages §94—Punitive damages largely discretionary with jury.

Both the awarding of punitive damages and the amount to be allowed, if any, rest in the sound discretion of the jury, although the amount may not be excessively disproportionate to the circumstances of contumely and indignity in the particular case.

6. False imprisonment §36—Damages not excessive.

Where defendant, a physician, admitted that he was angry and knew that plaintiff was a feeble man, and defendant caused plaintiff's arrest and imprisonment in jail from about 9 a. m. until approximately 7 p. m., and plaintiff was thereafter acquitted, an award of $3,079 as damages did not indicate that the amount allowed as punitive damages was disproportionately excessive or arbitrary.

Appeal from Superior Court, Guilford County; Finley, Judge.

Upon denial of liability and issues joined, the jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) Did the defendant assault the plaintiff as alleged in the complaint? A. Yes.

"(2) If so, what damage is the plaintiff entitled to recover of the defendant? A. $25.

There was a judgment entered on the verdict in favor of the plaintiff, from which the defendant appealed.

W. P. Bynum and S. S. Alderman, both of Greensboro, and O. C. Barnhart, of High Point, for appellant.

J. Allen Austin and John A. Barringer, of Greensboro, for appellee.

STACY, J. There is no exception or question presented on the initial cause of action arising out of the alleged assault. Defendant concedes that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment on the first two issues, but contends that the allegations of the complaint and the evidence adduced on the hearing were not sufficient to warrant the verdict on the remaining issues, or those relating to the second cause of action.

Giving the complaint a liberal construction, as we are required to do under C. S. 535, and considering the evidence in its most favorable light for the plaintiff, the accepted position on a motion to nonsuit, we think the verdict and judgment should be upheld.

[1] There is evidence on the record tending to show that after the assault, and without any warrant or other legal process, the plaintiff was arrested at the instance of the defendant and taken by two policemen to the police station in the city of High Point. The defendant followed the officers and made application, at the police station, for a peace warrant, and left instructions that the plaintiff be locked up which was done, and he remained in jail from about 9:00 a. m. until approximately 7:00 p. m., or practically the entire day. The evidence also discloses that the defendant signed the warrant in blank, which was afterwards filled out by one of the officers, charging L. S. Ford, plaintiff herein, with an assault with a deadly weapon, to wit, a pistol. At the trial, on the following morning in the recorder's court, Ford was acquitted and the prosecuting witness, defendant herein, was taxed with the cost.

The defendant denied that the arrest was made at his instance, or that he gave any instructions to have the plaintiff committed to jail under the warrant; but, during the course of his examination, he testified as follows:

"At the trial I asked the court to tax me with the costs. I did that because I was sorry for the man. The reason for my sympathy was just because I thought that he was feeble, hardly a responsible man. It was after I made the request that the court released him. I was the least bit angry, when I was down there at the gallery. Yes, sir; I will say I was angry. I was angry enough to fight, but I didn't propose to fight him."

It is further contended by the defendant that, under authority of Oakley v. Tate, 118 N. C. 361, 24 S. E. 806, he should not be held responsible for the prosecution because of the officer's error in filling out the blank warrant charging the present plaintiff with an assault, when application had been made for a peace warrant only. But it appears unmistakably that the plaintiff was arrested without any warrant at all; that Dr. McAnally was present at the trial on the following morning; and the jury have found that he was there aiding in the prosecution. It could hardly be said that he was ignorant of what was going on. At any rate, there was no request to correct the error and change the warrant. Indeed, it would seem that by conduct, at least, the defendant adopted the warrant and ratified what the officer had done. The jury evidently took this view of the matter, as it was submitted to them by the court, and they have found, in answer to the third issue, that the defendant caused the arrest and prosecution of the plaintiff.

[2] The defendant objected to the submission of the fifth and sixth issues, and contended that there was no evidence in the case to justify an award of punitive damages, citing Lewis v. Clegg, 120 N. C. 292, 26 S. E. 772. But upon the attendant facts and surrounding circumstances the jury have found that the defendant acted wrongfully and that he was actuated by malice. Indeed, he himself testified:

"As to Mr. Ford's statement on the witness-stand that I told the officers to arrest him, what was said was that I told them I wanted a peace warrant for him. I did as he stated—asked the officers at the gallery and at the lockup to lock him up; that he was crazy. I believe I did say that the man was crazy. I think that to-day. I didn't curse him. I expressed an opinion. I said, 'Get out of the way, you damned fool.' That is the only thing I said, or any kind of profanity."

We think, upon the whole case, his honor correctly submitted the issues to the jury.

[3-5] Punitive damages, sometimes called smart money, are allowed in cases where the injury is inflicted in a malicious, wanton, and reckless manner. The defendant's conduct must have been actually malicious or wanton, displaying a spirit of mischief towards the plaintiff, or of reckless and criminal indifference to his rights. When these elements are present, damages commensurate with the injury may be allowed by way of punishment to the defendant. But these damages are awarded on the grounds of public policy, for example's sake, and not because the plaintiff has a right to the money, but it goes to him merely because it is assessed in his suit. Both the awarding of punitive damages and the amount to be allowed, if any, rest in the sound discretion of the jury. Cobb v. Railway, 175 N. C. 132, 95 S. E. 92; Fields v. Bynum, 156 N. C. 413, 72 S. E. 449; Hayes v. Railway, 141 N. C. 199, 53 S. E. 847; Smithwick v. Ward, 52 N. C. 64, 75 Am. Dec. 453. However, the amount of punitive damages, while resting in the sound discretion of the jury, may not be excessively disproportionate to the circumstances of contumely and indignity present in each particular case. Gilreath v. Allen, 32 N. C. 67; Sloan v. Edwards, 61 Md. 100; Bernheimer v. Becker, 102 Md. 250, 62 Atl. 526, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 221, 111 Am. St. Rep. 356.

[6] In the case before us, it would seem that the jury have been liberal in their award, but we cannot say the amount is disproportionately excessive. The defendant is a physician, and he admitted that he was angry and knew the plaintiff was a feeble man. In fact, he stated that he thought he was crazy. The jury evidently concluded that, under these circumstances, the defendant, with his superior advantages, should have been more charitable in his conduct toward the plaintiff, a man in an unequal and less fortunate condition. It is unbecoming in the strong to deal oppressively with the weak; and the jury evidently thought the present defendant should be taxed with a substantial sum in the form of punitive damages, or smart money. We cannot say they have acted arbitrarily or harshly. It does not so appear on the record.

The remaining exceptions are apparently without special merit; and, upon a careful consideration of the whole case, we have found no sufficient reason for disturbing the result of the trial.

No error.

FALLS v. PALMETTO POWER & LIGHT CO. et al. (No. 10743.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 10, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error ⇐853—Charge not appealed from law of case.

A charge, not appealed from, is the law of the case.

2. False Imprisonment ⇐13—Arrest held unlawful.

Information given concerning plaintiff, as one who had committed a felony, and who was arrested on a warrant against John Doe, held not sufficient to warrant a man of ordinary reason to come to the conclusion that plaintiff was the man who committed the crime.

3. False Imprisonment ⇐31—Evidence held to show participation in unlawful arrest.

In an action for false imprisonment growing out of an arrest under information that plaintiff had sold property similar to that stolen, evidence held to show that the arrest was procured, instigated, and participated in by the general superintendent of the company from which the property was stolen.

4. Corporations ⇐433(1)—Responsibility for unlawful arrest held for jury.

Whether a power and light company was responsible for wrongful arrest of plaintiff for an alleged breaking, entering, and stealing of electric fans held for the jury, there being evidence that the person procuring the arrest was the general manager of all the company's business, and that the arrest was on account of its business.

5. False Imprisonment ⇐31—Willfulness warranting punitive damages shown.

In action against a power and light company, and its general superintendent, for unlawful arrest, evidence held such as to warrant a finding of willfulness or wantonness which would support punitive damages.

6. False Imprisonment ⇐36—$2,000 not excessive punitive damages.

A verdict for $2,000 punitive damages for willful unlawful arrest, causing plaintiff to miss a train, held not excessive or unreasonable.

Cothran, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Florence County; Thomas S. Sease, Judge.

Action by J. F. Falls against the Palmetto Power & Light Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Willcox & Willcox, Henry E. Davis, and James M. Lynch, all of Florence, for appellants.

Royall & Fulton and Whiting & Baker, all of Florence, for respondent.

FRASER, J. The case contains this statement:

"This was an action for damages, for an alleged false imprisonment of the respondent, arising out of the following facts: On the night of June 5, 1919, the storehouse of Palmetto Power & Light Company, a corporation engaged in the sale of electric current, and of electrical appliances in Florence, was broken into and an electric fan stolen therefrom. When discovered on the following morning the robbery was reported to the city police department. Upon investigation, it was discovered that upon the night of the robbery electric fans had been offered for sale in the city, to various persons, among others, to one J. W. Howard, proprietor of a restaurant, who described the person who had offered him the fan. It further developed that a fan had been purchased on that night by one Allowas, and upon examination the fan purchased by him was identified as that stolen from the electric company, and it was forthwith restored to that company by the police authorities."

"Thereafter, on the evening of June 8, 1919, Howard, seeing at the railroad station one whom he believed to have been the party who had offered to sell him two fans on the night of the robbery, telephoned the office of the company, and advised the general superintendent, the defendant Hodges, that the man who had tried to sell him a fan was at the depot, and if they would secure an officer they would get him. Thereupon Hodges had the police station telephoned, and upon being advised that the officer on duty then had no way of getting to the depot quickly, he offered the use of his personal automobile to carry him. Accordingly Hodges, the officer, and two others proceeded in Hodges' car to the depot. Upon arrival there, they were met by Howard, who advised them that the man had gone off, but that his baggage was there indicating the same. Whereupon Hodges walked over and kicked the bag, and, hearing a jingling sound, made some remark as to the bag containing tools. The officer went off in search of the party to be apprehended, and, upon his being pointed out by Howard, arrested the plaintiff, Falls."

"Falls, after some dispute, submitted to the arrest, and the officer started towards a taxicab. At this point Hodges against volunteered the use of his car. Falls, the officer, and the two who had accompanied Hodges to the depot got into the car with Hodges and he drove off. They went through the streets of the city to the place where they were informed Allowas lives, but upon arrival there ascertained that he was not the man who had purchased the fan. They accordingly drove to another part of the city, where the right man was located. Upon Falls being presented to him, he failed to identify him as the party who had sold to him the stolen fan. Whereupon the officer released Falls and left the car. Falls and Hodges had some words over what had taken place, but Hodges drove him back to the station, and there left him."

"The plaintiff brought suit for $5,000 against Hodges personally and against Palmetto Power & Light Company. The case came on to be heard before his honor, Judge Thomas S. Sease, and a jury at the November, 1920, term of the court of common pleas for Florence county. At the conclusion of the testimony the defendants submitted a motion for a directed verdict, which was refused. The jury found for the plaintiff $500 actual, and $2,000 punitive, damages. A motion for a new trial was made and refused. The defendants thereupon gave notice of an appeal to this court."

The appellant's argument says:

"The exceptions present for determination these questions:

"(1) Was the arrest unlawful?

"(2) If unlawful, was it procured, instigated, or participated in by Hodges?

"(3) If unlawful and procured, instigated or participated in by Hodges, was the appellant Palmetto Power & Light Company responsible for his acts in connection therewith?

"(4) Was there any testimony tending to show willfulness or wantonness upon which the jury could base a verdict for punitive damages?

"(5) Was the verdict for punitive damages excessive and unreasonable?"

I. Was the arrest unlawful?

His honor, Judge Sease, charged the jury as follows:

"Now what is a lawful arrest? I will first charge you that the breaking and entering of a house in the daytime or nighttime with intent to steal or commit some other felony is a felony, and any citizen may arrest a thief upon information, provided the information is sufficient to warrant a man of ordinary reason to come to the conclusion that the man sought to be arrested is the thief or felon. An officer or citizen may not arrest simply because a felony has been committed, but they may arrest the thief or felon, that is, the person who commits the felony or commits the theft, upon information that is reasonably calculated to satisfy a man of ordinary prudence and reason that the party sought to be arrested is guilty of a felony. I charge you that is applicable to an officer or a private citizen, and arrest may be made in these circumstances without a warrant."

[1,2] This charge, not being appealed from, is the law of this case. There was evidence that some fans had been stolen from the defendants' corporation, but no evidence that the fans offered for sale to the defendants' witness Howard were stolen fans. Whatever may be said as to the sufficiency of the evidence of identification of the plaintiff by the witness Howard, yet, as a matter of fact, the parties who made the arrest were not satisfied, and went off to find the purchaser of the fan. The warrant named the person to be arrested as "John Doe." That means that the person who made the affidavit and the officer who issued the warrant were uncertain as to the person to be arrested. The warrant itself bespoke caution. The plaintiff offered to prove his identity by citizens of Florence, easier of access than the purchaser of the fan, but his entreaties were ignored. His honor charged the jury that the arrest must be "upon information that is reasonably calculated to satisfy a man of ordinary prudence and reason that the party sought to be arrested is guilty of a felony." The information did not even satisfy the parties who made the arrest. Under the charge, therefore, the arrest was unlawful. This assignment of error cannot be sustained.

[3] II. If unlawful, was it procured, instigated or participated in by Hodges?

There was abundant evidence to show that the arrest was procured, instigated, and participated in by Hodges. The defendants' witness Howard stated:

"I had done what I promised to do, and that was all the interest I took in it. I had promised Mr. Hodges to telephone him. It was at his request and on account of the company's business I was to phone down there."

Mr Hodges directed the sending of the phone message to police headquarters. He went in his own car for the officer, took him to the place of arrest; watched the plaintiff's baggage for plaintiff's return; took the prisoner and officer to look for the purchaser of the stolen fan. There was abundant evidence from which the jury might have inferred that Mr. Hodges was the effective manager of the entire proceedings. This assignment of error cannot be sustained.

[4] III. If unlawful and procured, instigated, and participated in by Hodges, was the appellant Palmetto Power & Light Company responsible for his acts in connection therewith?

Here again the evidence was abundant. The evidence showed that Mr. Hodges was the general manager of all the company's business, and direct evidence, unobjected to, and by defendants' witness, that it was "on account of the company's business." It is true that Mr. Hodges, denied this, but that made it a question for the jury. This assignment of error cannot be sustained.

[5] IV. Was there any testimony tending to show willfulness or wantonness upon which the jury could base a verdict for punitive damages?

The plaintiff was arrested while his identity was uncertain. He was not informed of the cause of his arrest. His request that he be allowed to show who he was by business people of Florence was ignored. He was taken from a station where his train was about to depart, kept until it had gone; no apology for the injury done, and even though it suggested itself to Mr. Hodges that the plaintiff might be short of money, not only was there no offer of assistance, but it was made a matter of jest.

[6] V. Was the verdict for punitive damages excessive and unreasonable?

The answer is No.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

GARY, C. J., and WATTS, J., concur.

COTHRAN, J. (dissenting). The plaintiff recovered a verdict of $500 actual damages and $2,000 punitive damages, against both of the defendants, the one a corporation and the other its general superintendent, on account of an alleged false imprisonment, which arose out of the facts, a statement of which from the agreed case is reproduced in the leading opinion.

It may not always be so, but in this particular case the charge of false imprisonment (more accurately denominated wrongful or unlawful imprisonment) depends primarily upon the lawfulness of the plaintiff's arrest, and that must be determined by the statute and the decisions construing it. There is a conflict of testimony as to whether or not the police officer who actually made the arrest had in his possession at the time the arrest warrant which had been issued at the instance of the police department, charging the felony to have been committed by one "John Doe." The plaintiff testified that he asked for it, and was told that the officer did not have one; one of his witnesses testified that Bryant, the police officer who made the arrest, had the warrant in his pocket. In this conflict, I will consider the case as an arrest made without a warrant.

Under section 1 of the Criminal Code an arrest may be made by an officer or by a private citizen, for a felony not committed in his view, "upon certain information that a felony had been committed." This statute was passed, as this court has very clearly shown in the case of State v. Griffin, 74 S. C. 412, 54 S. E. 603, to remedy a situation disclosed by the previous case of State v. Anderson, 1 Hill, 327. In the latter case the right to arrest without a warrant for a felony not committed in the view of the person (officer or private citizen) making the arrest was declared to be dependent upon the fact that a felony had been committed. The statute corrected the rigor of this interpretation, and conferred the right where the person making the arrest had "certain information that a felony had been committed." The Griffin Case holds that:

"The word 'certain' is used in the sense of trustworthy, capable of being depended upon, credible, positive, or reliable, and has reference to the evidence or information upon which the person making the arrest is allowed to act, and not to the actual fact that a felony has been committed;" that the statute must be "construed as enabling the party making the arrest to act upon information although it might not be true, provided it was of such a nature as to convince a reasonable man that the act had been committed from which the law presumed the felony by the person arrested."

It will be noted that the statute makes no reference to the information relating to the identity of the person arrested, with the criminal, upon which the officer or private citizen is authorized to act; but, in view of the purpose of the act as above explained and the improbability that the exclusion of this matter was intended to permit the person making the arrest to act simply upon information that a crime had been committed, without reference to the connection of the person arrested with it, we must assume that the common-law rule in reference to this excluded or omitted matter remained unaffected. That principle is thus expressed in the Anderson Case:

"In treason and felony within the jurisdiction of a state, the regular mode of arrest is by warrant, but from necessity as well as sound policy, private persons are permitted to arrest, where a felony has been committed and there are reasonable grounds to suspect the party arrested to be the felon."

This of course refers to officers as well as private citizens, in fact with greater reason, naturally.

In the determination of the question at issue, two apparently antipodal interests must be harmonized if possible, the liberty of a private citizen, and the interest of the public in punishing and preventing crime; and before extreme penalties may be visited upon one who has made a mistake the latter interest should be carefully guarded; as is declared by the Supreme Court of Louisiana in the case of Lyons v. Carroll, 107 La. 471, 31 South. 760:

"Those who honestly seek the enforcement of the law, * * * and who are supported by circumstances sufficiently strong to warrant a cautious man in the belief that the party suspected may be guilty of the offense charged should not be made unduly apprehensive that they will be held answerable in damages."

That is the reason of the rule, also clearly expressed by Judge Pearson of the Supreme Court of North Carolina, in the case of Brockway v. Crawford, 48 N. C. 433, 67 Am. Dec. 250. The plaintiff was arrested by the defendant, a constable, without a warrant, at the instigation of a brother of the man whose horse had been stolen, charged with larceny of the horse. The constable acted upon a description of the thief, given to him by said brother, corroborated by another:

"The description of the clothes and the personal appearance resembled Clarey [the thief] very closely."

The plaintiff had a verdict which was reversed on appeal, the court holding:

"The law encourages every one, as well private citizens as officers, to keep a sharp lookout for the apprehension of felons, by holding them exempt from responsibility for an arrest or prosecution, although the party charged turns out not to be guilty, unless the arrest is made or the prosecution is instituted without probable cause and from malice."

The opinion further states:

"What has the plaintiff (if he be a good citizen) to complain of? A felony is committed, and the felon escapes; he is advertised, and a reward of $100 is offered for his apprehension. The plaintiff bears a close resemblance both in dress and personal appearance to the suspected person; his associations and fixedness in his position as a member of the community do not place him above the marks of honest suspicion which attach to him because of the close resemblance to the man who figures under the reward of $100 as a fugitive from justice. Has he cause to complain? Ought he not rather to congratulate himself that he lives in a land where justice is administered with a steady hand? And if occasionally 'the wrong passenger is waked up,' every good citizen should bear in mind that it was meant for the best, and will work around for the good of the whole."

"Probable cause for an arrest has been defined to be a reasonable ground of suspicion supported by circumstances sufficiently strong in themselves to warrant a cautious man in believing the accused to be guilty." 2 R. C. L. 451, citing People v. Klivington, 104 Cal. 86, 37 Pac. 799, 43 Am. St. Rep. 73; Diers v. Mallon, 48 Neb. 121, 64 N. W. 722, 50 Am. St. Rep. 596; Burk v. Howley, 179 Pa. 539, 36 Atl. 327, 57 Am. St. Rep. 607.

"Yet probable cause does not depend on the actual state of the case in point of fact, as it may turn out upon legal investigation, but on knowledge of facts and circumstances, which would be sufficient to induce a reasonable belief of the truth of the accusation." 2 R. C. L. 451.

"But since in such a case [arrest without warrant] the person to be arrested is not specifically indicated by a written warrant, and the officer must necessarily act on his own reasonable judgment, and often in haste to prevent the escape of the criminal, he is protected if he acts in good faith and on reasonable grounds of suspicion, though the person proves not to have been the felon, or no felony was in fact committed." 11 R. C. L. 801.

In Pinkerton v. Martin, 82 Ill. App. 589, it was held that detention by the officer in a county where the offence was not committed for a justifiable time for purposes of identification is not false imprisonment.

"A peace officer may also arrest without a warrant one whom he has reasonable or probable grounds to suspect of having committed a felony, even though the person suspected is innocent, and generally though no felony has in fact been committed by any one." 3 Cyc. 878.

"The reasonable and probable grounds that will justify an officer in arresting without a warrant one whom he suspects of felony must be such as would actuate a reasonable man, acting in good faith." 3 Cyc. 887.

In Eanes v. State, 6 Humph. (Tenn.) 53, 44 Am. Dec. 289, the defendant was a peace officer, and was indicted for assault and battery for the arrest without warrant of one Martin. A murder had been committed and the murderer had escaped; the defendant, a constable in another county, acting upon the Governor's proclamation, which contained a description of the fugitive. The coroner of the county had also written a letter containing a description of the person. The defendant, acting upon both, arrested Martin for the fugitive. He was convicted, but on appeal the judgment was reversed, the court holding:

"The liberty of the citizen is so highly regarded that the officer arresting a supposed felon, without warrant, must act in good faith, and upon grounds of probable suspicion that the person to be arrested is the actual felon. If he may not, under such circumstances, make an arrest, the escape of criminals would be but little obstructed by the official proclamation of the Governor, and the police of the state, instead of being, as public policy urgently requires, vigilant and effective, would be altogether the contrary."

In Reuck v. McGregor, 32 N. J. Law, 70, the plaintiff came into the defendant's store with a piece of cloth for sale. The defendant pronounced it a piece that had been stolen from his store. Angry words followed, and the defendant called a policeman, who put the plaintiff under arrest. It was not in fact the defendant's cloth, though similar to a piece he had had misplaced or stolen. The plaintiff had a verdict of $3,000. Upon this appeal the court said:

"We cannot fail to pronounce this a very striking instance of mistaken identity, without any evil design against the plaintiff, and founded upon such reasonable grounds of belief as would be sufficient, at least, to relieve the defendant from any charge of malicious prosecution, had he made complaint to the magistrate before the arrest, and quite sufficient to authorize the defendant to arrest the plaintiff, without warrant, if the proof that a felony had been committed had been complete. The proof is not clear that a larceny of McGregor's cloth had been committed, yet he never found it, and there is nothing in the case to induce us to think that he feigned it, or that he did not believe it, but, on the contrary, the circumstances would reasonably create the belief in the mind of McGregor that his cloth had been stolen."

And they held that, considering these circumstances, the verdict was excessive, and granted a new trial.

In Samuel v. Payne, Doug. Rep. 359, Lord Mansfield laid down the law that if a felony has been committed any man, upon reasonable, probable ground of suspicion, may justly apprehending the suspected person.

In Holley v. Mix, 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 350, 20 Am. Dec. 702, it is said:

"If an innocent person is arrested upon suspicion by a private individual, such individual is excused if a felony was in fact committed and there was a reasonable ground to suspect the person arrested."

In a note to 55 Am. Dec. 104, Judge Freeman says, citing Bail Cr. L. 543:

"Probable suspicion of who the offending party is will justify the arrest by an officer; and probable suspicion will be a justification when it transpires that no felony had in fact been committed, provided that the officer had reasonable grounds to suspect the arrested party."

In Carr v. State, 43 Ark. 99, it is held:

"Where a felony has in fact been committed, either an officer or a private citizen, who has reasonable ground to suspect a particular person, may, if acting in good faith, arrest such person without a warrant."

A peace officer may arrest without a warrant if he has reasonable ground to suspect that defendant is guilty of a felony. Johnson v. State, 30 Ga. 426; Harris v. Bennet, 1 Phila. (Pa.) 175; Lewis v. State, 3 Head (Tenn.) 127.

This being the unquestioned law of the case, the inquiry naturally follows, Does the testimony show that the police officer who made the arrest, and Hodges, who I will assume instigated the arrest, come within the rule?

The testimony does not disclose a single circumstance to my mind tending to show that they, or either of them, had any other purpose or motive than to do what is the duty of every good citizen, to run down the perpetrator of a crime, or that they were not acting in good faith upon a reasonable suspicion that Falls was the guilty party. He was a stranger in Florence; neither of these men knew him, and therefore could not have entertained any personal animosity towards him; they were both, the one an officer of the law and the other an employee of the power company, deeply concerned in apprehending the criminal; and if either showed a disposition to wantonly harass the plaintiff or to do otherwise than they should be expected to have done under the circumstances, I have failed to read the testimony aright.

A felony had been committed; a store had been burglarized and property stolen; a part of the stolen property had been recovered from a man to whom the thief had sold it; property of the same kind had been offered to another for sale at suspicious prices on the night of the robbery; the latter described the man who offered the property to him by clothing and appearance, and promised to report it if he saw him again. Two days afterwards Howard, the café man, to whom the property was offered for sale, was at the Florence depot, and saw a man whom he believed to be the party who had proposed the sale. He phoned the information to the superintendent of the power company. The police department was notified, and the superintendent went around to headquarters in his car and carried the policeman to the station for the purpose of making the arrest. The plaintiff was a stranger in Florence, and was about to leave on the train. He had with him, innocently as it developed, a bag of tools. He was identified by Howard as the man who had offered to sell him fans. Thereupon he was arrested.

The validity of the arrest must be determined, not by what followed, but by the circumstances as they existed at the time of the arrest. It may or may not have been proper for the police officer and Hodges to convey the plaintiff to the Greek for identification, as the seller of the fan, which was recovered and turned back to the company, or to refuse his request that he be vouched for at O'Dowd's Theater, where he had been at work, or to decline to pay his hotel bill, or to treat him with discourteous jest when they had carried him back to the depot, but those circumstances could not invalidate an arrest previously made if valid at the time it was made. They could only be considered upon the question of punitive damages in the event that the arrest was unlawful.

I think that under the law the police department and Hodges were entirely justified, in the circumstances, to make the arrest, and that the police would have been subjected to just criticism if they had not acted upon the information which they received, coming as it did from an entirely disinterested source and exceedingly reasonable in its nature. It is unfortunate and greatly to be regretted that they subjected an innocent man to the humiliation of an unjust accusation, but as their good faith in the matter cannot be reasonably questioned in my opinion, the plaintiff's discomfiture should be borne with equanimity and with the assurance that it is far better that individual hardships may go unrequited than that the vigor of the enforcement of the law be paralyzed by the fear of damage suits.

In my opinion it will be a serious blow to the efficient discovery of crime and arrest of the criminal to sustain the judgment in this case. It may easily be conceived that the very same circumstances that existed in this case would point to the real burglar; and yet a majority conclusion will stay the arm of the law and allow him with his kit of tools and positive identification "to fold his tent like the Arab and silently steal away."

It must be remembered that at the time Howard phoned to the company's office the warrant had been issued at the instance, not of Hodges, but of the police department, and upon information furnished, not by Hodges, but by Howard and the Greek. Both gave the same description, and the police had looked all over town for a man answering that description. The chief testified: "I had not spoken to the Palmetto Power & Light Company, or Hodges, concerning the warrant." It is very clear that if Howard had phoned to the police instead of to the office of the company, the police would have done precisely what they did and should have done. The chief says:

"If I had found as chief of police any one answering the description contained on that warrant I would have arrested him. If I had been informed by Mr. Howard or Allowas that a certain man was the man that sold him a fan, I would have arrested him."

It is plain therefore that the police acted, not upon Hodges' insistence, but upon the information received from Howard, which had been relayed from the office.

The law requires that immediately upon arrest the party shall be taken before a magistrate to be dealt with according to law. Strictly speaking, the officer was not warranted in taking the plaintiff to the Greek's shop for identification, but, interpreting the motive by the conduct of the officer after the identification had failed, the prompt release of the plaintiff, it is clear that this was done for the benefit of the plaintiff, that he might be discharged without being committed to jail should the identification fail. I do not see that this was a matter of which he could complain, when it resulted so quickly to his advantage. Serious complaint is made upon the ground that the plaintiff was not allowed to stop at O'Dowd's Theater and obtain from him a certificate of his good character. O'Dowd does not appear to have had any acquaintance with the plaintiff until he came to Florence to do certain work upon an organ, on Friday before the arrest on Sunday. Certainly an interview with O'Dowd could not have been as effective as that with the Greek proved to be. If O'Dowd could have established the innocence of the plaintiff, which is more than doubtful, he certainly could not have accomplished more than the Greek did. The gist of his complaint is that he was not carried to one whose ability to exculpate him was questionable, but to one whose testimony completely exonerated him and caused his immediate release. As the chief of police testified, the Greek was the proper man to identify him and not O'Dowd. If the plaintiff had been carried to O'Dowd and had been vouched for by him and discharged, I have no idea that it would have prevented this suit for damages.

"A legal arrest is not tainted by a subsequent illegal detention so as to make the arresting officer a trespasser ab initio unless the arrest was intended as a cover to subsequent illegal conduct." 19 Cyc. 355, citing Friesenhan v. Maines, 137 Mich. 10, 100 N. W. 172.

Complaint is also made that no consideration was paid to the plaintiff after he was returned to the station. It appears that Falls was naturally and justifiably indignant on account of the unfounded charge preferred against him, and doubtless gave vent to his indignation in forcible language, which he had the right to do. But, choosing to exercise this right, he cannot complain that certain courtesies were not extended to him which, humanly speaking, were made impossible by his own extreme language.

Assuming, however, for argument's sake that the arrest was unlawful, and that it was instigated and participated in by Hodges, the superintendent of the power company, I think that the authorities are absolutely conclusive of the immunity of the corporation for such acts by its superintendent. They clearly establish this proposition:

One who is charged with custody and control of property of another is authorized to do any and all things necessary to protect and preserve the property. If it were necessary to arrest one to prevent a theft of the property, he would be authorized to cause such an arrest, not to punish the offender, but to prevent the theft. After a theft is committed, however, he would have no authority to put the criminal law in operation, because the object then sought, and the result thereby attained, would not be the protection or preservation of the property, but the punishment of the criminal and the vindication of justice.

The leading case upon the subject seems to be the English case of Allen v. London and S. W. Ry. L. R. 6 Q. B., 65. In that case, a clerk in the service of the corporation was charged with the duty of selling tickets to passengers, and receiving the money therefor, which he deposited in a till. The clerk arrested and gave into custody one whom he suspected of attempting to rob the till. Lord Blackburn, delivered an opinion, in which he makes the following statement of the law:

"There is marked distinction between an act done for the purpose of protecting the property by preventing a felony or of receiving it back and an act done for the purpose of punishing the offender for that which has already been done. There is no implied authority in a person having the custody of property to take such steps as he thinks fit to punish a person who he supposes has done something with reference to the property which he has not done. The act of punishing the offender is not anything done with reference to the property; it is done merely for the purpose of vindicating justice."

The Supreme Court of Maryland, after quoting Lord Blackburn, held:

"From these authorities it is quite clear that in a case like the present, where the corporation is sought to be held liable for the wrongful and malicious act of its agent or servant in putting the criminal law in operation against a party upon a charge of having fraudulently embezzled the money and goods of the company, in order to sustain the right to recover, it should be made to appear that the agent was expressly authorized to act as he did by the corporation. The doing of such an act could not, in the nature of things, be in the exercise of the ordinary duties of the agent or servant intrusted with the custody of the company's money or goods; and, before the corporation can be made liable for such an act, it must be shown, either that there was express precedent authority for doing the act, or that the act has been ratified and adopted by the corporation." Carter v. Howe Mach. Co., 51 Md. 290, 34 Am. Rep. 311.

In Mali v. Lord, 39 N. Y. 381, 100 Am. Dec. 448, the superintendent of defendant's store caused the arrest and search of a female customer, whom he suspected of having stolen goods. The New York court thus stated the rule in holding the master not liable:

"In examining this question, it must be assumed that, by the employment, the master confers upon the servant the right to do all necessary and proper acts for the protection and preservation of his property, to protect it against any thieves and marauders, and that the servant owes the duty so to protect it to his employer. But this does not include the power in question. It cannot be presumed that a master, by intrusting his servant with his property, and conferring power upon him to transact his business, thereby authorizes him to do any act for its protection that he could not lawfully do himself if present. The master would not, if present, be justified in arresting, detaining, and searching a person upon suspicion, however strong, of having stolen his goods, and secreted them upon his person.

"The authority of the defendants to the superintendent could not therefore be implied from his employment. The act was not done in the business of the defendants, and they were not, as masters, responsible therefor."

The federal Circuit Court in Pressley v. Mobile & G. R. Co. (C. C.) 15 Fed. 199, reaches the same conclusion. There a person employed as a land agent by defendant company, and as such having custody of certain property, caused the arrest of plaintiff upon a charge of grand larceny committed in reference to such property. The court said:

"The question is, Can such action on his part be held to be within the scope of his agency and in the course of his employment? There may be, and the books recognize some difficulty in determining what acts of an agent or employee are properly within the range and course of his employment; but to say that to put the criminal law in operation against a party on a charge of larceny of the property of the corporation is within the scope of his agency, and in the course of his employment, is a proposition which, in the light of the decided cases, cannot be maintained."

It is held in the following cases that where the servant acts outside of the duties of his employment, and without express directions, his act ceases to be that of the master; the servant, and not the master, is liable for the consequences. Courtney v. Baker, 37 N. Y. Super. Ct. 255; Isaacs v. Railroad Co., 47 N. Y. 127, 7 Am. Rep. 418; Cosgrove v. Ogden, 49 N. Y. 258, 10 Am. Rep. 361; Mott v. Ice Co., 73 N. Y. 548; Garretzen v. Duenckel, 50 Mo. 109, 11 Am. Rep. 405; Carter v. Mach. Co., 51 Md. 297, 34 Am. Rep. 811.

"The rule is well settled that the liability of a principal for the act of his agent in instituting a malicious prosecution or causing a false arrest or imprisonment is dependent on whether the principal previously authorized the act, or subsequently ratified it, or whether the act was within the scope of the agent's employment. If previously authorized or subsequently ratified, or if within the scope of the agent's employment, the principal is liable; otherwise he is not." Note, Fisher v. Westmoreland, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 638.

The case of Daniel v. A. C. L., 136 N. C. 517, 48 S. E. 816, 67 L. R. A. 455, 1 Ann. Cas. 718, contains an exceedingly able presentation of the question; the court arriving at the foregoing conclusion.

The case of Simmons v. Okeetee Club, 86 S. C. 73, 68 S. E. 131, is instructive. In this case Thomas was the agent and servant of the Okeetee Club, and as such charged with the care and protection of its property. Simmons, the plaintiff, an adjoining landowner, claimed that Okeetee Club had erected a fence on lands belonging to him, and he proceeded to tear down the fence. Thereafter it was replaced, and plaintiff was warned by the agent Thomas that if the fence was torn down again, he (Thomas) would shoot the plaintiff. The plaintiff did tear down the fence, and Thomas proceeded to carry his threat into execution. Simmons sued Thomas and the club, alleging that "Thomas was in charge of his duty to Okeetee Club, and acting within the scope thereof," in shooting him. Upon these facts, this court, speaking through Mr. Justice (now Chief Justice) Gary, held:

"We proceed to consider whether there was any testimony tending to show that the shooting of the plaintiff by Thomas was within the apparent scope of his authority to protect the fence. The undisputed testimony showed that at the time of the shooting the fence had been cut by the plaintiff, who had resumed work on the railroad about 1,600 feet from the place where the fence had stood; and of course he was not then attempting to injure the fence. The act of destroying the fence was then completely executed. If the testimony had shown that the shooting took place while the work of destruction was in fieri, the nonsuit would have been improper. But we fail to see what relation the shooting had to the protection of the property, as it could not be successfully contended that it would prevent the plaintiff, in future, from cutting the fence. Under such circumstances the court cannot hold that there was testimony tending to show that the shooting was within the implied authority of the agent."

In Davenport v. Railroad Co., 72 S. C. 205, 51 S. E. 677, 110 Am. St. Rep. 598, the servants of the railway company, while engaged in operating a freight train, threw bricks at plaintiff's dwelling house. And in distinguishing the case from Polatty v. Railway Co., 67 S. C. 391, 45 S. E. 932, 100 Am. St. Rep. 750, Mr. Justice Jones very clearly shows that in Polatty v. Railway Co., the engineer was engaged in protecting the property of his principal from a trespasser, and hence within the scope of his agency, whereas, in Davenport v. Railway, the servants were not so engaged, and under the facts their actions were not within the scope of their agency, and the master was not liable therefor.

This, then, is the situation. Hodges is the general superintendent in charge of the plant and property of the company at Florence. As such he has the authority to protect and preserve that property. A fan is stolen. Subsequently it is recovered. A day or two later, one suspected of the theft is arrested, upon the alleged instigation of Hodges. Even if procured by him, the company is not responsible for his act in causing the arrest. Its property has been recovered. His act in causing the arrest is not to preserve or protect its property, but to apprehend and punish the criminal. The company has no interest therein, aside from the general public interest. Hodges' act is not authorized or ratified by the company. Under the overwhelming weight of authority it is not within the apparent scope of his agency. He acted in the public interest, for the vindication of justice, not the protection of his principal. There can be but one conclusion consonant with established precedent; the company is not liable.

In the case of Fields v. Lancaster Mills, 77 S. C. 546, 58 S. E. 608, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 822, 122 Am. St. Rep. 593, the plaintiff was thrown into a pond by the overseers of the mill in the presence of the superintendent. It was an issue in the case whether the superintendent participated in the wrong. The plaintiff was a labor scout, and his presence on the mill property was not desired. The question of the mill's responsibility for the act of the superintendent was decided upon this point:

"The evidence on the part of the defendant shows the superintendent, in this instance, was intrusted with the control of its policy and the methods to be employed to prevent interference with the operatives"

—a matter placed under his control by the mill, and the court very properly held that it was within the scope of his employment.

The case of Stephenson v. Baldwin Mills, 114 S. C. 367, 103 S. E. 710, was one of arrest under a void warrant. The court says:

"The evidence is conclusive that the warrant was gotten out by the authorities of the mill, to collect the debt."

Of course under these circumstances there could be no question but that the mill was liable.

In Hypes v. Railway Co., 82 S. C. 315, 64 S. E. 395, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 873, 17 Ann. Cas. 620, the action was against the corporation for a slander by its superintendent. The case was upon demurrer to the complaint, which alleged that the slander was uttered "within the scope of his authority and in the discharge of his duties as superintendent," which of course brought it within the rule.

In Daniel v. A. C. L., 136 N. C. 517, 48 S. E. 816, 67 L. R. A. 455, 1 Ann. Cas. 718, this exceedingly clear and logical statement occurs:

"A servant intrusted with his master's goods may do what is necessary to preserve and protect them, because his authority to do so is clearly implied by the nature of the service; but when the property has been taken from his custody or stolen, and the crime has already been committed, it cannot be said that a criminal prosecution is necessary for its preservation or protection. This may lead to the punishment of the thief or the trespasser, but it certainly will not restore the property, or tend in any degree to preserve or protect it. It is an act clearly without the scope of the agency, and cannot possibly be brought within the limits of the implied authority of the agent. It would seem that so plain a proposition should need neither argument nor authority to support it, but we are abundantly supplied with both in the cases upon the subject."

In Washington Co. v. Lansden, 172 U. S. 534, 19 Sup. Ct. 296, 43 L. Ed. 543, the rule is thus stated:

"The result of the authorities is, as we think, that in order to hold a corporation liable for the torts of any of its agents, the act in question must be performed in the course and within the scope of the agent's employment in the business of the principal."

In that case it was sought to hold the corporation liable for a libel published by the general manager of the company, relating to certain testimony the plaintiff had given before a congressional committee. The court said further:

"There must be evidence of some facts from which the authority of the agent to act upon or in relation to the subject-matter involved may be fairly and legitimately inferred by the court or jury," and that, if only one inference can be drawn from the evidence, the question is one of law for the court.

They held that although Leetch was the general manager and was writing about a matter connected with the business of the company, there was no evidence from which it could be legitimately inferred that his authority extended to the matter in hand.

I think that it is perfectly clear that Hodges is not liable, for the reason that he acted as a man of ordinary care would have acted and as a correct conception of a public duty dictated; that the power company is not liable, for the reasons just stated; but, if Hodges should be liable and the power company not, the judgment should be reversed as to him, for the reason that the burden of paying the verdict which has been assessed against them both jointly should not be permitted to rest upon the appellant Hodges individually.

The jury in writing its verdict was seeking not only to compensate respondent, but also to punish both appellants. It would hence be obviously unfair to compel the appellant Hodges to suffer for the punishment of both. It would follow, therefore, that if this company should have had a verdict directed in its favor, then the verdict should be set aside, and the appellant Hodges granted a new trial. This is in accordance with the general rule. The rule is thus stated:

"An entire judgment, jointly binding on several parties, if it is reversed as to one, must be reversed as to all."

This rule is supported by the weight of authority in this country. Thus it has been held by the United States Supreme Court in Washington Gaslight Co. v. Lansden, 172 U. S. 534, 19 Sup. Ct. 296, 43 L. Ed. 543, that—

"Where the rights and liabilities of defendants are so intermingled that, although there was error as to only one, it might work an injustice as to the others if the judgment was left intact as to them, the judgment will be reversed in toto."

It cannot be affirmed that a verdict of $2,500 would have been rendered against Hodges, a private citizen, if the suit had been dismissed against the corporation as it should have been.

I have devoted more attention to this case than my other duties perhaps justified, but I am deeply impressed with the far-reaching consequences of affirming this judgment, upon the administration of law and order. In this day of an unprecedented crime wave, every encouragement should be extended to the guardians of the law, and, although individual instances of hardship may occur, these faithful protectors of society should not be themselves manacled, as I fear will be the consequence.

My conviction is that the circuit court should have directed a verdict in favor of both defendants, and that in any event the judgment against Hodges should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

MATHESON et al. v. CARIBO et al. (No. 10744.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 4, 1921.)

1. Bills and notes §537(1)—Genuineness of indorsement by mark held for jury.

In action on note, whether defendant's intestate indorsed note held for jury, notwithstanding testimony of witness, whose name appeared on note as that of subscribing witness to intestate's signature by her mark, that intestate had not made the mark.

2. Trial §139(1)—Verdict not directed unless reasonable minds can draw but one inference from evidence.

A verdict should not be directed except where reasonable minds can draw but one inference from the evidence; that is, where there is an entire absence of evidence to support a contrary conclusion.

3. Signatures §5—Subscribing witness' denial of execution of signature by mark not conclusive.

Denial of genuineness of signature by mark by subscribing witness thereto is not conclusive that signature is not genuine, but the mark can be shown to have been in fact made by person by whom it purports to have been made, by other evidence.

Watts, J., and Gary, C. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Marlboro County; Ernest Moore, Judge.

Action by J. J. Matheson and another against James H. Caribo and Julian McLaurin, as administrator of the estate of M. J. Hood, deceased. Judgment for last named defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, and new trial granted.

W. M. Stevenson, of Bennettsville, for appellants.

J. W. Le Grand, of Bennettsville, for respondents.

COTHRAN, J. [1] I think that under the evidence in this case the issue of fact as to the indorsement by Mrs. Hood of the Caribo note should have been submitted to the jury, and for that reason I dissent from the judgment of the court approving the circuit judge's direction of a verdict in favor of the defendant.

[2] The rule is well established that the circuit judge should direct a verdict in those instances only where reasonable minds could draw but one inference from the evidence; this of course would occur where there is an entire absence of evidence to support a contrary conclusion. I do not think that result can be attained in this case.

The evidence tends to establish the following facts: In the fall of 1914 Robert H. Hood, son of Mrs. M. J. Hood, the defendant's intestate, was indebted to the plaintiff, whom I shall refer to as "Matheson," in the sum of $1,166.12, on account of goods sold. The account was secured by three notes and mortgages given by Robert H. Hood to Matheson aggregating $1,595.60, and by a note for $241.77, given by the defendant Caribo to Robert H. Hood, due October 15, 1914, which was assigned to Matheson as collateral security to his obligations. When the Caribo note fell due on October 15, 1914, he renewed it, making the new note for the same amount payable to Matheson instead of Hood, and due November 15, 1914. Matheson was pressing Robert H. Hood for the debt of $1,166.12, and his mother, Mrs. M. J. Hood, was disposed and anxious to help her son out of his financial difficulties. It is positively testified to by one of the Mathesons: That he went to the home of Mrs. Hood on October 29, 1914, for the purpose of getting the matters between them and Robert H. Hood settled. That in his presence Mrs. Hood agreed with Robert H. Hood to advance him $925.95, indorse the Caribo note for $241.77, and take an assignment from Matheson of the notes and mortgages they held against Robert H. Hood. That a bank check was drawn by Mrs. Hood for $925.95, payable to Matheson and turned over to him. This check was signed by Mrs. Hood by her mark, and witnessed by another son or son-in-law, J. M. Hood, who attended to all of her business. The notes and mortgages of Robert H. Hood were transferred to Mrs. Hood; the date of the transfer being the same as that of the check, October 29, 1914. Matheson left, taking with him the check and the Caribo note, indorsed "M. J. ^{her} x Hood. Witness: J. M. Hood." He collected ^{mark} the check and turned the Caribo note over to Mr. Powell, a member of his firm.

The Caribo note not having been paid at maturity, this action was instituted against Caribo and the respondent McLaurin as administrator of the estate of Mrs. Hood. The complaint, in addition to the usual allegations, contains the allegation:

"That before delivery and in order that the said Matheson Bros. should accept the same, M. J. Hood indorsed said note."

This allegation is not sustained by the evidence, the plaintiff clearly showing that the Caribo note had been renewed by him on October 15, 1914, placed among the assets of the firm and taken from thence when one of the plaintiffs started to Mrs. Hood's house for the purpose of settling matters. No point, however, appears to have been made upon this discrepancy; the issue being upon the execution of the indorsement by Mrs. Hood, which was disputed in the answer.

Upon the trial of the case J. M. Hood, whose name appears as a witness to Mrs. Hood's indorsement by her mark, was called as a "hostile" witness by the plaintiffs. He practically admitted his signature, but denied that his mother signed the indorsement or knew anything whatever about the note. Other witnesses for the defendant testified to very much the same effect.

[3] The circuit judge's ruling upon the motion for a directed verdict was to the effect that the subscribing witness should be produced, and, should he, although admitting his signature, deny the execution of the instrument, that would be an end of the matter; that there would be "no room for presumption." I think that this is an erroneous conception of the law. It practically puts the proponent of the document at the mercy of the self-interest, forgetfulness, or rascality of the subscribing witness, and limits the proof of the execution of a document to the testimony of a subscribing witness.

It must be remembered in the first place that the paper in question is not one which is required by law to be witnessed. While the general practice is to have a witness to the signature of one who signs by mark, I know of no law which requires it, but regard it as more a matter of convenient proof than anything else.

"A note executed by a mark may be proved by one who witnessed it, whether he was named as a subscribing witness or not." Robinson v. Robinson, 20 S. C. 567, at page 570.

"We are very much inclined to think that, in view of the disposition both of the courts and of the Legislatures to relax the strictness of the common-law rules of evidence, it would be more in accordance with reason, and more conducive to a prompt disposition of causes, to hold that the execution of any written instrument except a will can be proved by any testimony, otherwise competent, and that it is not necessary to introduce the subscribing witness for that purpose." Swancey v. Parrish, 62 S. C. 240, at page 244, 40 S. E. 554, 555.

But assume for the moment that the signature was required to be witnessed, what is the law? The proponent has done his duty when he produces the subscribing witness; he is not bound hand and foot by the answers of that witness.

This court has declared in the case of Merck v. Merck, 89 S. O. 347, at page 351, 71 S. E. 969, 971 (Ann. Cas. 1913A, 937):

"We are of the opinion, however, that the circuit judge erred in excluding evidence of the handwriting of the persons whose names are on the paper as subscribing witnesses. The defendant Mann was in this plight: Mrs. L. C. Merck, one of the persons whose names were subscribed as witnesses to the alleged deed from Blumer Merck to L. O. Merck, was hostile, and, upon being put on the stand, testified in effect that the deed was not delivered. The other witness, Hester, was excluded because disqualified by interest. Under these conditions the defendant Mann had a right to introduce other testimony tending to prove the execution of the deed; and evidence of the handwriting of the witnesses, of the grantor's acknowledgment of the validity of the deed after its execution, and of any facts tending to show that the deed had been executed, was clearly admissible. Land titles would be very insecure if they should fail whenever the subscribing witnesses might deny that they witnessed the execution of the deed, or might become for any cause incompetent to testify to its execution. It is true in proving a deed the subscribing witnesses must be produced or their absence accounted for, but manifestly the title cannot be made to depend entirely on their testimony. Whenever the witnesses are dead or inaccessible, or have become incapacitated, or deny the execution in their presence, or for any cause are unable or unwilling to prove the execution, then other evidence may be introduced. This is a principle of general recognition. Pearson v. Wightman, 1 Mill, 336, 12 Am. Dec. 636; Congdon v. Morgan, 14 S. C. 594; Gable v. Rauch, 50 S. C. 95, 27 S. E. 555; Brucke v. Hubbard, 74 S. C. 144, 54 S. E. 249; Buchanan v. Simpson (Ga.) 31 S. E. 105; Greenleaf on Evidence, vol. 1, p. 762; 11 A. & E. Ency. 598."

That was the case of a deed where subscribing witnesses are required by the law. The cases and authorities cited by the court are full to the point. Would it not be a remarkable situation, take this case, for instance, that the plaintiffs, who are debarred by the Code from testifying must be absolutely concluded by the testimony of a subscribing witness directly interested in the result?

Now let us see whether or not there is any evidence, outside of the denial of the subscribing witness, which tends to show that Mrs. Hood signed the indorsement. If so, an issue of fact was presented for the jury, and it was error to direct a verdict.

In the first place, as Mr. Wigmore says (vol. 1, § 157):

"The existence of the document purporting to be signed by A. is, under all circumstances, some evidence of A.'s genuine execution of it."

In the next place, proof of the handwriting of the subscribing witness is admissible evidence of the execution. It is stronger than that here, for the witness admits his signature.

In the last place, the circumstances of the negotiations impress me, to say the least, as pointing to the indorsement of the note by Mrs. Hood.

Assuming for the purposes of this appeal the statements of Matheson to be true, there was an agreement upon Mrs. Hood's part to settle the debt of her son to Matheson by paying cash $925.95, indorsing the Caribo note of $241.77, and taking from Matheson an assignment of the notes and mortgages of her son. It is admitted that she gave a check for the cash payment, which was signed exactly as the note appears to have been signed: "M. J. x Hood. Witness: J. M. Hood." It is also admitted that the notes and mortgages were assigned and delivered by Matheson to her. The transaction was closed, as Matheson stated the agreement to have been, with the exception of the disputed indorsement. The notes and mortgages were left with Mrs. Hood, and Matheson took with him the check and the Caribo note.

The error in the direction of a verdict was fundamental: The conclusive limitation of the plaintiffs to the testimony of the subscribing witness; the denial of the right, notwithstanding the repudiation of the indorsement by the witness, to rely upon the other pregnant facts and circumstances of the case.

In Northrop v. Lumber Co., 186 Fed. 770, 108 C. C. A. 640, it is said:

"Where the subscribing witnesses deny or forget their attestation, other evidence, direct or circumstantial, may, of course, be resorted to prove its execution."

Exactly in line with Merck v. Merck, supra. See, also, Patterson v. Tucker, 9 N. J. Law, 322, 17 Am. Dec. 472, a particularly well-reasoned decision, which cites our own case of Pearson v. Wightman, 1 Mill, Const. 336, 12 Am. Dec. 636, and sums up the discussion in these words:

"The law prudently calls for the testimony of the witness, but is too wise and too conscious of human imperfection and frailty to rest its confidence, to limit its inquiry, and to conclude the rights of the parties solely by the recollection or forgetfulness, the integrity or waywardness of any witness."

Judgment reversed, and new trial granted.

FRASER, J., and THOMAS, Acting Associate Judge, concur.

WATTS, J. (dissenting). This is an appeal from a directed verdict by his honor, Judge Moore, in favor of the respondent McLaurin, as administrator of M. J. Hood, deceased; the issue being whether Mrs. M. J. Hood, respondent's intestate, indorsed the note sued on, the exception raises the issue that his honor erred in not sending the case to the jury. The evidence of J. M. Hood, the witness to the note, M. J. Hood having made her mark, is that M. J. Hood did not indorse the note, and that the alleged indorsement was not brought to the attention of M. J. Hood while he was present. There was no evidence to send the case to the jury that Mrs. Hood indorsed the note by making her mark, or that she knew anything about it. His honor, in my opinion, committed no error, and exception should be overruled, and I think judgment should be affirmed.

MATTISON v. GLENN. (No. 10730.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 10, 1921.)

Landlord and tenant \Rightarrow 331(1)—Owner must account to share cropper for market value when settlement demanded, with interest from such date.

In a share cropper's action against owner for an accounting, the court erred in charging defendant on the basis of the value of plaintiff's share of the crop, if sold at the highest price at which it could be sold at any time after plaintiff demanded settlement; defendant being properly chargeable with no more than the market value at the time settlement was demanded, with interest on the balance due from that date.

Gary, C. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Anderson County; F. B. Gary, Judge.

Action by Pink Mattison against W. Keith Glenn. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

The decree of the court below is as follows:

This is a suit for accounting between the plaintiff and the defendant, W. Keith Glenn. The plaintiff claims that as a share cropper the said defendant is still due him practically all of plaintiff's share of the crop raised by him. The said defendant claims that he does not owe plaintiff anything. That the said defendant has furnished the plaintiff supplies to an amount greater than the plaintiff's share of the crop, and that the plaintiff is really indebted to the said defendant in the sum of 90-odd dollars. It was referred to a special referee to take the testimony in the case and to state the account between the parties. The special referee has taken the testimony and made his report. Both sides except to the report. Their several exceptions may be found in the record. The case is now before me upon these exceptions.

The testimony as to many of the facts in dispute is vague, indefinite, and unsatisfactory. Frequently it amounts to no more than an assertion on the part of the plaintiff and a denial on the part of the defendant. It is difficult to determine with certainty where the truth is. I think the special referee has in the main reached just conclusions, except as to the nature of the final judgment rendered by him. I agree with the referee as to the terms of the contract between the parties, and that they were share croppers. The main questions, then, are: First. What crops were made by plaintiff? Second. What supplies were furnished plaintiff by defendant? Third. What incidental items should be credited to each?

To answer these questions is simply to state the accounts between the parties. This we will proceed to do. The plaintiff should, of course, be credited with one-half of the crops raised by him, the value thereof being ascertained by calculating what it will amount to if sold at the highest price at which said crop could be sold any time after the plaintiff demanded a settlement from the said defendant. This principle of settlement between share croppers is recognized in the recent case of Rainwater et al. v. Mer. & Farmers' Bank of Cheraw, S. C., 114 S. C. 358, 103 S. E. 587.

The defendant claims to have an account against the plaintiff for supplies amounting to $2,034.74. Some of the items going to make up this account should not be allowed. The item of $140.82 for interest was properly disallowed by the referee. The item of $8 for bolster should not be allowed. The item of $8 for three wagon tongues should not be allowed. The item of $2.50 for two hoes should not be allowed. If the remaining items are incorrect, the testimony is too unsatisfactory and vague to warrant the court in so holding.

The account of the said defendant against the plaintiff would therefore stand as follows:

The account as set forth.....	$2,034 74
Less items disallowed.....	159 32

Balance	$1,875 42
---------------	------------

The plaintiff's account against the said defendant should stand as follows:

For cotton seed.....	$ 41 33
For 12 bushels of bottom corn at $2.25 per bushel	27 00
For cane seed.....	6 00
For one-half good cotton, to wit, 5,095 pounds, at 33 cents per pound.....	1,681 35
For one-half off-grade cotton, to wit, 2,019 pounds, at 30 cents per pound.....	605 70

Total	$2,361 43
	1,875 42

Balance due plaintiff.....	$ 486 01
----------------------------	-----------

—for which amount plaintiff should have judgment against the defendant, W. Keith Glenn.

It is therefore hereby ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the special referee's report herein be and the same is amended in the particulars indicated, and that the plaintiff, Mattison, have leave to enter up judgment against the defendant, W. Keith Glenn, for the sum of $486.01.

A. H. Dagnall, of Anderson, for appellant.
Bonham & Allen, of Anderson, for respondent.

COTHRAN, J. In view of the conflicting and confused state of the testimony in this case, the circuit judge has arrived at the justice of it as nearly as we might hope to do, with these exceptions:

(1) The defendant should account for the good cotton at 28 cents per pound and the off-grade at 25 cents per pound; the rule in the Rainwater Case, 114 S. C. 358, 103 S. E. 587, does not justify charging him with more than the market value at the time settlement was demanded, with interest from that date, November 1, 1918; the interest to be calculated upon the balance ascertained to be due by the defendant to the plaintiff as of that date.

(2) The defendant should account for the bottom corn, $20, that being the amount claimed in the complaint.

(3) The defendant should not be required to account for more than $2 for cane seed furnished by the plaintiff, as he testifies that he only bought one-half bushel at $4 per bushel.

The account between the parties would then stand thus:

Defendant's account.....	$2,034 74
Less items disallowed.....	159 32
		$1,875 42

The plaintiff's account:
Cotton seed.....	$ 41 38
Bottom corn.....	20 00
Cane seed.....	2 00
Good cotton.....	1,428 60
Bad cotton.....	504 75	1,994 73

Balance due plaintiff..... $ 119 31

—with interest from November 1, 1918, at 7 per cent. per annum.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court, as thus modified, be affirmed; all costs to be paid by the defendant.

WATTS, and FRASER, JJ., concur.

GARY, C. J. I dissent. The judgment of the circuit court should not be modified, but affirmed, for the reasons therein stated.

LIVINGSTON v. REID-HART-PARR CO.
(No. 10725.)

1. Fraud §12—Seller's representation held mere promise not actionable.

An allegation that defendant sellers "represented that they would furnish and sell to the plaintiff a machine" of certain described character, was merely an allegation of a representation that the seller "would do" a certain thing, nothing more than a promise, and not the representation of an existing fact, and was not a sufficient allegation of fraud.

2. Evidence §137—Evidence of trouble with machines sold to other persons held inadmissible.

In an action for damages for breach of warranty of machine, court properly excluded evidence on question of defendant's knowledge as to trouble other purchasers of similar machines had, since it would extend the inquiry indefinitely to branch out into all kinds of sales and surrounding conditions.

3. Sales §446(2)—Instruction held warranted by evidence.

In an action for breach of warranty of a machine, where there was some testimony to the effect that plaintiff made a careful examination of the machine before buying, and plaintiff testified that the defects of which he complains were plainly discernible, court did not err in charging that one who knowingly buys a defective or unsound commodity cannot complain.

4. Sales §446(4)—Instruction as to puffing statements by seller held not erroneous.

In an action by purchaser of machine for damages an instruction concerning puffing statements merely telling the jury that, when statements by the vendor only amount to expressions of opinion in the praise of his goods, such statements do not constitute fraud, was not erroneous, where followed by the further statement that "any distinct affirmation as to the quality or condition of a thing sold by the owner * * * is an express warranty."

5. Sales §267—Adoption of manufacturer's warranty exclusion of implied warranty.

Where purchaser of machine from a dealer signed an order or contract stating, "I agree to receive the above machinery * * * subject to warranty of the manufacturer as below," any implied warranty of soundness and adaptability was excluded.

6. Sales §246—Seller may limit warranty.

A seller of a machine is not obliged to give any warranty at all, and not being so obliged, has the right to contract for a limited warranty and in making warranty of the manufacturer his warranty.

7. Appeal and error §216(6)—Failure to charge not noticed where request was not called to court's attention.

Where at the conclusion of the charge the circuit judge stated "Now gentlemen, are there any matters that I have overlooked, any matters that you want to call specially to my attention?" to which counsel for plaintiff responded, "I think your honor has covered the ground," plaintiff cannot complain that the court failed to give a charge requested.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; Edward McIver, Judge.

Action by T. M. Livingston against the Reid-Hart-Parr Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The exceptions were as follows:

(1) That his honor erred in excluding the testimony of the witness G. W. Langford, offered for the purpose of showing that, as supervisor of Saluda county, he had purchased one or more of the New Hart-Parr tractors in 1917, and that they were unsuitable for and incapable of doing the work of pulling plows and road machinery, and that the county had made numerous complaints to the defendant prior to the sale of the tractor to the plaintiff, because the said testimony was relevant and competent for the purpose of showing knowledge on the part of the defendant, at the time of making the sale to plaintiff, that the tractors were not suitable for, or capable of doing, the work represented by defendant, and for which it was purchased by the plaintiff.

(2) That his honor erred in excluding the testimony of the witness Thomas Taylor, offered for the purpose of showing that he purchased a Hart-Parr tractor from the defendant in 1916, for use on his farm, to pull plows and farm machinery, and that it was not suitable for, or adapted to, such purposes, and was impracticable for such uses and purposes, and that he had made repeated complaints to the defendant prior to July, 1918, in regard thereto, because the said testimony was competent for the purpose of showing knowledge on the part of the defendant at the time it made the sale to plaintiff that the machine was not suitable for, capable of, or adapted to the purposes represented by the defendant, and for which plaintiff made the purchase.

(3) That his honor erred in excluding the testimony of the witness R. O. Dunning, a mechanical engineer, offered for the purpose of showing that the Hart-Parr tractor was so constructed as to be impracticable, incapable of, and not adapted to the purposes of a farm tractor, because the said evidence was competent and relevant to show that said machine was not suitable for, or adapted to, the purposes for which it was bought by the plaintiff, and for which defendant represented it to be suitable and adaptable, and that the defendant knew this at the time of the selling it to the plaintiff.

(4) That his honor erred in charging the jury: "I charge you, however, that although a sound price demands a sound commodity, still, if one knows that he is not getting a sound commodity at the time he makes his purchase, then that principle of law would not apply. In other words, gentlemen, you know a man can buy a blind or crippled horse, if he wants to, and pay what that horse is worth, and if he knows that the horse is blind or crippled, and still undertakes to buy him, then he would buy that horse, and he could not undertake to rescind the contract on account of the fact that the article purchased was not a sound commodity, if he bought it with his eyes open, knowing that it was in that condition at the time he bought it"—because:

(a) There was no evidence that plaintiff knew that the machinery was unsound or unfit for the purposes for which it was sold to him, and for which he bought it.

(b) Defendant in its testimony claimed the tractor was new, sound, and first-class.

(c) The plaintiff, having paid full price for a new and sound machine, was entitled to such a machine.

(5) That his honor erred in charging the jury: "I charge you that the plaintiff agreed to receive that machinery, and to pay the freight on it from Charles City, Iowa, subject only to the warranty of the manufacturer, and which was adopted by the seller as his warranty in this particular case, because he says he accepts this contract and signs his name to it. I charge you that under this warranty, if this is the entire contract, the only warranty is that the New Hart-Parr tractor was well made and of good material and workmanship; that, if any of the machinery breaks within one year from the delivery of it, that they would replace that part of the machinery, if it broke on account of faulty material or workmanship, and they do not warrant the batteries, spark plugs, or other electrical equipment connected with the machine"—because the said warranty only purported to be a warranty by and in behalf of the manufacturer. It did not affect or relate to the dealer, which is the defendant in this case, and it in no wise excluded or prevented a warranty from the defendant, as is alleged and claimed by the plaintiff in this case.

(6) That his honor erred in charging the jury, at the request of the defendant:

"(1) 'Statements by the vendor' (that is, the seller) 'of property as to its condition, quality, character, capacity, or adaptability to certain uses, are generally regarded as mere expressions of opinion, and, when such is the case, do not constitute fraud.' Yes, gentlemen, there is a narrow margin or line there that I will try to explain to you. That is the law. That is the law laid down by Blackstone, one of the earliest law-writers we have, and he illustrates it this way: That a merchant in selling his goods to a customer in his store praises up his goods and speaks of how suitable they are for the purpose the party wants them for, and unless there is an actual misrepresentation of fact, then that is merely regarded as the effort of the seller to dispose of his goods, showing them off to advantage; and where no fraud is intended, and where it is mere expression of opinion in the praise of his goods, it does not constitute fraud."

And in further charging the jury, at the request of the plaintiff:

"(4) 'In reference to the cause of action for breach of warranty, the jury are charged that any distinct affirmation as to the quality or condition of a thing sold by the owner, during the negotiations for the sale, which it may be supposed was intended to cause the sale, and was operative in producing it, and relied on by the purchaser, is an express warranty; and, if it turns out to be untrue, the owner and seller would be liable to the purchaser, therefor.' I have already charged you that"—because:

(a) The charge is calculated to confuse the issues before the jury and the correct ruling of law.

(b) Statements by a seller of machinery and dealer in machinery, as to its condition, quality, capacity, or adaptability, are in their nature warranties.

(7) That his honor erred in charging the jury: "(8) 'I charge you that, with respect to the second cause of action, set forth in the amended complaint in this action, the rights of the parties must be determined according to their contract, and that the express written order which has been introduced in evidence is alone the evidence of what was intended by the contracting parties.' I charge you that, provided the written contract includes and covers the complete and entire agreement between the parties. I have already practically charged you that"—because: It is a charge on the facts.

(8) That his honor erred in charging the jury: "(9) 'If you find from the evidence that the plaintiff retained possession of the tractor involved in this suit for more than six days after the first day's use of the tractor by the plaintiff, then I charge you that then and in that event such retention of possession by the plaintiff would be conclusive evidence that the warranty given by the seller had been fulfilled, except as to the defective parts, and the plaintiff could not recover on the second cause of action set forth in the complaint.' I charge you that, unless, I add, the defendant by its acts waived that provision of the contract requiring notice to be given in six days, or the return of the property to be given in six days. I charge you that, unless the defendant waived it, as I have previously in this charge explained to you. I have charged you that one could waive and relinquish and forego the enforcement of a right, and if he did that, then he could not afterwards hold the other party to that right, as I illustrated to you about the insurance policy"—because:

(a) The provision as to retaining possession for more than six days only applies to the warranty by the manufacturer, and has no application to the warranty or agreement between the dealer or seller and the plaintiff.

(9) That his honor erred in refusing to give the plaintiff's fifth request, to wit: "False warranty does not depend upon or require knowledge of its falsity at the time it is made. The seller is held bound by his statement"—because the same contains a correct proposition of law applicable to this case.

(10) That his honor erred in refusing the plaintiff's motion for a new trial, because:

(a) His honor had erred in excluding the testimony of the witnesses Langford, Dunning, and Thomas Taylor, tending to prove fraud and guilty knowledge on the part of the defendant at the time of making the contract of sale and representations to the plaintiff.

(b) The evidence showed conclusively that, while plaintiff paid full price for a new machine, he did not receive a new machine, and there was no evidence upon which to base a verdict to the contrary.

(c) The evidence showed that the machine sold to the plaintiff had worn and defective parts, and that defendant's contract of guaranty was breached.

(d) There was not sufficient evidence to support the verdict for the defendant.

The reason of the court for excluding testimony of the witness Langford, complained of in exception No. 1, was that it would open a limitless inquiry as to a number of sales made to other people, and that inquiry must be confined to the particular machine in question to show knowledge on the part of the defendant that the machine was not giving satisfaction.

D. W. Robinson, of Columbia, for appellant.

Barron McKay, Frierson & McCants, all of Columbia, for respondent.

COTHRAN, J. Action for $3,000 damages for alleged breach of a contract for, and for fraud and misrepresentation in, the sale of a tractor for the defendant to the plaintiff on July 25, 1918. The case was tried at February term, 1920, before Judge McIver and a jury, at Columbia. Verdict for defendant. Plaintiff appeals.

[1] The complaint states two causes of action, and the "case" contains the foregoing statement that the action was for (1) fraud and misrepresentation, and (2) breach of contract of sale, though in neither alleged cause of action do we find the necessary allegations of either fraud or misrepresentations. In the first cause of action it is alleged that the defendants "represented that they would furnish and sell to the plaintiff a machine" of certain described character, and that after the machine had been furnished it was ascertained that those representations were untrue for certain specified reasons. A representation that the seller would do a certain thing is nothing more than a promise, not the representation of a fact as existing; and the failure to make good that representation is nothing more than the breach of a promise. There is therefore practically no difference between the two alleged causes of action; the sole grievance of the plaintiff being a breach of the contract of sale in the warranty of the machine. There is no hint in the complaint of fraud upon the part of the defendant, unless it be in reliance upon the allegation that the defendant promised to furnish a machine of certain character and did not do so, which is entirely insufficient to raise the issue of fraud. The charge of fraud was therefore entirely too favorable to the plaintiff in submitting this issue to the jury.

The main issue is whether the contract of sale contains an express warranty which excludes all other warranties, express or implied, and by the terms of which the plaintiff is bound.

The contract of sale is evidenced by the following described instrument of writing. On July 25, 1918, the plaintiff signed a written order, directed to Reid Hardware Company, a corporation at Lincolnton, N. C., of which the defendant is the successor, for a certain tractor and plow, the price of which was $1,653.30, payable cash on delivery, together with freight from the factory at Charles City, Iowa, "subject to the warranty of the manufacturer as below." This warranty was that the machine was "well made, of good material and workmanship," guaranteed to operate with kerosene oil, and was accompanied by the following conditions:

The batteries, spark plugs and other electrical equipment were excepted from all warranty; new parts would be furnished free of charge by the manufacturer, if the breaks in the machinery should be caused by faulty material or workmanship and the broken parts be sent to the factory for inspection and proof of defect within one year from date of delivery, the purchaser paying freight both ways. "The purchaser agrees that retention or possession for more than six days after first day's use of said machinery purchased herein shall be construed as conclusive evidence that the warranty has been fulfilled, and that the manufacturer is hereby released from all further warranty, except as to defective parts."

The machine was duly delivered to the plaintiff, who paid the purchase price. It was set up for work on October 16th, a representative of the defendant assisting the plaintiff, and for a day himself operating the machine. At first, as long as the defendant's representative was in charge, as the plaintiff testified, "it operated very well"; "it operated all right as long as Mullarky was on it." Later on trouble developed and plaintiff wired defendant to send a man to straighten it out. Defendant wrote that unless plaintiff wired to the contrary they would have a man there on November 9th, but that, if the trouble did not appear, to be mechanical, the plaintiff would have to bear the expense of the man. He wired not to send the expert that the machine was then operating all right.

The troubles of the plaintiff with the machine increased until finally he abandoned it as utterly worthless, testifying to and offering other testimony to prove various defects in material and workmanship, which are enumerated and described in detail.

The testimony for the defendant tended to show that the machine was a new one, in perfect condition, and that the troubles of the plaintiff with it were due to faulty operation.

The circuit judge submitted all of the issues raised in the pleadings in a fair, clear, and able charge, which was indeed more favorable to the plaintiff than he was entitled to, and the jury found a verdict in favor of the defendant.

The following is an epitome of the assignment of error:

(1) Exclusion of the testimony of the witnesses Langford, Taylor, and Dunning to prove that machines of the same make operated by them respectively were impracticable, incapable of, and not adapted to, the purposes of a farm tractor. Exceptions 1, 2, and 3.

(2) Error in charging that one who knowingly buys a defective or unsound commodity cannot complain. Exception 4.

(3) Error in charging the law as to puffing statements by a seller. Exception 6.

(4) Error in charging on the facts. Exception 7.

(5) Error in charging that the plaintiff was bound by the provision in the warranty relating to the retaining of possession for six days constituting a release of the warranty. Exceptions 5 and 8.

(6) Error in refusing to give the plaintiff's fifth request. Exception 9.

(7) Error in refusing motion for a new trial. Exception 10.

The exceptions will be reported in full.

[2] If the testimony had shown that the machine operated by these witnesses had been practically the same as the machine sold to the plaintiff, and the transaction had been attacked for fraud, it would possibly have been admissible, as evidence of guilty knowledge and fraudulent intent; but, neither of these elements appearing, the testimony was properly excluded for the reason assigned by the circuit judge, which will be reported. Kauffman Milling Co. v. Stuckey, 37 S. C. 7, 16 S. E. 192; Sharples Separator Co. v. Skinner, 251 Fed. 25, 163 C. C. A. 275; Lynn v. Thomson, 17 S. C. 129; Hand v. Power Co., 90 S. Bigelow Co.*, 77 Conn. 124, 58 Atl. 741; Brunnett v. Nemo Heater Co., 177 Mass. 480, 59 N. E. 58.

[3] 2. There was some testimony to the effect that the plaintiff made a careful examination of the machine before buying, and he testified that the defects of which he now complains were plainly discernible. The charge was relevant to the case.

[4] 3. The court merely told the jury that, when statements by the vendor only amount to expressions of opinion in the praise of his goods, such statements do not constitute fraud; and then he followed this proposition with the further statement that "any distinct affirmation as to the quality or condition of a thing sold by the owner * * * is an express warranty." We fail to see how the jury could possibly have been confused by the portion of the charge referred to.

4. The charge was clear and fair to the plaintiff, and correctly states the law. It was in no sense a charge upon the facts.

[5, 6] 5. This raises the main issue in the case. The contract shows that the machine was sold "subject to the warranty of the manufacturer as below." That warranty has been fully explained above. The plaintiff contends that it was supplementary to, and not exclusive of, the implied warranty of the dealer, who bought from the manufacturer outright.

It will be observed that the instrument in question is entitled "Customer's Order," and is addressed to the defendant "Reid Hdwe Co., Lincolnton, N. C.," and begins, "Please enter my order for one new Hart-Parr tractor." It is signed by the plaintiff, and below the plaintiff's signature is written, "Accepted July 25, 1918. Reid Hdwe Co., Dealer." The plaintiff himself testified that on July 25, 1918, "I entered into a contract with Reid Hardware Company on that date for what is called a New Hart-Parr tractor through Mr. H. E. Reid," etc., and he himself introduced the contract in evidence. The testimony is uncontradicted, therefore, that the contract was between the plaintiff and the Reid Hardware Company. In the contract the purchaser (plaintiff) says: "I agree to receive the above machinery, * * * subject to the warranty of the manufacturer, as below." Since his contract, by his own testimony, was with the Reid Hardware Company, the dealer, and not with the manufacturer, his agreement to receive the machinery "subject to the warranty of the manufacturer" was meaningless, unless, as the court held, the dealer had adopted the warranty as its own and made it a part of the contract between the parties. The defendant was not obliged to give any warranty at all, if it chose to so contract and the plaintiff agreed. Not being so obliged, it had the right to contract for a limited warranty and, in making the warranty of the manufacturer the warranty of its contract with the plaintiff, it did no more than it had the right to do. An express warranty excludes the implied warranty of soundness or adaptability.

Under the cases of Threshing Co. v. Dyches, 108 S. C. 411, 94 S. E. 1051, and Westinghouse v. Glencoe, 106 S. C. 183, 90 S. E. 526, the circuit judge was entirely correct in charging as complained of in Exception 8.

[7] 6. This request was not read to the jury, and not charged. At the conclusion of the charge the circuit judge stated, "Now, gentlemen, are there any matters that I have overlooked, and any matters that you want to call specially to my attention?" to which counsel for the plaintiff responded, "I think your honor has covered the ground." If he deemed the request of sufficient importance, he should then have called the attention of the court to the omission.

7. The exception to refusal of motion for new trial is disposed of by the foregoing conclusions.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

ALFORD v. YONCE. (No. 10731.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 20, 1921.)

Ballment ¶33—Submission of issue as to whether defendant agreed to sell plaintiff's automobile held not warranted by pleadings or testimony.

In action against garage keeper for failure to repair and redeliver car in good condition, and for failure to try to sell it as agreed, allegations that it was agreed between plaintiff and defendant that defendant would try to sell plaintiff's automobile provided plaintiff would purchase another automobile from defendant, plaintiff's car to be sold for the value of the new car and repairs on the old, and testimony that defendant agreed to help plaintiff sell his automobile, held not to warrant submission of issue as to whether defendant contracted to sell plaintiff's automobile for enough to pay for the other automobile to be purchased.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Edgefield County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

Action by J. G. Alford against W. P. Yonce. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. New trial.

J. William Thurmond, of Edgefield, for appellant.

S. M. Smith and S. McG. Simkins, both of Edgefield, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. On the trial of this case in the circuit court, there was much confusion as to the issues raised by the pleadings.

The complaint alleged that in July, 1919, the plaintiff placed his Overland automobile car in the defendant's garage to be repaired; that it was then agreed and understood between the plaintiff and the defendant that, after the car was repaired, the defendant would try to sell the same for the plaintiff, provided the plaintiff would purchase from the defendant a Ford car; the purchase price at which the plaintiff's car was to be sold was the value of the said Ford car, $590, and the charges for the repairs $100, aggregating $690; that the plaintiff purchased said Ford car, but that the defendant not only failed to sell, but likewise to repair plaintiff's automobile; that the defendant's servants thereafter used plaintiff's car on a trip to Augusta, and operated it in such a manner as to wreck it.

The plaintiff thus testified on cross-examination:

"It was agreed that he would help sell the car and get a Ford. Did not tell Mr. Yonce I wanted to swap my car for a Ford, and then did not tell him I wanted him to sell it for me. It was not binding on him that he sell it for me. It was not binding on him that he sell it, only agreed he would try to help me sell it."

The record shows the following statement of Mr. Thurmond, defendant's attorney, after the charge and before the case was given to the jury:

"Your honor's charge submitted to the jury the question of fact, whether Yonce contracted to sell the Overland car for Alford, for enough to pay for a Ford; if so, Alford was entitled to recover that amount. This was error, as neither the pleadings nor testimony raised such issue."

In replying to Mr. Thurmond's statement, the presiding judge said:

"Mr. Thurmond, you have made your speech, and declined to correct his charge, as requested by Mr. Thurmond."

After the jury was out several hours, they returned and inquired of the presiding judge who then had title to the automobile, and his honor instructed the jury that Alford had the title; and after further consideration the jury returned the following verdict:

"We find for the plaintiff the sum of $272.76, less note, interest, and attorney's fees of $65.01 and account of $7.75 for tube and gas."

The main question raised by the exceptions is whether there was error on the part of his honor the presiding judge in submitting to the jury the question of fact, whether Yonce contracted to sell the Overland car for Alford, for enough to pay for a Ford, on the ground that neither the pleadings nor testimony raised such issue. The allegations of the complaint and the plaintiff's testimony show that there was error on the part of the circuit judge in submitting such issue to the jury.

LEE v. McCrory Stores Corporation.
(No. 10714.)

1. Libel and slander §7(13)—Accusation of theft held actionable.

Store manager's statement to employee in presence of another person, "You have stolen $3.70," held actionable.

2. Corporations §423—Corporation held liable for slanderous statement of general manager of its store to employee.

Corporation held liable for slanderous statement by the general manager of its store to employee, accusing her of theft; the accusation having been made in the discharge of his duty as such manager.

3. New trial §70—Denial of motion of defendant in slander case held not error.

In action for slander by young girl employee of defendant, accused by manager of its store of stealing, court's refusal to grant defendant a new trial held not error, in view of evidence from which it could be inferred that the girl had not in fact stolen the money, notwithstanding shortage shown by cash register.

Appeal from Richland County Court; M. S. Whaley, Judge.

Action by Mildred Lee, by Matthew E. Lee, her guardian ad litem, against the McCrory Stores Corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The complaint alleged defendant's agent to have used the following language, "You have stolen $3.70," or words of like import and meaning.

E. L. Craig, of Columbia, for appellant.

De Pass & De Pass and Alfred Wallace, Jr., all of Columbia, for respondent.

FRASER, J. This is an action for slander. The plaintiff is a girl about 14 years of age. She claims that she applied to the defendant for Saturday work; that she was engaged to work and worked on Saturday; that she did not draw her pay on Saturday evening, but went back for it on the following Monday; that she applied to Mr. Butcher, the general manager of the store, for her money, but he refused to pay her, stating that she owed money to the store, as the cash register she had operated on Saturday was short $3.70. "I said I didn't see how it was, as particular as I was, and he said he had just seen that I had just stolen it." The plaintiff's sister was present and corroborated the plaintiff. Mr. Butcher, the defendant's witness, said that the defendant was a corporation with many such stores over the country; that he was manager and while his authority was restricted in some respects, he was in control of the local management of the store; that the plaintiff was employed by his assistant manager; that he saw the plaintiff on Saturday morning, and went to her and told her that she had worked for the defendant before, and during her former employment her cash register was short; that he overlooked the previous shortage, but that he would hold her responsible for any future shortage; that he refused to pay her because the cash register was short, and denied that he had charged her with stealing the money. It was admitted that another clerk had used the same cash register. It was admitted that the shortage may have been due to mistakes of either clerk, or to the reading of the register. The question of fact was, Did Mr. Butcher charge the plaintiff with stealing the money? The jury found that he did, and gave a verdict for the plaintiff of $1,875. From the judgment entered on this verdict the defendant appealed.

The appellant argues the questions:

[1] I. "The presiding judge invaded the province of the jury in instructing them that they must find general damages substantial in amount, if they found that defendant's employee had used the language set forth in the complaint."

The case of Wilson v. Palmetto National Bank, 113 S. O. 508, 101 S. E. 841, is full authority for the charge as made. The charges made the same distinction as to substantial and nominal damages in both cases. This is stronger case than the Wilson Case, in that an overdraft may be the result of carelessness. Stealing cannot be the result of a mistake. This exception is overruled.

II. The second question as made is:

"The undisputed evidence shows that the language alleged to have been uttered by an employee, if spoken, was the independent act of the employee, and defendant cannot be required to respond in damages therefor, and the jury should have been instructed to find for defendant."

[2] This exception cannot be sustained. Mr. Butcher was in sole charge of the local business, and the words spoken were spoken in the discharge of his duty as general manager. He reported every day the doings of the business. He kept her wages, and the company still has it. He was acting in this matter within the scope of his authority. Mr. Butcher was the vice principal.

III. The third assignment of error is:

"That in refusing to grant a new trial the presiding judge failed to exercise the discretion required of him by the law."

[3] There was no error here. It must be kept in mind that it is now a fact that the young girl was accused of stealing. The only evidence was the shortage supposed to have been shown by the cash register. There may have been a mistake by the clerk who read the cash register. The plaintiff may have made a mistake in making change. Not being very familiar with the workings of the cash register, the plaintiff may have struck the wrong numbers. The other clerk who used this same cash register may have made the mistake charged to the plaintiff. Notwithstanding all these chances for making honest mistakes, the jury have found that the defendant, through its general manager, charged the plaintiff with stealing. There was evidence from which the jury might have inferred that this young lady received a terrible shock from a charge so cruel and so baseless.

The judgment is affirmed.

BART et al. v. SRIBNIK. (No. 10715.)

1. Trusts §35(1)—Separation agreement held in effect not a trust deed.

Separation agreement, in which husband gave wife the right to occupy certain property in consideration of the relinquishment by her of all claims for alimony, maintenance, and support, which specified that it was the husband's intention that after the wife's death such property should belong to their son, held not a trust deed.

2. Judgment §707—Doctrine of res judicata applies only to parties and their privies.

The doctrine of res judicata applies only to parties and their privies.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Charleston County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

Action by Margaret Ellen Bart and Stephen E. Welch, as trustees under the post-nuptial settlement of Charles E. Bart, against H. Sribnik. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Louis M. Shimel, of Charleston, for appellant.

Buist & Buist, of Charleston, for respondents.

FRASER, J. Casper Bart and Louisa, his wife, found that they could not live together. There was some litigation between them, and an agreement was reached, and was as follows:

"(1) The said Louisa Bart and C. Bart for the cause of incompatibility of temper and other sufficient causes, agree henceforth to cease to live with each other as man and wife.

"(2) In the separate condition of Louisa Bart, C. Bart agrees that during his life and during her life, Louisa Bart may occupy the property in King street in which she now resides and carries on the business of selling fruits and vegetables, rent free; but upon the condition that the said Louisa Bart will pay the taxes levied upon the said property.

"(3) The said Louisa Bart agrees that henceforth she renounces all claims upon the said C. Bart, for alimony, maintenance and support; and that she will in proper manner give notice to all persons that henceforth she will contract and be contracted with as if she were unmarried; and that the said C. Bart is not liable in any manner for such contract or contracts made by her.

"(4) That the said C. Bart agrees that so long as the said Louisa Bart shall keep to and perform the matters and things in the third paragraph of this memorandum mentioned to be done by her and shall pay the taxes levied upon the property in King street in the city of Charleston occupied by her, she shall have the privilege during his life and her life to occupy and enjoy the same rent free.

"(5) All suits and proceedings in the courts of this state between the said Louisa Bart and the said C. Bart shall be discontinued and dismissed.

"(6) If the said Louisa Bart during her lifetime shall for sickness or other cause not wish to continue the business in which she is now engaged, she shall have the privilege of renting out the said house in King street or such portions thereof as she shall not occupy; receiving the rent therefor without molestation of the said C. Bart; she, the said Louisa Bart, paying as hereinbefore stated, the taxes levied on the same, it being the intention of C. Bart, that after the death of the said Louisa Bart the said house shall belong to the son of the said C. Bart and Louisa Bart, and who is named Charles Bart, baptized Charles Edward Bart.

"Witness the hands and seals of the said C. Bart and Louisa Bart, this 18 March, 1876.

"Louisa Bart. [L. S.]

"C. Bart. [L. S.]"

The case contains this statement:

"This instrument was signed by both parties in the presence of one witness, and the same was duly probated and was recorded in the R. M. C. office for Charleston county, on the 29th day of March, 1878.

"On the 19th day of November, 1885, the said Casper Bart died in the county of Charleston, state aforesaid, leaving his last will and testament bearing date of 4th day of July, 1885, which was duly admitted to probate by the probate judge of the county of Charleston, state aforesaid, on the 25th day of November, 1885, by which will the testator devised his residuary estate unto his executors in trust to collect the rents and to pay over the same unto the testator's son, Charles E. Bart, during his life, and upon his death to the testator's daughter-in-law, Margaret Ellen Bart, during her life, and upon her death to apply the income towards the support of the child or children begotten by the said Charles E. Bart and Margaret Ellen Bart, and to divide the estate upon the said children's reaching the age of 21, and should both the said Charles E. Bart and his wife, Margaret Ellen Bart, die without leaving surviving them any child or children of their marriage, then and in that event the said executors were directed to divide the estate equally between such of the children of the testator's brothers, Matz Bart and John Bart, as should be living at the time of the death of the said Margaret Ellen Bart, share and share alike. Testator appointed Charles E. Bart and Stephen Elliott Welch executors of his will, and authorized and empowered his executors or such of them as might qualify, and the survivor of them, to sell, alien, or otherwise dispose of any portion of his estate upon such terms as the executors or executor should deem proper.

"Charles E. Bart died on September 20, 1892, without leaving any children, and Margaret Ellen Bart is still alive, but has no children."

Upon the death of Casper Bart his executors brought a proceeding in which Valentine Bart, Peter Bart, Vincent Bart, John Bart, Helena Bart Melchers, and Carolina Bart Pfleger, the only living children of Matz Bart, and Eugene Bart, Charles Bart, John Bart, the younger, Erbest Bart, Leonora Bart, and Marie Bart, the only living children of John Bart, were made parties defendant, in which proceeding the executors asked for instructions from the court as to whether or not the property involved in this case was the property of Casper Bart at the time of his death, or whether it was vested in his son, Charles M. Bart, by virtue of the agreement entered into between the said Casper Bart and his wife, Louisa Bart. In that proceeding the master found the facts to be as hereinbefore recited, and further found that Louisa Bart had entered into possession of the premises, pursuant to the agreement with her husband as hereinabove set forth, and that during her lifetime she had paid the taxes thereon, and had complied with the provisions of the third article of the said agreement, as well as with those contained in the fifth article thereof; that during her lifetime she had continued to enjoy the rents, issues, and profits of said premises without any molestation of her husband, and that upon her death in July, 1879, Charles E. Bart, their son, had entered into possession of the premises, claiming the same in fee simple under and by virtue of the provisions of the agreement hereinbefore set forth, and that he, the said Charles E. Bart, continued so to do up to the execution of the postnuptial settlement made by him in December, 1885, and hereinafter referred to, and that by the said marriage settlement the said Charles E. Bart particularly and emphatically claimed such fee simple, and that during the lifetime of Casper Bart he suffered and permitted his said son, Charles E. Bart, to collect the rents of the premises and to claim absolute ownership thereof. The master further found that the children of John Bart and Matz Bart, mentioned above as defendants in the suit, were the only remaindermen in esse and within the jurisdiction of the court. There were no other remaindermen in esse.

Margaret Ellen Bart, through her agents, agreed to sell, and the defendant, Sribnik, agreed to purchase, the lot of land in question, but Sribnik refused to comply, on the ground that the plaintiff could not give good title. The plaintiff brought this action for specific performance, and secured a decree holding that the title is good, and the defendant ordered to comply. From this decree this appeal is taken.

[1, 2] The plaintiff claims that the agreement between Casper Bart and his wife, though informal, is in effect a trust deed, and words of inheritance are unnecessary. The agreement has no element of a trust deed. Casper Bart had a legal obligation to support his wife, and she had a legal right to inchoate dower. It was agreed that all of the wife's claim against her husband should be met by the use of the property turned over to her for her use during her life. No title passed, nor is there anything in the agreement to indicate such purpose. Charles Edward Bart was not a party to the agreement, and the absence of any statement as to the interest he should take would render the grant, even if it were a grant, void for uncertainty. The subsequent will indicated that Casper did not think he had parted with title. After Casper's death, Charles Edward, acting as executor, brought a suit, the object of which was to eliminate the contingent remaindermen, under the will of which he was acting executor. It is said that it is too late now to raise this question, as the judgment was taken in that case, and it is now res adjudicata. It is elemental law that the doctrine of res adjudicata applies only to parties and their privies. There are exceptions to this rule, but they are founded on necessity, and there is no necessity here. The contingent remaindermen are not parties to this suit, and they cannot be assumed to be conclusively bound by the former action, unless they are parties. It may be that while they may appear to have been parties, they were not so in fact. If they shall still raise that question, this proceeding does not bind them, because they are not parties to this proceeding.

We have been asked to decide all the questions raised. We can render no effective judgment against those not parties to this proceeding, and it would be misleading to attempt to do so.

The judgment is reversed.

GILBERT v. SMITH. (No. 10722.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 10, 1921.)

Habeas corpus §99(4)—Custody of orphan awarded to maternal grandmother, with whom she had always lived, notwithstanding paternal grandmother's greater financial ability.

Custody of a girl of seven, whose father died when she was a baby, and who has always lived with her maternal grandmother, to whom her mother, who has since died, gave her at her second marriage, will be given to such grandmother, other things being equal, notwithstanding the greater financial ability of her paternal grandmother, though this may entail the loss of a college education, and though the trial court, on affidavits and certain oral testimony, made award to the paternal grandmother, on the general ground of best interests of the child; conditioned, however, that the maternal grandmother give bond for faithful care, maintenance, and education of the child, at least to the extent of a high school course.

Watts, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Darlington County; Edward McIver, Judge.

Habeas corpus proceeding by Adella Gilbert against Catherine M. Smith for custody of Jennie Belah Gilbert, an infant. Judgment for petitioner, and defendant appeals. Reversed conditionally.

E. C. Dennis and James R. Coggeshall, both of Darlington, for appellant.

L. M. Lawson, of Darlington, and Mendel L. Smith, of Camden, for respondent.

COTHRAN, J. This is a habeas corpus proceeding instituted by Mrs. Adella Gilbert, the paternal grandmother of an infant girl, Jennie Belah Gilbert, aged seven years, against Mrs. Catherine M. Smith, the maternal grandmother of the child, for the purpose of having the court award the custody of the child to her.

The matter was heard by Judge McIver upon affidavits and certain oral testimony. He awarded the custody of the child to the petitioner, the paternal grandmother, upon the general ground that it was for the best interests of the child, with no detailed statement of the considerations which moved him to that conclusion. The maternal grandmother has appealed to this court.

It appears that B. H. Gilbert, a son of Mrs. Adella Gilbert, the petitioner, about 10 years ago married Lila Smith, a daughter of Mrs. Catherine M. Smith, the respondent below, appellant here; the young couple took up their abode with Mrs. Smith, and the little girl was born in Mrs. Smith's home November 9, 1913; when the little thing was only a few months old the father died, the mother continuing to live with her mother; in November, 1919, Mrs. Gilbert, the mother of the girl, married James Galloway and moved from the old home to the home of her second husband, leaving the child with Mrs. Smith; Mrs. Galloway lived less than a year after her second marriage; she died July 16, 1920; with the exception of a week's visit to the home of the elder Mrs. Gilbert after the death of her mother, Mrs. Galloway, the child has lived continuously in the home of Mrs. Smith, who naturally has become greatly attached to her; from the time of her birth until the present she has known no other home; her clothes and trunk have been always in the home of Mrs. Smith and are there now; soon after the death of Mrs. Galloway, July 16, 1920, this proceeding was instituted, on August 25th, by Mrs. Gilbert, to have the court direct Mrs. Smith to surrender the custody of the child to her and decree in her the legal right to her custody, care, and maintenance.

It was in evidence that Mrs. Galloway gave the child to her mother when she left the old home with her husband, stating that she wanted the child to remain with the respondent; that she declared to at least three witnesses that she had given the child to her and desired her to have the care, custody, and rearing of the child.

Even in a contest between the father or mother and one to whom they had by a parol gift surrendered the custody of the child, the court will greatly respect the gift. As this court says in Ex parte Reynolds, 73 S.

C. 302, 53 S. E. 492, 114 Am. St. Rep. 86, 6 Ann. Cas. 936:

"Nevertheless, if a parent undertakes to make a parol contract absolutely bestowing the custody of the child upon another, and allows the child to acquire a new home, and strong attachments and tender associations to spring up, the court will not, at his instance, ruthlessly break these ties which have come into existence through his acquiescence and neglect to assert his right. In such case the parent is estopped, and the affection of those who have cared for the child and learned to love it will not be sacrificed unless the interests of the child require that it should be restored to the parent."

See, also, Enders v. Enders, 164 Pa. 266, 30 Atl. 129, 27 L. R. A. 60, 44 Am. St. Rep. 586; State v. Libbey, 44 N. H. 321, 82 Am. Dec. 223; Stringfellow v. Somerville, 95 Va. 701, 29 S. E. 685, 40 L. R. A. 623; Bonnett v. Bonnett, 61 Iowa, 199, 16 N. W. 91, 47 Am. Rep. 810.

The social standing of the two grandmothers appeared to be the same; their characters are above reproach; the moral atmosphere of one home is as good as the other; there is no claim that Mrs. Smith is not financially able to rear and educate the child; it is conceded that the petitioner, Mrs. Gilbert, is in a more favored financial condition than Mrs. Smith; eight witnesses testify to the excellent character of Mrs. Smith, her financial ability to rear and educate the child, and to her tender affection for the child; six witnesses testify to the excellent character of Mrs. Gilbert and her greater financial ability to care for and educate the child.

The supreme test is the interest of the child, its future welfare and happiness. Ex parte Schumpert, 6 Rich. 344; Ex parte Reed, 19 S. C. 605.

We cannot say that in a home of comfort and affection, even though lacking luxury and trained in frugality, she will not make a better woman than in one of greater comfort, greater luxury, greater educational advantages; we cannot say that the greater financial ability of the one shall be the determining factor.

We can say and believe that, if the child were of sufficient age to make the choice for herself, her decision that a life based on love and gratitude and fidelity cannot be given in exchange for one of greater ease and personal advantage would not only commend itself to every loyal soul, but would make for a more splendid character. As we conceive our duty, we make that choice for her, in her best interest.

At the same time the material interests of the child must be safeguarded. This decision will probably, though it should not, result in financial loss to her, and the loss, perhaps, of a college education. The appellant, whose tender feelings for the child have weighed heavily in the scales, should in a measure insure a compensation for these losses. She should give a bond to the general guardian of the child in the sum of $5,000, with sufficient surety approved by the clerk of court, conditioned upon the faithful discharge of the trust reposed in her, the care, maintenance, and education of the child, at least to the extent of a through high school course; this bond to be executed and delivered within 30 days after the filing of the remittitur.

The judgment of this court is that the order appealed from be reversed, and that, upon the conditions stated above, the right to the custody, care, maintenance, and education of the child be adjudged in the appellant; upon default in the performance of said conditions the judgment below will stand affirmed.

GARY, C. J., and FRASER, J., concur.

WATTS, J. (dissenting). I cannot concur in the opinion of Mr. Justice COTHRAN. Judge McIver, who heard the case on the circuit, was the resident judge, and heard the cause in part on affidavits and had some of the witnesses before him.

We have repeatedly held that the finding of fact of the circuit court will not be disturbed unless it is against the weight of the evidence, and in the recent case of Manigo v. Tyler, 107 S. E. 914, filed June 30, 1921, as to the custody of infants, we refused to substitute our judgment for that of the circuit court, so we are in the position of holding that in an ordinary equity case we will sustain the finding of the circuit court unless it is against the preponderance of the evidence, but in a case involving the custody of children we have no fixed rule to go by, but will decide it according to any caprice.

The finding of the circuit judge, in my opinion, protects the infant, and is far better for her interest than that of this court. The decree insures her education, even a college education, and while I do not approve of an avaricious person, or one who worships money, yet I have great respect for money honestly acquired, and I think one who by frugality, honesty, thrift, and industry accumulates it is to be commended, and his virtues, and are as apt to be good as that of one who is in poverty. I have great respect for an honest poor person, but I do not concede that he has any more virtue than one who has acquired an honest independent competency. It is all very well to talk about "plain living and high thinking," but the person who has to do it from necessity, in a majority of cases, would rather have more high living and do less thinking.

I do not subscribe to the doctrine that it is better for an infant to be in the custody of her maternal people than her paternal. This reason is founded on pure sentiment and without reason. In England the husband and father has some rights that the courts respect. Here he has none, nor has his people any when he claims them in conflict with that of the wife and her people.

The court has the right to award the custody of the infant, looking to her best interest. Judge McIver's decree looked to that, and, unquestionably, from my viewpoint, was correct.

BABCOCK v. POSTAL TELEGRAPH-CABLE CO. (No. 10718.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 10, 1921.)

1. Action ⇨2—Wrongful invasion of rights without justification or excuse gives right of action.

The wrongful invasion of an admitted right in plaintiff without justification or excuse by defendant gives plaintiff a right to some damages.

2. Telegraphs and telephones ⇨20(7)—Necessity of cutting trees held question of law.

In an action for cutting trees near defendant's telephone line, where there was no evidence that the cutting was necessary, the court could properly decide as a matter of law that the trees were unnecessarily cut.

3. Damages ⇨112—Prospective use of timber grove element of damages for destruction.

In assessing damages for cutting trees in a timber grove, the jury might take into consideration the use to which the grove should be put; the measure of damages not being the value of the timber.

4. Appeal and error ⇨882(20)—Invited error no ground for reversal.

A remark by the trial judge, on ruling on a motion for a directed verdict, that the testimony was stronger than on a former hearing, held no ground for complaint on appeal; appellant having invited the remark by his motion, and not having asked for an exclusion of the jury.

Lyles & Lyles, of Columbia, for appellant.
D. W. Robinson, of Columbia, for respondent.

FRASER, J. This case has been before this court before, 114 S. C. 319, 103 S. E. 522. Because of the peculiar circumstances surrounding this case, it is not necessary to consider the exceptions in detail. This court held before "there should be a new trial, because the defense is without any evidence to sustain it." These facts stand out in the case and are undisputed:

[1] I. The plaintiff owned a small tract of land used as a hospital and grounds. A part of the grounds were taken up with a pine grove. Through this pine grove the defendant had a line of telephone poles. The defendant's servants went along the line of poles and cut as many trees as they saw fit. The defendant did not attempt to show any right on or in the premises except such as might follow necessarily from the presence of its poles and wires. The defendant did not attempt to show the extent of its rights. The easement may have been wide enough to enable it to use the ground actually occupied for the purposes for which it was used. The facts did not make out such an easement, because the defendant's servants cut down trees that did not interfere with the exercise of the defendant's use of the land. So we had an undisputed ownership in the plaintiff, an invasion of that right by the defendant beyond any limits suggested by the record. The wrongful invasion of an admitted right in the plaintiff without justification or excuse by the defendant gives the plaintiff a right to some damages, and no judgment that denied it could be allowed to stand. This court said it could not stand, and directed a new trial. The only question as to actual damages was the amount. As a matter of law, the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict. The trial judge was correct in directing a verdict for some actual damages.

[2] II. The next assignment is that his honor erred in charging that it had been found as a matter of law that the trees were unnecessarily cut. There was no evidence to show, or even an attempt to show, or even claim, that the cutting was necessary, and no evidence is a question of law.

[3] III. The next complaint is that his honor erred in telling the jury that they might take into consideration the use to which the grove should be put. The measure of damages for destroying a grove is not the value of the timber.

[4] IV. The last assignment of error is that, in ruling on the motion for a directed verdict in behalf of the defendant, the trial judge said, in the presence of the jury, that the testimony in that case is stronger than on the former hearing. The appellant cannot complain. The appellant invited the remarks by his motion. The remarks were necessary in order to decide the very question raised by the appellant. The appellant not only invited the remarks, but did not ask for the exclusion of the jury, and it is now too late to complain.

The judgment is affirmed.

COFFEY v. JENKINS. (No. 10742.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 10, 1921.)

Continuance ←35—Admitting that absent witness would testify as claimed by defendant precludes impeachment of defendant's affidavit.

On defendant's application for continuance, in compliance with practice rule 27, where plaintiff agreed to admit the affidavit of defendant that absent witness would testify to certain facts, but not that the testimony was true, plaintiff cannot on the trial impeach defendant's affidavit by introducing an affidavit made by absent witness, 10 days after the collision which was the basis of the action.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; W. H. Townsend, Judge.

Action by Nessey Coffey against J. F. Jenkins. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

The grounds of appeal were as follows:

His honor, the presiding judge, erred in admitting the affidavit of John Scruggs over the objections of the defendant on the following grounds, to wit:

(1) Because said affidavit purports to be an ex parte statement of the witness John Scruggs, made at a time and place and under circumstances when the defendant had no opportunity to be present or to cross-examine said witness.

(2) Because the foundation for contradicting said witness was not laid, nor was any notice given, at the time the statement offered by the defendant as to what John Scruggs would testify to, that plaintiff's attorneys had or would not offer the affidavit for the purpose of contradicting the said witness by a different statement made at a different time and place.

(3) Because the affidavit offered by the plaintiff is an impeachment of the testimony of said witness as contained in the statement admitted on the part of the defendant, as it contradicts the statements as contained in defendant's affidavit, without giving the said witness John Scruggs an opportunity to admit, explain, or deny the apparently contradictory statements, thereby impeaching the witness before the jury in his absence, and without notice or opportunity to give an explanation of the same, and to the injury of the defendant in the cause.

(4) Because, the plaintiff, who held the affidavit when the defendant offered the statement of what said witness would testify to, by not giving notice that the later affidavit would be offered to contradict the witness, waived the right to contradict said witness by means of said later affidavit, without first having laid the foundation for contradiction.

(5) Because the admission of the said affidavit was injurious to the defense, in that the said ex parte affidavit, offered for the purpose of contradiction and admitted, tended to impeach, and did impeach, and destroy the force and effect of the statement offered by defendant.

(6) Because the court erred in holding that it was impossible to lay the foundation for contradicting the said witness, and therefore the case was an exception to the rule; the error being that, when the defendant offered his statement of what the witness would testify to, the plaintiff had then the right and opportunity to object to the admission of such statement, unless the defendant would also consent that the contradicting affidavit in their possession should also be admitted, and, further, because the impossibility of laying the foundation for contradiction was due to the plaintiff's attorneys, who had the opportunity to keep the defendant's statement of said witnesses' testimony out of the case, except upon the condition that their statement should also be admitted, and that, failing to use their opportunity, they waived the right to have it admitted without a proper foundation having first been laid to contradict said witness.

Bomar & Osborne, of Spartanburg, and Butler & Hall, of Gaffney, for appellant.

John Gary Evans, S. J. Nicholls, and C. C. Wyche, all of Spartanburg, and Dobson & Vassy, of Gaffney, for respondent.

COTHRAN, J. Action for damages on account of alleged personal injury resulting from a collision between a motorcycle driven by the plaintiff and an automobile driven by the defendant. Verdict for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Upon the call of the case for trial in the circuit court, the defendant moved for a continuance upon the ground that John Scruggs, a material witness, was absent. He had not been subpoenaed for the reason, as counsel orally announced to the court, that "only a short time before" they had learned that he was out of the state, in North Carolina, and that in the meantime they had been making efforts to locate him without avail, and that for the same reason no deposition had been taken. Counsel for the plaintiff objected to the continuance, and insisted upon a compliance with rule 27. Counsel for defendant then prepared and submitted to the court an affidavit by the defendant, containing a statement of what the witness Scruggs would testify if he were present, omitting entirely the other essential elements required by the rule. The court ruled that the plaintiff must admit that the witness would swear to the facts contained in the affidavit or the case would be continued. Counsel for plaintiff stated that they would admit that the witness, if present, would so testify, but not that the testimony was true. The case was then ordered to trial.

As a part of his evidence the defendant offered the affidavit. In reply the plaintiff offered an affidavit, made by the witness

Scruggs on the 30th of September, 1919, 10 days after the collision, totally contradictory of the affidavit by the defendant referred to. Counsel for defendant objected, upon grounds which will be reported. The court admitted the affidavit of Scruggs, holding:

"It is impossible to lay a foundation here, and I think it is an exception to the rule requiring the foundation to be laid. So the objection is overruled, and the paper is admitted, because it was impossible under the circumstances of this case to lay the foundation for contradiction."

The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed, assigning error in the admission of the affidavit. No other point arises in the case.

After a careful investigation of the subject, we have not found a single authority text-book, or decided case sustaining the admissibility of the evidence. The A. & E. Enc. L., Cyc., Corpus Juris, Ruling Case Law, and cases from Alabama, Arkansas, Colorado, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, New York, Ohio, Oklahoma, Tennessee, Virginia, and the Supreme Court of the United States are either directly or with strong implication against it. They may be found under the title "Continuance" and in the case of National Council v. Owen, 47 Okl. 464, 149 Pac. 231. Wigmore on Evidence states the admissibility under an ut semble, citing many cases contra, and only one, Hutmacher v. Charleston Consol. R., Gas & Electric Co., 63 S. C. 123, 40 S. E. 1029, as in accord, which does not even inferentially sustain it. The case of Jeter v. Askew, 2 Spear, 637, is nowhere cited to sustain the admissibility, and is far from doing so. The case of State v. Taylor, 56 S. C. 360, 34 S. E. 939, decides that contradictory statements alleged to have been made by the deceased are inadmissible against the admitted dying declaration, upon the ground that the admission would violate the rule which requires the foundation to be laid. If the lack of an opportunity to cross-examine the witness be the basis of the admission of the testimony, it certainly would apply in such a case.

The Jeter v. Askew Case is one of a decidedly different complexion. There a witness was allowed to give hearsay testimony—what he heard another person say about the plaintiff. Other testimony in reply from other witnesses, of contradictory statements made by the same person, were admitted and sustained by the court upon very scant consideration. In the Hutmacher Case, the testimony was allowed under "particular and exceptional circumstances" arising out of the conduct of opposing counsel whereby the other was led to believe that he would be allowed to contradict the witness by a written statement, notice of which had been given when he agreed to admit the statement of what the witness would swear, if present, and assented to by opposing counsel. It impliedly holds that, but for this reservation and notice, and assent, the testimony would not have been admissible. The rule is forcibly expressed in 30 A. & E. 1126:

"Where a continuance is sought to procure the attendance of an absent witness, and the adverse party, to avoid the postponement, admits that the witness will testify as stated in the affidavit filed for the purpose, the evidence thus given cannot be discredited on the trial by proof of contradictory statements. The party making the admission cannot be allowed to extricate himself from a situation created by his own voluntary act, in disregard of fixed rules of practice and evidence."

The plaintiff was not compelled to admit anything; he admitted the statement to secure an immediate trial, a matter presumably of advantage to him; he must assume with it the concomitant disadvantages. He could have reserved the right to contradict the witness, and, if the defendant agreed to accept the admissions with this reservation, he could not afterwards object. It is entirely conceivable that, if the defendant had been notified of the sworn statement of the witness, so flatly contradicting his own affidavit of what he would swear, he would have preferred to go to trial without his affidavit, and he spared the withering effect of the prior affidavit.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed and the case remanded to that court for a new trial.

HINSON et ux. v. LANCASTER MERCANTILE CO. (No. 10740.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 10, 1921.)

1. Landlord and tenant §34(5)—Evidence held insufficient to prove execution of lease procured by duress.

In action by husband and wife to set aside wife's lease to husband's creditor on the ground of duress, evidence held insufficient to prove that wife was induced to execute lease by threats to prosecute husband for disposing of mortgaged property.

2. Mortgages §1—Paper executed to secure a debt is in the nature of a mortgage.

Whatever may be its form, a paper executed to secure a debt is in the nature of a mortgage.

3. Mortgages \S 611—Lease, executed to secure payment of the debt, is in the nature of mortgage entitling lessor to an accounting.

Where wife executed a lease to husband's creditor to secure payment of husband's debt, the wife is entitled to an accounting, the lease being in the nature of a mortgage.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Lancaster County; Edward McIver, Judge.

Action by W. C. Hinson and wife against the Lancaster Mercantile Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

The evidence on the issue of duress consisted of the testimony of the husband, the wife, and a daughter, who read letters to her parents, that defendant had in letters to husband threatened to prosecute him for selling mortgaged property if he did not pay the balance of the debt, and husband's testimony that an officer of defendant company had threatened him in person with prosecution if he did not make some security for the balance and had proposed that wife give defendant a lease as security.

The attorney who drew up the lease testified that no representative of the defendant was present at the time of its execution, and that no threats to prosecute the husband were made to the wife at such time, and that she executed the lease voluntarily.

Harry Hines, of Lancaster, for appellants.
John T. Green, of Lancaster, for respondent.

FRASER, J. This is an action to set aside a lease of land belonging to the plaintiff, Mary Hinson, made in February, 1917, to the defendant, to continue to December 31, 1921. This action was commenced July 26, 1919. The plaintiffs claim that W. C. Hinson had dealings with the defendant; that the defendant notified the plaintiff W. C. Hinson that he still owed it a balance, and if he did not pay up the debt he would be indicted for selling property under a lien; that Mary Hinson, his wife, was frightened by the threat, and in consequence thereof made the lease sought to be set aside. The plaintiff also asks for an accounting for rents and profits. The case was tried before Judge McIver. Judge McIver said: There are two questions: (1) Was the lease void for duress? The duress was a threat of prosecution of the husband. (2) Should there be an accounting?

[1] I. The finding of his honor that the lease was not made under duress is fully sustained by the evidence, and this objection cannot be sustained.

II. Is the appellant entitled to an accounting? The respondent put up only one witness. That witness testified:

"She understood from what I told her that she was signing them to secure the debt due by her husband to Lancaster Mercantile Company."

[2, 3] Whatever may be its form, a paper executed to secure a debt is in the nature of a mortgage, and the appellant is entitled to an accounting.

The judgment appealed from is reversed, and the case remanded to the court of common pleas for Lancaster county for the taking of the account between the parties.

STATE v. TURNER et al. (No. 10732.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 10, 1921.)

1. Homicide \S 234(7)—On failure to connect accused with killing, his conduct afterward cannot convict him.

In prosecution for murder on failure to connect the accused with the actual killing or to show that he was present, aiding and abetting, his conduct after the homicide cannot convict him.

2. Criminal law \S 753(2)—Acquittal should be directed where evidence is insufficient.

Where, admitting as true every fact and circumstance relied on by the state without reference to whether it was competent or not, there was not sufficient evidence to warrant conviction, a verdict of not guilty should have been directed.

3. Criminal law \S 406(5)—Statement of accused, throwing light on subject of trial, is competent against him.

Any statement made by any of defendants, even though he did not admit commission of the crime, is competent as against the party making it, if it throws any light on the subject being tried, and elucidates the subject-matter of the trial.

4. Criminal law \S 409—Whether a statement by accused was voluntary is largely within the discretion of the trial judge.

The question of whether a statement by the accused was voluntary is in a large manner within the discretion of the trial judge.

5. Criminal law \S 472, 656(5)—Expert opinion as to ballistics admissible; remarks by trial judge as to testimony held prejudicial.

Where a witness had qualified as an expert on ballistics, he was entitled to give his opinion, and a remark of the trial judge that, "I think the rapidity with which a projectile would fly through the air would depend on the force behind it, and if he knows how that pistol was charged, he can testify. I think he is talking through his hat"—was prejudicial as tending to discredit the evidence of the witness and invading the province of the jury.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Marion County; George E. Prince, Judge.

Archie Turner and Mack Turner were convicted of murder, and they appeal. New trial.

W. B. Norton, of Mullins, and A. F. Woods and W. F. Stackhouse, both of Marion, for appellants.

L. M. Gasque, of Marion, and Bullard & Stringfield, of Fayetteville, N. C., for the State.

WATTS, J. The appellants were indicted along with Thomas Turner for the murder of Edwin White, and tried before Judge Prince and a jury. At the close of state's evidence a motion was made for a directed verdict in favor of defendants, and refused. At the close of all the evidence in the case a similar motion was made and granted by his honor as to Thomas Turner, and refused as to Archie Turner and Mack Turner; they were convicted by the jury of murder with a recommendation to mercy and sentenced; thereupon they appeal.

[1, 2] We will consider the exceptions of Mack Turner, as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain his conviction. It must be borne in mind that Mack Turner is convicted and was tried for the killing of Edward White, not that of accessory after the fact of the killing. A careful, diligent, and close investigation of the evidence warrants us in concluding that the evidence was not sufficient to support the verdict of guilty as to him. Neither the evidence nor the circumstances warrant his conviction; while the whole case raised a suspicion, and a grave one at that, it does not warrant a verdict of guilty. The state failed to connect him with the actual killing, or that he was present aiding and abetting at the time of the killing, or that he had anything to do with it at all, until after the killing occurred, and his conduct after the homicide cannot convict him of an offense that the state failed to prove. Admitting as true every fact and circumstance relied on by the state to be true, without reference to whether it was competent or not, there is not sufficient evidence to warrant the conviction of Mack Turner, and his honor was in error in not directing a verdict of not guilty as to him.

There was sufficient evidence to go to the jury as to Archie Turner, and his honor committed no error in submitting his case to the jury for their determination, and the exceptions, alleging error on the part of his honor in not directing a verdict of not guilty, are overruled.

Exceptions 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10 complain of error in admitting in evidence the oral and written statements of defendant designated as "confessions." The state did not offer them as confessions, but as declarations of the defendants.

[3, 4] Any statement made by any of the defendants, even though he did not admit the commission of the crime, is competent as against the party making it, if it throws any light on the subject being tried, and elucidates the subject-matter of the trial. His honor was careful to warn the jury that it was competent only against the party making the statement, and could not be used against the others. As to whether it was voluntary or not, that is in a large manner within the discretion of the trial judge, and rests in a large manner in his wise discretion, and from the whole case we see no error as complained of in these exceptions, and they are overruled.

[5] Exception 11 complains that his honor erred in not allowing Col. Johnson to answer the questions put to him by defendant's counsel, and making the following comment and ruling:

"I think the rapidity with which a projectile would fly through the air would depend on the force behind it, and if he knows how that pistol was charged he can testify. I think he is talking through his hat."

This was prejudicial, the witness had qualified as an expert in ballistics, and was entitled to give his opinion for what it was worth, and that was for the jury to determine. The testimony was competent, and in reply to evidence of the state in relation to the same point and an expression on the part of his honor, nullifying the opinion of the expert witness on a material point in the case and practically discrediting his evidence with the jury, which made his honor invade the province of the jury and become a participant with them of the determination of a question of fact and in violation of the principles decided by this court in Latimer v. Electric Co., 81 S. C. 379, 62 S. E. 438; State v. Arnold, 80 S. C. 383, 61 S. E. 891; Stokes v. Murray, 99 S. C. 221, 83 S. E. 33. This exception must be sustained.

Exceptions 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16 are overruled. The judge's charge, taken as a whole, cannot be considered as prejudicial as complained of. His honor should have charged the request No. 16, but there must be a new trial under exception 11, which is sustained.

New trial.

MURRAY CO. v. PEACOCK. (No. 10713.)

1. Sales ⇨285(2)—Parties bound by time limit for notice of defects under warranty.

Where warranty of cotton gin required notice as to defective parts within 10 days from beginning of operation, the buyer could not avail himself of the warranty where he failed to give notice within such time.

2. Sales ⇨267—Express warranty limits warranty to that expressed.

An express warranty excludes an implied warranty.

3. Sales ⇨285(4)—Notice of defects under warranty held not waived.

Under a warranty of cotton gin requiring notice as to defective parts to be given within 10 days, that seller sent a man to inspect the gin, and to fix it after the 10 days had expired, held, under the terms of the contract, not a waiver of notice within that time.

Appeal from Common Pleas, Circuit Court of Barnwell County; I. W. Bowman, Judge.

Action by the Murray Company against E. D. Peacock. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Brown & Bush, of Barnwell, for appellant.
M. M. Mann, of St. Matthews, and Harley & Blatt, of Barnwell, for respondent.

FRASER, J. This is an action for the credit portion of the purchase price of a cotton gin. The defendant admits the execution of the notes sued on, but sets up failure of consideration, and a counterclaim for damages for defective ginning. The defendant claims that the ribs of the gin were so far apart that the seed passed between them and "seeded" the cotton; that he did not discover the defect until he offered 88 bales of cotton for sale, and then he found that the seeded cotton was worth three and one-half cents per pound less than properly ginned cotton. The gin was sold under a written contract, which contained an express warranty, limiting its liability to defective parts, and required notice in writing, or by telegraph, to the home office within 10 days. The plaintiff obligated itself to supply defective parts of which it had notice within 10 days from the time the defendant began to operate the gin.

The defendant admitted the execution of the notes sued on. The defendant did not show notice within 10 days, or indeed for some 6 weeks after the operating began, and only then by inference from the fact that the plaintiff sent a man to inspect and help to put the gin in order after the defect was discovered. At the close of the evidence, the judge directed a verdict for the notes, less the price of the defective parts, and there being no evidence of the price of the defective parts, the jury found for the plaintiff the whole sum sued for. There are 17 exceptions, but the appellant says he will argue only three or four questions.

[1] I. The appellant asks, Was there a breach of warranty? So far as the record shows, there seems to have been. The contract which the defendant signed gave the defendant only 10 days in which to notify the plaintiff, and the defendant did not avail himself of this protection. That the parties are bound by the time limits set by their contract is fully decided in Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Co. v. Glencoe Cotton Mills, 106 S. C. 133, 90 S. E. 526. The appellant claims that the defect was latent, and the appellant did not know of it. The case just cited is full to that point also. The first question must be decided adversely to the appellant.

[2] II. The next question is as to the implied warranty. An express warranty limits the warranty to that expressed. This point cannot be sustained.

III. The third question is as to the effect of the 10 days' notice. That is binding on the appellant, as we have seen. The courts cannot make contracts for people. The appellant expressly agreed to the 10 days for trial and notice, and is bound by it.

[3] IV. The appellant claims that there is a question of waiver of the 10 days' notice from the fact that the plaintiff sent a man to inspect the gin and fix it after the 10 days had expired. The contract provides:

"Failure to make such trial, or to give such notice, or use after ten days without such notice, or use for any ten days without notice, shall be conclusive evidence of the fulfillment of the warranty if the Murray Company shall, at the request of the purchaser, render assistance of any kind in operating said machine, or any part thereof, or in remedying any defects at any time; said assistance shall in no case be deemed an acknowledgment on its part of a breach by it of this warranty, or a waiver of, or excuse for, any failure of the purchaser to fully keep and perform the conditions of this warranty."

This point also must be determined against the appellant.

The judgment is affirmed.

MURRAY CO. v. OUZTS. (No. 10717.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Sept. 28, 1921.)

1. Damages §=78(6)—Sale contract held to provide for penalty.

A contract for the purchase of a ginning outfit, reciting that in case of countermand the purchaser was to reimburse the seller for any and all expenses incurred in the sale, and pay to the seller 20 per cent. of the purchase price, held to provide for a penalty as to the 20 per cent.

2. Evidence §=442(6)—Breach of contemporaneous parol contract inadmissible in action on written contract.

In an action on a contract of purchase of a ginning outfit, evidence of the breach of a contemporaneous parol agreement, by which plaintiff agreed to sell the outfit which defendant then owned, held properly excluded, the written contract containing all of the agreement between the parties.

3. Evidence §=258(1)—Letter by salesman after execution of contract sued on held properly excluded where agent's authority not shown.

In an action on a contract by defendant for the purchase of a ginning outfit, exclusion of a letter written by the salesman after the execution of the contract held proper, no authority in the agent being shown to modify the contract or to make a new one.

4. Sales §=23(2)—Purchaser's letter to seller of ginning outfit held a countermand.

A letter from the purchaser to the seller held a countermand of the purchaser's order.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenwood County; Ernest Moore, Judge.

Action by the Murray Company against J. L. Ouzts. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

Grier Park & Nicholson, of Greenwood, for appellant.

M. M. Mann, of St. Matthews, and Featherstone & McGee, of Greenwood, for respondent.

FRASER, J. The defendant signed a written contract of purchase of a ginning outfit from the plaintiff. The contract provided:

"In case of countermand, it is understood that the purchaser is to reimburse the Murray Company for any and all expenses incurred in this sale, and to pay to Murray Company 20 per cent. of the purchase price of this contract."

His honor the trial judge charged the jury that the 20 per cent. was liquidated damages, and not a penalty, and directed the jury to find the full 20 per cent. sued for.

[1] I. The first exception questions this ruling. The first exception must be sustained. The contract required the defendant to pay "for any and all expenses incurred in this sale." This provision covered all of plaintiff's actual damages. The "20 per cent." was additional, and can be a penalty, and nothing else. The first exception covers the measure of damages also, but, as neither party argues this subdivision, it is not considered.

[2] II. The defendant set up a breach of a contemporaneous parol agreement, by which plaintiff agreed to sell the ginning outfit which the defendant then owned. The presiding judge refused to allow any evidence of the parol contract. In this his honor was right. The written contract contains all of the agreement between the parties.

[3] III. The third allegation of error arises from the exclusion of a letter written by the salesman some time after the execution of the contract. There was no error here. No authority in the agent was shown to warrant his modification of the contract, or make a new contract. This exception is overruled.

IV. The last exception complains of error in the construction of certain letters written by the defendant to the plaintiff as a countermand of the order. The defendant wrote:

"Yours of the 5th at hand and duly noted, am very sorry that I cannot install new machinery. But as I explained to you on the 2d of this month, unless you dispose of my old outfit, it will be impossible for me to install a new one."

"I want the 'Murray' plant but I cannot meet your terms. If I could it would be a pleasure for me to install it."

"If you have bought engine and boiler for me, I will take same, if we can get together on terms, and I will try to install balance next year."

"If you ship the entire outfit July 15th you do so at your own expense."

[4] This language must be construed to be a countermand. The defendant does not even now offer to comply.

The judgment is reversed and a new trial ordered.

WIDEMAN v. HINES, Director General of Railroads. (No. 10741.)

1. Railroads ⇐350(1)—Negligence held question for jury.

In an action for the death of a passenger in an automobile struck by a train, where there was evidence that the driver looked before attempting to cross, that his view was obscured, and that the defendant did not give the statutory signals, the determination as to who was negligent was for the jury.

2. Railroads ⇐313—Omission of statutory signals negligence.

The failure to give the statutory signals of the approach of a train to a crossing is negligence per se.

3. Negligence ⇐136(10) — Question for jury on conflicting evidence.

Where the evidence is conflicting, the issues of negligence and contributory negligence are for the jury.

4. Railroads ⇐351(9)—Charges as to signals held proper.

In an action for death at a crossing, the court properly read to the jury the statute (Civ. Code 1912, §§ 3222, 3230) requiring signals and imposing liability for neglect to give signals, unless decedent was guilty of gross or willful negligence or violation of law contributing to the injury.

5. Trial ⇐295(6)—Instruction as to railroad's liability for death resulting from failure to give statutory signals not reversible, in view of whole charge.

In an action for death of passenger in an automobile struck by a train at a crossing, where the court fully charged as to burden of proof and effect of defendant's negligence, and plaintiff's contributory negligence, and read to them the crossing statutes (Civ. Code 1912, §§ 3222, 3230) under which defendant was liable if it failed to give the statutory signals, unless decedent was guilty of gross or willful negligence or violation of law contributing to the injury, instructions that, if defendant's failure to give the statutory signals was the proximate cause of the injury, plaintiff could recover, unless decedent was guilty of want of slight care, and that the failure to give such signals was some evidence of willfulness and wantonness, were not reversible error.

6. Appeal and error ⇐169—Points not made in circuit court cannot be considered by Supreme Court.

Cothran, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenwood County; Thomas S. Sease, Judge.

Action by Jane Wideman, as administratrix, etc., against Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The court charged the jury that plaintiff must prove by the preponderance of the testimony some one of the specifications of negligence alleged: That defendant must prove its affirmative pleas of contributory and gross negligence by the preponderance of the testimony, that negligence and contributory negligence is the want of such care as a person of ordinary care and prudence would have observed under all the circumstances; that, if defendant's negligence was not the proximate cause of the injury, plaintiff could not recover; that decedent's contributory negligence should not be considered unless it was the proximate cause of the injury; that violation of statutory provisions, which the court read, as to the giving of signals is negligence per se; that gross negligence is the want of slight care, and willful negligence the conscious failure to observe slight care; that plaintiff could not recover at common law if decedent was guilty of contributory negligence, nor under the statute (Civ. Code, §§ 3222, 3230) if guilty of gross negligence as above defined; that if defendant failed to give the statutory signals, and such failure was the proximate cause of the injury, plaintiff could recover unless decedent was guilty of want of slight care; that one approaching a crossing must observe due care and use the senses with which he is endowed; and that the failure to give the statutory signals was some evidence of willfulness and wantonness.

WATTS, J. This is an appeal from judgment rendered and entered for $5,000. Plaintiff's intestate was killed at a crossing collision with one of the trains of C. & W. C. Railway Company, operated by the defendant. The verdict of the jury was for actual damages. The exceptions, five in number, can be considered under the following heads:

[1, 2] Was it error on the part of his honor in refusing to direct a verdict as moved for by the defendant?

In making the motion defendant relied, in a large measure, on the case of Cable Piano Co. v. Southern Ry. Co., 94 S. C. 144, 77 S. E. 868. The facts of this case are very different from the facts of that case. In that case no other inference could be drawn than that it was the failure of the driver to look. This was the sole cause of the injury. In this case there was conflict of evidence, and that presents an entirely different situation. There is plenty of evidence that the driver of the car looked, and his view was cut off by the way the public road ran, and the way the railroad ran, and that his view was obstructed by a ridge and the contour of the land and weeds and bushes. There was evidence that the railroad did not give the statutory signals; this was negligence per se. There was evidence to be submitted to the jury for their proper determination as to who was negligent.

[3] The plaintiffs by evidence showed defendant was negligent; the defendant introduced evidence showing plaintiff's intestate was. This court nor the circuit court is called upon to decide such issues when there is a conflict of evidence, and more than one inference can be drawn. The jury is the one to decide such issues. Cable Piano Co. v. Railway, was decided upon the particular facts of that case; so was Callison v. Railway, 106 S. C. 123, 90 S. E. 260; and every other case will be so decided. His honor committed no error in refusing to direct a verdict.

[4-8] Did his honor restrict the defense to a want of slight care in his charge, and did he commit an error in his charge with reference to statutory signals, as complained of in exceptions 2 and 3? The charge taken as a whole could not have prejudiced the defendant as complained of. He read to the jury the statute (Civ. Code, §§ 3222, 3230) in reference to crossing. This was a compliance of law as decided in Mercer v. Railway, 44 S. E. 750. His charge was full and clear, and did not deprive the defendant of the defense relied on, and he did not invade the province of the jury by a charge on fact or intimation that was prejudicial as to the force or effect of the evidence. He fully charged the law, and left to the jury to find the facts, uninfluenced in any way as to what he thought. The attention of the court below was not called to the questions relied on in exceptions 4 and 5. The points were not made in circuit court, and cannot be considered by us, but we will say in passing there was no merit in them.

All exceptions are overruled, and judgment affirmed.

GARY, C. J., and FRASER, J., concur.

COTHRAN, J. (dissenting). The intestate John Wideman, was killed at a railroad crossing by a collision between the automobile in which he was riding and an engine "running light" (that is, without a train) on December 18, 1919. The case was tried before Judge Sease and a jury April term, 1920, and resulted in a verdict of $5,000 in favor of the plaintiff.

At the close of all of the testimony the defendant made a motion for a directed verdict in his favor, upon two grounds: (1) That there is no testimony tending to establish the allegations of negligence as the proximate cause of intestate's injury and death, and no testimony tending to establish willfulness and wantonness; (2) that the testimony shows conclusively that intestate's injury and death was due to and caused by his own contributory negligence and his gross and willful negligence under the statute, as the direct and proximate cause of his injury and death, and without which the same would not have happened.

It will therefore be necessary to make a statement of the facts and circumstances attending the collision:

The railroad, at the locus in question, runs approximately east and west, between the two stations of Bradley and Troy; between these two stations is a crossing of the railroad and the highway which runs from Abbeville to Edgefield; about 200 yards south of the crossing is what has been known for many years as "Chiles' crossroads," a crossing of the highway above referred to, and the highway between Bradley and Troy; the highway last referred to runs from Bradley towards Troy, in a measure parallel with the railroad and on the south side of it; the intestate lived on the north side of the railroad, and, returning to his home from Bradley, along this highway, he was compelled to cross the railroad at the crossing referred to; he was riding in an automobile owned by him and driven by his son; the driver was on the left front seat, and the intestate on the right, with another colored man sitting in his lap; three other colored men were on the back seat; the party left Bradley in the afternoon bound for home; the living occupants of the car testified that they were traveling at the rate of from 10 to 15 miles an hour, until just before reaching the crossing when they speeded up to make the incline which led up to the crossing; at Chiles' crossroad they turned to the right, making for the crossing; about 200 feet from the crossing is the mouth of a cut, extending some 500 feet back towards Bradley, the deepest part of it being some 10 or 12 feet deep; along the top of the banks of the cut were some weeds and small bushes, and in the field on the right as they turned into the Abbeville road; cotton and corn were planted, both naturally having been harvested at that time of the year; upon the question whether or not the engine could have been seen after they turned into the Abbeville road, Lewis Whitlock, one of the occupants of the car, stated that it could not have been seen; John Wideman, the driver, made no statement as to this; Daniel Wideman, another of the occupants, stated:

"Looking to the right of the crossroad you can see the top of an engine through the cut, and when it comes out of the cut you can see it all right before it gets to the crossing."

The witness, Lewis Whitlock stated that he was looking to the front, "looking straight ahead"; his statement, therefore, that the engine could not be seen coming through the cut goes for nothing; the witness for the defendant testified that the cut was not more than 10 feet deep at any point, and that the top part of an engine could easily have been seen at any point from the crossroads to the railroad crossing. In view of the testimony both for the plaintiff and for the defendant, I think that it is abundantly established that the engine could have been seen coming through the cut at any point along the road from the crossroads. It further appeared that the distance from the crossing to the mouth of the cut was 200 feet, and that at a point 30 feet from the crossing the engine could have been seen on the track 500 feet in the direction of Bradley; the driver of the car made no stop or slacking of speed between the crossroads and the crossing, but in fact speeded up to make the incline. The fact that a witness states that he looked and did not see the engine goes for nothing if the situation is such that if he had looked he would have seen.

"Nor will he be permitted to say that he did not see what he must have seen, had he looked, or that he did not hear what he must have heard, had he listened." Hines v. Smith (C. C. A.) 270 Fed. 132.

I think that the case comes squarely within the Cable Case and is ruled by it. The only difference between the two cases that I can see is that in the Cable Case it was conceded that, approaching the crossing, a train could have been seen for three-quarters of a mile; while here, notwithstanding the testimony of the plaintiff's witnesses, it is contended that the engine could not have been seen, a fact that has absolutely no testimony to support it.

But, assume that the engine could not have been seen at all points along the road between the crossroads and the crossing, as it came through the cut; it is well-established law that, the more dangerous a crossing may be, the greater vigilance is required of both the traveler and the railroad company; if the traveler cannot see, the demand is imperative upon him that he listen for an approaching train, and, if listening will not avail him on account of the noise of his own vehicle, it is his duty to stop. The railroad track itself is a warning of danger; he cannot go heedlessly upon it, with increased speed, without exercising the senses which Providence has given him. The most available sense that can be exercised is vision. The Cable Case holds that, if by looking he could see the approaching train, and he did not look, he is guilty of gross contributory negligence. If that sense of vision should be rendered useless by obstructions, does that fact relieve him of the necessity of using such other senses as may avail? Does it give him a license to rush into a place of known danger without the use of other means available to him of discovering what his vision could not discover? As a matter of fact, his sense of hearing is a quicker and more reliable detective than his sight, particularly where the train is passing through a cut. There cannot be a doubt but that, if he had given this sense full opportunity, by stopping his car, if necessary, the accident would not have occurred. He did not use a single sense that was available to him on this occasion, and how can it be said that he was in the exercise of even slight care? Slight care denotes some care, however small; and if he did not use any at all, it follows that he did not use even slight care; and if he did not use slight care, he was guilty of gross negligence.

Where the facts are not in dispute, gross negligence is a question of law for the court, and not one of fact for the jury. Cable Piano Co. v. Railway Co., 94 S. C. 143, 77 S. E. 868; Jarrell v. Railway Co., 58 S. C. 491, 36 S. E. 910.

It cannot be laid down as a hard and fast rule that, in every case, the duty of a traveler on the highway approaching a railroad crossing requires of him, as a legal obligation, to stop, look, and listen for a train. So much depends upon the circumstances of the particular case, the location of the crossing, the vehicle, the view to be had of the track ahead, the passing of other trains, etc. The circumstances may require him to stop and listen, or to stop and look, or to look, or to listen. In every case that has ever happened, or that can be conceived, as a matter of law, the traveler must exercise at least one of these functions. If the view be unobstructed, he need not stop, for his movement is no impediment to his vision, but he must look; if the view be obstructed, the function of vision is rendered useless, and he is not required to do the vain thing of looking, but he must stop and listen; it is conceivable that, even if the view be obstructed, he may not be required to stop, for his movement may be so noiseless as not to impair the function of hearing, and listening would be all that should be required of him. If it should appear that the traveler did not stop, did not look, and did not listen, the question whether or not his view was obstructed is of no consequence; for in the one event he failed to stop and listen, and the other he failed to look.

The law imposes upon every capable person the duty of observing due care for his own safety when approaching a railroad crossing, which necessarily involves the exercise of his senses. Cable Piano Co. v. Railway Co., 94 S. C. 145, 77 S. E. 868; Bamberg v. Railway Co., 72 S. C. 389, 51 S. E. 988; Osteen v. Railway Co., 76 S. C. 868, 57 S. E. 196.

It is not enough for plaintiff to testify that he did not see and did not hear an approaching train before undertaking to cross a railroad track at a public highway crossing. The law imposes on him the positive duty of exercising due care and making proper use of his senses of sight and hearing, and where it appears from the undisputed testimony that, by the exercise of ordinary care in looking or listening, he could have avoided a collision at the crossing, it is the duty of the court to direct a verdict in favor of the defendant. Cable Piano Co. v. Railway Co., 94 S. C. 143, 77 S. E. 868; Bamberg v. Railway Co., 72 S. C. 389, 51 S. E. 988; Osteen v. Railway Co., 76 S. C. 368, 57 S. E. 196; Drawdy v. Railway Co., 78 S. C. 379, 58 S. E. 980; Griskell v. Railway Co., 81 S. C. 193, 62 S. E. 205; Schofield v. Chicago & St. P. R. Co., 114 U. S. 615, 5 Sup. Ct. 1125, 29 L. Ed. 224; Continental Imp. Co. v. Stead, 95 U. S. 161, 24 L. Ed. 403; Elliott v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 150 U. S. 245, 14 Sup. Ct. 85, 37 L. Ed. 1068.

In Brommer v. Railroad Co., 179 Fed. 577, 108 C. C. A. 135, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 924, plaintiff was injured in a crossing collision; it appeared that he was unfamiliar with the crossing; that for 170 feet along the highway the view of the track on both sides was totally obstructed, until a point 30 or 40 feet from the rails was reached, from which a train approaching could have been seen for 500 or 600 feet. The court held that the lower court properly directed a verdict for the defendant, saying:

"His failure to stop, look, and listen, at a point where stopping and where looking and where listening would have prevented the accident, directly contributed thereto."

In Davis v. Chicago, Rhode Island & P. Ry. Co., 159 Fed. 10, 88 C. C. A. 488, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 424, Davis was riding in a buggy, two-seated, with his friend Pfeutze, visiting a point of mutual interest. Pfeutze, the owner of the rig, was driving, Davis sitting by him on the front seat. They approached a railroad crossing. The view of an approaching train was obstructed until they reached a point 34 feet from the rails, from which it could be seen at a distance of about 90 feet. At 15 feet it could be seen 232 feet. They trotted the horse until they got within 20 or 25 feet of the track, and then slowed down to a walk. They were both familiar with the crossing, and testified that they looked and listened for a train, and, neither seeing nor hearing one, they drove onto the track without stopping. Just as the horse's fore feet reached the rail the plaintiff saw the train coming. The driver whipped the horse and cleared the track. The plaintiff, taking fright, jumped, and was injured. The court in a very elaborate opinion held that the conduct of the occupants of the buggy was careless to a degree of "recklessness," and denied the plaintiff's right to recover.

In Railroad Co. v. Houston, 95 U. S. 697, 24 L. Ed. 542, the court says:

"But, aside from this fact, the failure of the engineer to sound the whistle or ring the bell, if such were the fact, did not relieve the deceased from the necessity of taking ordinary precautions for her safety. Negligence of the company's employees in these particulars was no excuse for negligence on her part. She was bound to listen and to look, before attempting to cross the railroad track, in order to avoid an approaching train, and not to walk carelessly into the place of possible danger. Had she used her senses, she could not have failed both to hear and to see the train which was coming. If she omitted to use them, and walked thoughtlessly upon the track, she was guilty of culpable negligence, and so far contributed to her injuries as to deprive her of any right to complain of others. If, using them, she saw the train coming, and yet undertook to cross the track, instead of waiting for the train to pass, and was injured, the consequences of her mistake and temerity cannot be cast upon the defendant."

In Northern P. R. Co. v. Freeman, 174 U. S. 379, 19 Sup. Ct. 763, 43 L. Ed. 1014, Freeman was driving a pair of horses in a farm wagon along a highway which approached a crossing through a deep cut, the sides of which obscured the view of an approaching train until a point 40 feet from the track was reached. He did not stop. After passing the 40-foot point he was seen looking at his horses, and not toward the track along which the train was approaching. When he noticed the train on him it was too late; he was struck and killed. The Supreme Court held that the testimony tending to show his contributory negligence was "conclusive," and that the defendant was entitled to a directed verdict. The court says:

"The duty of a person approaching a railway crossing, whether driving or on foot, to look and listen before crossing the track, is so elementary, and has been affirmed so many times by this court, that a mere reference to the cases of Railroad Co. v. Houston, 95 U. S. 697, and Schofield v. Chicago & St. Paul Railway Co., 114 U. S. 615, is a sufficient illustration of the general rule."

Again:

"Judging from the common experience of men, there can be but one plausible solution of the problem how the collision occurred. He did not look; or, if he looked, he did not heed the warning, and took the chance of crossing the track before the train could reach him. In either case he was clearly guilty of contributory negligence."

In Erie R. Co. v. Weinstein, 166 Fed. 271, 92 C. C. A. 189, it is said:

"If the undisputed physical facts made it so clear as to warrant no other inference than that the deceased by the use of his senses could have seen the approach of this train, if he had looked before reaching the crossing, in time to have kept off and permitted it to pass, or that he saw the train and endeavored to cross in front of it, the court would have erred in denying the motion for a peremptory instruction."

In St. Louis & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Cundieff, 171 Fed. 319, 98 C. O. A. 211, the syllabus reads:

"Plaintiff, while walking across a railroad track at a crossing on a dark and foggy evening, was struck and injured by a freight train which backed against him and was moving at a speed of not more than five or six miles an hour. He was a railroad man and was familiar with the crossing. Witnesses introduced by him testified that they saw the train at a distance of not less than 30 feet, and there was no obstruction to prevent plaintiff from hearing or seeing it if he had stopped and looked and listened before stepping on the track. Held, that he was chargeable with contributory negligence as matter of law, which precluded his recovery; that, in view of the other testimony and of the physical facts, his own testimony that he did so stop and look and listen was not entitled to credence, and did not create a conflict of evidence."

In Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Bennett, 181 Fed. 799, 104 C. O. A. 309, the syllabus is as follows:

"The negligence of the servants of railroad companies in failing to sound whistles or ring bells on the approach of their trains to crossings constitutes no excuse for the failure of travelers on the highways to discharge their duty to exercise reasonable care to look and listen effectively to avoid collisions before they enter upon railroad tracks."

And:

"Where a plaintiff upon a highway, approaching a railroad crossing, cannot look or listen effectively without stopping, it is his duty to stop and look and listen before entering upon the railroad, and a failure so to do is fatal to his recovery, if such failure contributes to his injury."

"If his view is obstructed, then he must listen more attentively and carefully. If his eyes are useless, and there is any noise or confusion which he controls, such as that of horses' feet, or the rumbling of a wagon, or the grinding of brakes, which interfere with the acuteness of his hearing, it is his duty to stop such noise or interfering obstruction and listen for the train before going upon the track."

This rule has been adopted by the Circuit Court of Appeals of this circuit in the very recent case of Dernberger v. Railroad Co., 234 Fed. 405 (District Court, Judge Dayton), and 243 Fed. 21, 155 C. O. A. 551 (C. O. A., Judge Pritchard).

The opinion of Judge Simonton (C. O. A.) in the case of Neininger v. Cowan, 101 Fed. 787, 42 C. O. A. 20, is an exceedingly clear statement of the doctrine. See, also, Curtis v. Railroad Co., 232 Fed. 109, 146 C. O. A. 301. The rule is the same in South Carolina. Cable Piano Co. v. Railroad Co., 94 S. C.

145, 77 S. E. 868; Bamberg v. Railroad Co., 72 S. C. 389, 51 S. E. 988; Osteen v. Railroad Co., 76 S. C. 368, 57 S. E. 196.

In the Cable Piano Case, supra, the facts were these:

A negro boy was driving plaintiff's team, drawing a covered piano wagon along a highway which ran close to and parallel with the railroad for three-quarters of a mile, and then turned abruptly across the track, the distance from the turn in the highway to the crossing being from 20 to 30 feet. He testified that, on account of the cover of the wagon, he could not see the train, which was approaching from his rear, without leaning out of the wagon, and that he could not hear it because of the noise made by the wagon. The track was straight, and the view unobstructed for at least three-quarters of a mile in both directions. The court held as follows:

"It necessarily follows that, if the driver had looked before going upon the crossing, he would have seen the train in time to prevent the collision. The law imposes upon every capable person the duty of observing due care for his own safety, when about to cross a railroad track, which necessarily involves the exercise of his senses. And, while it is ordinarily a question of fact for the jury to say whether, under the circumstances of the particular case, the traveler did exercise such care, when the facts are undisputed and susceptible of only one inference, it becomes a question of law for the court. Zeigler v. Railroad Co., 5 S. C. 221; Edwards v. Railway, 63 S. C. 271, 41 S. E. 458; Bamberg v. Railway, 72 S. C. 389, 51 S. E. 988; Osteen v. Railway, 76 S. C. 378, 57 S. E. 196; Drawdy v. Railway, 78 S. C. 379, 58 S. E. 980; Griskell v. Railway, 81 S. C. 193, 62 S. E. 205. In this case plaintiff's driver did not observe the slightest care for his own safety, or that of the property in his custody, and the failure to observe such a slight precaution as to look for approaching trains, before driving upon the crossing, was gross negligence. The evidence warrants no other inference than that his failure to look was the sole cause of the accident, or at least, a proximate contributing cause. Therefore defendant's motion to direct the verdict should have been granted."

There is no testimony in the case as to the speed of the engine except from the defendant's witnesses, and that was to the effect that it was 18 or 20 miles an hour. From the testimony of the plaintiff's witnesses the speed of the automobile could have been little, if any, less than that. Consequently when the engine emerged from the cut, 200 feet from the crossing, the automobile, moving at practically the same speed, was 200 feet from the crossing, at a point from which the engine was plainly visible. The driver of the car testified that he looked to the right all the way from the crossroads to the crossing, but did not see the engine. In view of the physical impossibility of this statement being true, it should be rejected. The great probability is that the presence of his father with another colored man in his lap, sitting on the right of the driver, prevented him from seeing the engine.

It appearing to me that the occupants of the car not only did not exercise slight care, but did not exercise any care at all, the verdict should have been directed in favor of the defendant upon the ground of gross contributory negligence.

I think, too, that the circuit judge was in error in charging the jury that a failure to give the statutory signals is some evidence of willfulness and wantonness. The charge instructs the jury what force and effect to give to certain testimony. The failure to give the signals may support an inference by the jury that there was willfulness or wantonness, but it does not in all cases point to willfulness or wantonness. It may be inadvertent, or it may be from a conscious failure to observe due care, and therefore willful. In all cases it is a question of fact to be decided by the jury, and the instruction by the court that such failure was evidence of willfulness was a practical instruction that they should infer willfulness from the failure. There was no testimony in the case tending to show why the signals were not given. All of the testimony was directed to the fact of whether or not the signals were given. Therefore, when the court told the jury that the bare failure was evidence of willfulness, it was tantamount to telling them that, if they found a failure to give the signals, they must also find that the defendant was willful rather than negligent.

"The failure of a railroad company to give the signals required by statute at a public crossing is negligence per se; moreover, it is sufficient to warrant a reasonable inference of recklessness, willfulness, or wantonness, and therefore sufficient to carry that issue to the jury. No doubt, in some instances, it may be the result of mere inadvertence; if so, it would be negligence only; but, when the positive command or prohibition of a statute is violated or disobeyed, it is deemed sufficient to require submission to the jury of the question whether, under all the circumstances, it was the result of mere inadvertence, or of indifference to the rights of those who travel the highways, or a conscious failure to be careful for their safety. The reason upon which the rule is based is that, when anything is commanded or prohibited by legislative authority, every one is conclusively presumed to know it, and is bound to act accordingly, and, the matter having been brought to his attention in such a solemn and impressive way, his violation or disobedience cannot be entirely excused, and therefore it amounts at the least to negligence; and, while it may be negligence only, it is also enough to warrant a reasonable inference that it was due to indifference to the command or prohibition, or to a conscious disregard thereof, and of the rights of those intended to be safeguarded thereby. True, the facts and circumstances may repel such an inference, but it is for the jury to decide whether they do or not, unless the evidence is susceptible of but one inference."

It is clear from this that the court has the right to submit testimony of the failure to give statutory signals on the issue of willfulness and wantonness, and the jury is at liberty, if they so desire, to draw an inference of willfulness and wantonness, or may simply draw an inference of negligence. In the present case, the presiding judge told the jury that the failure was in itself evidence of willfulness, and, there being no evidence as to why or how the failure to give the signals was caused, the jury may have concluded under the charge that such failure was willful.

The only case which tends to support the charge of the judge is that of Keel v. Railway, 108 S. C. 393, 95 S. E. 65. There the court uses this language: "It is evidence of willfulness, wantonness, and recklessness, but it is for the jury to say"—clearly following the doctrine laid down in Callison v. Railway. The Supreme Court or the judge, on a motion for a nonsuit or for the direction of a verdict, has the right, of course, to say that there is evidence as to any issue made by the pleadings. This is very different, however, from the right to charge the jury that there is evidence of a fact in issue. The Constitution requires the judge simply to charge the law applicable to the issue, and forbids his stating whether or not there is evidence to support such issue. So it is for the jury to draw the inference from the evidence, without intimation from the court as to what inference they should draw. Therefore, when the court told the jury in this case that the failure to give the signals was evidence of willfulness, it practically instructed the jury to draw an inference of willfulness from such failure.

In the case of Finch v. Railway, 87 S. C. 196, 69 S. E. 209, the court charged the jury that negligence could not be inferred from the simple happening of an accident; but, if the railroad should know the circumstances and fail to explain how the accident happened, the jury might infer negligence from their failure or refusal to explain how it occurred.

The Supreme Court, in discussing this, say in substance that it is the duty of the court to define negligence and state the principles of law applicable thereto. It cannot, however, indicate any particular fact, and instruct the jury that from that fact an inference of negligence may be drawn.

"The Constitution does not allow the presiding judge to state the evidence; much less does it allow him to single out any particular act or omission of the defendant and instruct the jury that if that appears then they may infer that the defendant was negligent."

In the present case, the circuit judge violated this principle. He singled out the issue of failure to give the statutory signals, and told the jury that such failure was evidence of willfulness, and thereby invaded the province of the jury. The jury alone had the power to determine whether the failure to give the statutory signals evidenced willfulness or evidenced neglect.

The case of Lawson v. Railway, 91 S. C. 216, 74 S. E. 473, is to the same effect.

In the case of Brown v. Railway, 83 S. C. 56, 64 S. E. 1012, the presiding judge charged the jury that plaintiff's admissions are received in evidence only as discrediting his testimony, and not as affirmative proof of material facts in issue. On its face this appears to be an abstract statement of the law as to evidence; but, upon further examination, it is clear that it is a direction as to the weight and sufficiency of evidence, and the Supreme Court held that it was in violation of the mandate of the Constitution. In the present case, when the presiding judge told the jury that failure to give the statutory signals was evidence of willfulness, he told them what force and effect and weight they might attach to such failure.

In Turbyfill v. Railway, 83 S. C. 328, 65 S. E. 278, the court again announced the same doctrine, to wit: It is the duty of the court to define negligence, but it is the province of the jury to draw the inference from the facts.

It is stated in the leading opinion and in respondent's argument that the verdict was for $5,000 actual damages. If this be true, the charge of the judge may possibly have been harmless; but I find in the record nothing to substantiate this statement. The verdict was a general one, and there is no way of telling whether it included punitive damages or not; and, even if it did not, the jury may have found that the tort was willful, and therefore not to be defended by the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, though they were not disposed to inflict punitive damages.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 16, 1921.)

1. Schools and school districts \S 97(4)—Two-thirds of voters voting at a bond election, and constituting majority of registered voters, sufficient.

As amended in the year 1918 (see Laws 1918, p. 99), article 7, \S 7, par. 1, of the Constitution of the state of Georgia (Civ. Code 1910, \S 8563), requires the assent of two-thirds of the qualified voters of the county, municipality, or division of the state, voting at an election for that purpose, to authorize the incurring of a debt, provided said two-thirds so voting must be a majority of the registered voters. Subsequently to such amendment, Civ. Code 1910, \S 442 must be construed consistently therewith, and the "requisite two-thirds of the voters" mentioned in said section means two-thirds of the qualified voters of the county, municipality, or division voting at said election, provided said two-thirds so voting constitute a majority of the registered voters.

(a) A petition filed by the solicitor general of a judicial circuit, for the validation of district school bonds issued under a school district election alleged to have been held under and pursuant to section 143 of the "School Code of Georgia," which on its face shows that "two-thirds of the qualified voters" of the school district "voting at said election" cast their ballots in favor of bonds, and that such affirmative votes constituted a "majority of the registered voters" of said district, is not defective on the ground that it shows on its face that the affirmative votes did not constitute "two-thirds of the voters of the division," as prescribed by section 442 of the Code of Georgia, and referred to by section 143 of the "Code of School Laws of Georgia" (Acts 1919, pp. 345, 346).

2. Schools and school districts \S 97(4)—One whose name does not appear on county registrars' list not entitled to vote; ordinary to procure list of voters for bond election from registrars; voter who did not take oath when signing voters' book not entitled to vote; signature to oath is prima facie evidence that voter took oath; substantial compliance as to administration of oath sufficient; one having name entered on voters' book, but not on registrars' list, etc., not entitled to vote; one whose name does not appear on registrars' list not entitled to vote, though appearing on other books or lists.

No person is lawfully entitled to vote in a school district bond election held under section 143 of the "Code of School Laws of Georgia" (Acts 1919, pp. 288, 345) whose name does not appear on any list of the county registrars filed with the clerk of the superior court of the county, showing the names of the registered voters of the county entitled to vote.

(a) This is true notwithstanding the name of such person does appear on the voters' book of the tax collector of the county, and, except as to registration as mentioned in the headnote numbered 2, he is otherwise a qualified voter under the law of Georgia.

(b) This is true notwithstanding the name of such person does appear on the certified list of registered voters furnished by the ordinary to the managers of the election, and also appears on the voters' book of the tax collector of the county, and, except as to registration as mentioned in the headnote numbered 2, he is otherwise a qualified voter under the laws of Georgia: The act of 1919, known as the "Code of School Laws of Georgia," at page 346 provides that "the ordinary shall furnish a certified list of registered voters in such school district * * * to the managers of the election." Properly construed, this provision does not substitute the ordinary for the board of county registrars. It merely provides that the ordinary shall procure a certified list of registered voters from the legally constituted board of registrars, and furnish the same to the election managers.

(c) This is true although the name of such person does appear on the voters' book of the tax collector of the county, and, "although the name of such person was entered in such voters' book within six months of said special bond election, but more than six months before the next ensuing general state election," and except as to registration as mentioned in the headnote numbered 2, he is otherwise a qualified voter under the laws of Georgia.

(d) This is true although the name of such person "does appear on the certified list of registered voters furnished by the ordinary to the managers of the election, and also appears on the voters' book of the tax collector of the county, and although the name of such person was entered in such voters' book within six months of said special bond election, but more than six months before the next ensuing general state election," and, except as to registration as mentioned in the headnote numbered 2, he is otherwise a qualified voter under the laws of Georgia.

(e) A person is not lawfully entitled to vote in a school district bond election held under section 143 of the "Code of School Laws of Georgia," whose name appears on the certified list of registered voters furnished by the ordinary to the managers of the election, and also appears on the general list of the county registrars filed with the clerk of the superior court, showing the registered voters of the county entitled to vote, and also appears on the voters' book of the tax collector of the county, where, in an attack upon the validity of his vote in the proceeding to validate such bonds, it is shown by positive and uncontradicted testimony that the oath prescribed for voters by sections 36, 40, 41, 42, 43, 46, and 47 of the Political Code of Georgia of 1910, was not read by, or read or mentioned to, such person when he signed the voters' book, and that he made no such oath or affirmation, and, except as herein stated, he is otherwise a "qualified voter under the laws of Georgia." The fact that one's name is signed to the oath in the voters' book, prescribed in Civ. Code 1910, §§ 36, 40, et seq., will be prima facie evidence that the oath was administered as required by law, a substantial compliance with which shall be sufficient. Brown v. Atlanta, 152 Ga. —, 109 S. E. 686. The tax collector or his clerk shall in no instance permit a person to sign the voters' books or any separate printed oath unless such person shall have actually made the oath before him thereon contained, and a "violation of this section by either the tax collector or his clerk shall be a misdemeanor."

(f) A person is not lawfully entitled to vote in a school district bond election held under section 143 of the "Code of School Laws of Georgia," whose name does not appear on the certified list of registered voters furnished by the ordinary to the managers of the election, nor on any general or supplemental list of the county registrars filed with the clerk of the superior court of the county, showing the names of the registered voters of the county entitled to vote, although the name of such person does appear on the voters' book of the tax collector of the county; and when, in an attack upon the validity of his vote in the proceeding to validate such bonds, it is shown by positive and uncontradicted testimony that he moved from another county to that of the bond election prior thereto, and, by application to the tax collector of the latter county, had his name transferred to and entered upon the voters' book of the latter county, but at no time made any application to the registrars of the latter county for such transfer, and offered no proof before them as to his qualifications to vote, and, except as to registration as mentioned in the headnote numbered 2, he is otherwise a qualified voter under the laws of Georgia.

(g) A person is not lawfully entitled to vote in a school district bond election such as above mentioned, "whose name does not appear on the general or supplemental list of the county registrars filed with the clerk of the superior court of the county, showing the names of the registered voters of the county entitled to vote, but whose name does appear on the certified list of registered voters furnished by the ordinary to the managers of the election, and also appears on the voters' book of the tax collector of the county, although, in an attack upon the validity of his vote in the proceeding to validate such bonds, it is shown by positive and uncontradicted testimony that he moved from another county to that of the bond election prior thereto, and, by application to the tax collector of the latter county, had his name transferred to and entered upon the voters' book of the latter county, but at no time made any application to the registrars of the latter county for such transfer, and offered no proof before them as to his qualifications to vote," and, except as to registration as mentioned in the headnote numbered 2, he is otherwise a qualified voter under the laws of Georgia.

GILBERT, J. The Court of Appeals certified questions to which the rulings stated in the headnotes are answers. Save what is said in this opinion following, none of the headnotes require elaboration.

[1, 2] No person is lawfully entitled to vote in a school district bond election held under section 143 of the "Code of School Laws of Georgia," (Acts 1919, pp. 288, 345), whose name does not appear on any list of the county registrars filed with the clerk of the superior court of the county, showing the names of the registered voters of the county entitled to vote. Article 2, § 1, par. 1, of the Constitution of Georgia (Civil Code 1910, § 6395); Civil Code, §§ 34, 58, 59, 68; Acts 1919, "Code of School Laws of Georgia," at page 346. The fact that a person's name may appear upon a list purporting to show the registered voters, furnished by the ordinary to the managers of the election, or that the name appears on the voters' book of the tax collector of the county, and that this person is otherwise a qualified voter under the laws of Georgia, with the exception of having his name on the general or supplementary list of registered voters filed by the county registrars in the office of the clerk of the superior court, will not alter his legal status as a voter as above mentioned. The voter's name must appear on a list, general or supplementary, of the county registrars, filed with the clerk of the superior court of the county, showing the registered voters of the county entitled to vote; otherwise such person cannot vote. Counsel contending for the opposite view call our attention to an expression frequently used heretofore by this court that "registration adds no qualification to voters, but only serves to identify them as persons entitled to vote." To adopt the view insisted upon manifestly would amount to a nullification of the law in regard to registration. We think that a brief examination of the subject will demonstrate that the contention is not well founded. The expression has been used repeatedly by this court. As far as we are aware, the principle was first announced in the case of McMahon v. Savannah, 66 Ga. 217, 224, 42 Am. Rep. 65. That case was decided at the September term, 1880, of this court, and at that time the general registration laws did not apply to municipalities. In that case certain citizens and taxpayers denied the right of the city of Savannah to require the payment of a poll tax, the taking of an oath, and the like, as requisites to registration. This court said:

"These municipal laws do not add new qualifications to the voter, but are designed to secure the duty citizens may owe the municipal government and to protect the purity of the ballot."

And in the opinion the court said:

"The new requirement of a registration has been held not to be the addition of a qualification, 'to an elector.'"

The right of a person whose name did not appear on a legal list of registered voters was not involved. In the case of Mayor, etc., of Madison v. Wade, 88 Ga. 699, 16 S. E. 21, the expression was used. In that case also the question of the right of a person to vote whose name did not appear on a legal list of registration was not involved. In that case the General Assembly had empowered the city of Madison to require a special registration of persons qualified to vote at any corporate election, and therefore at an election to approve a local school tax, which was the election involved in the case. No ordinance comprehensive enough to include this latter election had been passed when the election was held. The election managers confined the vote to the persons whose names appeared on a registration list made under an existing ordinance applicable to a previous election of a different kind. The submission was not to the whole body of the legal electors. The existing registration applied only to the election of municipal officers. This court affirmed the judgment of the lower court, to the effect that the election was illegal, and, with reference to the fact that the names of those voting appeared on the list of registered voters which was not applicable to that election, said:

"Registration adds no qualification to voters, but only serves to identify them as persons qualified to vote."

The expression was again used in Davis v. City Council of Dawson, 90 Ga. 817, 17 S. E. 110, and there no question was involved as to the right of a person to vote whose name did not appear on a legal list of registered voters. In that case the General Assembly had provided for a system of registration applicable to municipal elections in the city of Dawson. There was also a system of registration applicable to the county of Terrell, which had no application to municipal elections in the city of Dawson. At an election held in the city of Dawson the managers rejected the ballots of persons duly registered for the city election, and otherwise qualified to vote, simply because they had not registered in accordance with the provisions of the county registration act. This court held that to be illegal, and that it was not the purpose of the law to have two distinct and separate systems of registration operating upon the same election. The principle was again stated in Floyd County v. State, 112 Ga. at page 794, 38 S. E. 37. In that case the question was whether two-thirds of the qualified voters of the county of Floyd had assented to the issuance of bonds; and the controlling question was how, under the law, the court, in a proceeding to validate the bonds, was to determine what constituted two thirds of the qualified voters. On the hearing it was agreed that the total number of votes favorable to the issue of bonds was less than two-thirds of the number of voters whose names appeared on the lists of registration of voters had for the county, but more than two-thirds of the number of votes cast at the last general election held in the county. In this case, which was decided at the October term, 1900, the case of Mayor, etc., of Madison v. Wade, supra, was cited, and it was again noted that the general registration laws did not apply to elections held in cities and towns; and it was held that reference to the registration lists must be had to determine what was two-thirds of the qualified voters where there was a system of registration in operation. The question of the right of a person to vote whose name did not appear on any legal registration list was not involved. The expression was again used in Garrett v. Cowart, 149 Ga. at page 564, 101 S. E. 186. There the question was whether one whose name appeared on the registration list illegally, because of a failure to pay all taxes required of him under the law, was a legal voter. It was of course held that such a person was not a qualified voter. While it is the law that one must have his name on a list of qualified voters in order to entitle him to vote, manifestly, if the name of such a person appears on the list illegally or fraudulently, it would be the same as if the name did not appear on the list. In other words, the converse of the proposition is not true. The Constitution and the laws of the state declare what things are necessary and requisite as a qualification for voting, such as payment of taxes, signing the oath in the voters' book, residence, and the like. To vote without these qualifications is to vote illegally. To procure the placing of one's name on the registration books without these qualifications is illegal, and if done it adds no qualification, as the statute specifically declares that:

"Each person whose name is upon the registration list * * * shall be entitled to vote, * * * provided that such person is not otherwise disqualified from voting, * * * and provided that no person shall be qualified to vote at any election unless he shall have paid all taxes due at least six months before the same, except when said election is held within six months from the expiration of the time fixed by law for the payment of said taxes." Civil Code 1910, § 59.

Registration is now permanent.

"The tax collectors of the several counties of this state are required to keep a book to be called the permanent qualification book, upon which all persons desiring to qualify as electors shall be required to qualify as now required by the Constitution and laws of the state. Such electors upon qualification shall sign their names in alphabetical order, and shall be subject to examination by the board of registrars as now provided by law. Such board of registrars shall have the right, and shall be charged with the duty of examining each two years the qualification of each elector entered thereon, and shall not be limited or stopped by the action taken at any prior time." Acts 1913, p. 115; Park's Code, § 47(a).

But this does not mean that one lawfully registered, but subsequently disqualified by reason of nonpayment of taxes, or conviction of a crime involving moral turpitude, or other cause of disqualification, continues to be a qualified voter by reason of registration. The list of registered voters is subject to revision, and the elimination of the names of those persons not qualified to vote and whose names are improperly included in the list of registered voters. Civil Code 1910, § 55. Moreover, aside from all that has been said in regard to the cases just mentioned, the question is settled by the Constitution of this state in paragraph 1, § 1, art. 2 (Civil Code, § 6395), and the provisions of the Constitution have been followed by acts of the General Assembly in execution thereof, now found in sections 34, 58, 59, and 69 of the Civil Code, and in the act known as "the Code of School Laws" of the state of Georgia, especially applicable to this case. The Constitution provides as follows:

"After the year 1908, elections by the people shall be by ballot, and only those shall be allowed to vote who have been first registered in accordance with the requirements of law."

In the paragraphs of the Constitution immediately following the one just quoted there is specific provision as to who is entitled to register and vote, and the qualifications of electors. The provisions of the Constitution that no person shall be allowed to vote who has not been "first registered in accordance with the requirements of law" was enacted as statute law, and is found in section 58 of the Civil Code, where it is declared:

"And no person shall vote * * * unless his name is upon the said registration list so filed by said registrars."

Any other conclusion than that the name of the voter must appear on the registry list would render it impossible to legally determine when two-thirds of the registered and qualified voters had assented.

Upon the coming in of his report exceptions were duly taken, and Judge Rice heard the cause on exceptions to referee's report, and overruled the exceptions, and sustained and confirmed the report of the referee. From the decree of Judge Rice, appellants appeal, and by 10 exceptions impute error.

This court has decided in a number of cases—among others, Hickson Lumber Co. v. Stallings, 91 S. C. 473, 74 S. E. 1072, and Leland v. Morrison, 92 S. C. 501, 75 S. E. 889, Ann. In the case at bar, we have the concurring findings of both the special referee and the circuit judge, and the appellants have failed to convince this court that their findings are against the weight of the evidence; and we see no error at all in the decree of his honor.

STATE v. CORBETT. (No. 10719.)

1. Criminal law ¶293—Demurrer to plea of former jeopardy admits facts alleged.

Demurrer to accused's plea of former jeopardy admits the allegations of fact contained therein.

2. Criminal law ¶1067(3)—Upon appeal from overruling of demurrer, unnecessary that testimony be incorporated in record.

Upon appeal from overruling of demurrer to plea, it is unnecessary that testimony taken upon the trial be incorporated in the record.

3. Criminal law ¶293—Demurrer to plea of former acquittal does not admit characterization of facts.

Where accused, having killed three persons in one affray, was separately indicted for murder for each killing, and, on trial upon one indictment, was acquitted, the allegation in his plea of former acquittal to another of the indictments "that the several shots fired by him from the said revolver at said persons at said time and place * * * were actuated and moved by the same and identical impulse, and constituted one single act of volition," was a mere characterization—an inference from the alleged facts—so that demurrer to the plea did not admit that the three homicides were a single act on his part.

4. Criminal law §200(8)—Plea of former acquittal of murder not good as to separate indictment for another killing at same time.

Where accused, having killed three persons in one affray, was separately indicted for murder for each killing, and, on trial upon one indictment, was acquitted, such acquittal was not a bar to prosecution upon one of the other indictments, the accused having committed a separate act against each one killed, nor could accused's claim that his act constituted but one offense be sustained even if the three homicides were a single act on his part, as more than one offense may follow from a single act, and, in any event, Const. art. 1, § 17, prohibits double jeopardy "for the same offense," and not for the same act.

5. Criminal law §297—On overruling demurrer to plea, accused not necessarily entitled to order sustaining plea.

It did not follow from the order overruling demurrer to plea of former acquittal that accused was entitled to an order sustaining his plea, a demurrant being usually accorded the privilege of pleading over.

Watta, J., dissenting.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Orangeburg County; S. W. G. Shipp, Judge.

Carlos Corbett was prosecuted for murder. From the overruling of a demurrer to his plea of former acquittal and an order sustaining the plea, the State appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Paragraph 10 of accused's plea was as follows:

(10) That the several shots fired by him from the said revolver at said persons at said time and place, and under the said circumstances, were actuated and moved by the same and identical impulse and constituted one single act of volition, namely, to do anything and everything against the said three men, to wit, Bryan Salley, Jule Cooper, and Hugh Fanning, to protect his person and habitation against their joint and confederated aggression.

The ruling of Circuit Judge S. W. G. Shipp on motion to direct a verdict on the grounds of previous acquittal in the above-entitled case was as follows:

The defendant in this case sets up the plea of former acquittal, autrefois acquit; he alleges substantially in his plea that he was indicted on March 27, 1920; that heretofore in September, 1920, he was arraigned and pleaded not guilty to the indictment found against him by the grand jury of Orangeburg county charging him with the murder of Bryan Salley on the 27th of March, 1920; that the jury was impaneled and that he was duly acquitted on that charge. He further states that he is now called at the bar of the court to answer to an indictment charging him with the murder of one Julian Cooper on the 27th of March, 1920; he alleges that he was in former jeopardy in the trial for the murder of Bryan Salley because he alleges the evidence necessary to prove the charge against him for the murder of Julian Cooper would be the same evidence as was used against him in the case charging him with the murder of Bryan Salley. He goes on in his plea to state that at his former trial it was in evidence that at his home in his front yard on the night of March 27, 1920, he fired several shots in quick succession at three men, mentioning them, Bryan Salley, Julian Cooper, and Hugh Fanning; that these three parties were making an attack upon him jointly in his own yard, and that he shot from the necessity of defending and protecting his life and home. He further alleges that the act in shooting at these three men, alleged aggressors, constituted one act and one volition; that he shot at no particular one, but was endeavoring to protect himself and his home against aggression; that he killed all three of these men at one time and that it was in pursuance of one act and one volition.

The defendant further alleges that all of these facts came out in the trial for his killing Bryan Salley, and that at that trial three issues were submitted to the jury who tried the case; that three theories were presented to the jury. The three theories that he sets up in his plea are: (1) That the defendant purposely fired at and killed Bryan Salley with malice; (2) that the defendant fired at Julian Cooper and Hugh Fanning, and missing them killed Salley; (3) that with a reckless disregard of human life the defendant fired at the three men, killing them. He says that those three issues were submitted to the jury, and that he was duly acquitted by the jury, and he alleges that the action of the jury in acquitting him is the equivalent to finding that he was excusable in the act that he committed on that occasion. That is substantially what he alleges.

When a defendant puts in a special plea of former acquittal or former conviction, two courses are open to the state: The state may traverse the plea by denying the allegations thereof, and the question would then be one of fact to be tried by a jury, or the state may demur to the plea, and then it becomes a question of law; not a fact for the consideration of the jury, but a question of law for the court. When the defendant demurs to a paper, that is an admission of the facts stated in the paper; it is not an admission of any legal conclusions, but it is an admission of the truth of any fact pleaded in the paper that is properly pleaded. That is held in the case of State v. De Wees, 76 S. C. 74, 56 S. E. 674, 11 Ann. Cas. 991.

In considering a question of former acquittal it involves a consideration of the record. Two indictments involved in the case are made a part of the plea and a part of the demurrer; that is for the consideration of the court. The court considers the record, the indictments, and it also considers partially in a question of fact, where there is the allegation in the plea that it is the same act, the same transaction, and the same volition; that is a question of fact. If the indictment shows that the offenses charged are so distinct and separate that, notwithstanding the demurrer on the part of the state, if the indictment shows that the charges were so separate and distinct, notwithstanding the admissions, the court comes to the conclusion that they are separate and distinct, the court would have to sustain the demurrer. That involves a question of fact; still, if the indictment shows on its face that it could not result from the same act, the state would lose nothing by the demurrer. If on the other hand there can be shown, or if they might have been the result of the same act, that is an admission on the part of the state.

It is unfortunate that in South Carolina the Supreme Court of this state has never ruled on the precise question in this case in any similar case. The state relies on the case of the State v. Thurston, 2 McMul. 382, in which it was held that the indictments in the Thurston Case were so separate and distinct, that notwithstanding the admissions by the demurrer, the court was justified in holding that the offenses charged were not the same act. An examination of the Thurston Case shows—and I have not had as much time to examine these cases as I would like to have had, because I have to rule promptly—an examination of the Thurston Case shows that the indictment in that case involved the question of larceny; where a person is charged with the stealing of goods belonging to A. he cannot be convicted for the stealing of goods belonging to B. That is true, of course, because to convict of larceny, you have to prove the owner is not a different person, the very nature of the ownership or the possession of the property, and where the case could not be the result of one act. It remains to be seen that where a person kills two persons, that may be shown to be the result of the same act.

Counsel for the state has cited the case of State v. Evans, 33 W. Va. 417, 10 S. E. 792, a West Virginia case. An examination of the Evans Case shows that the plea was not set out in that case, and I have not the benefit of knowing exactly what was alleged in the special plea set up. The court held in that case that it could not be one act, because the circumstances alleged showed that there was aggravation from one separate and distinct from the other. The judge who rendered the opinion stated that he could conceive of a case in which the principal might apply, and he cited the case referred to by Mr. Raysor where an engineer was charged with killing a number of people through the negligent running of a train, and the plea interposed was that it was accidental; he was charged with the murder of one of the passengers, and the jury rendered the verdict of acquittal, and it was held that that was an adjudication, and no further criminal liability attached, and he could not be held for the death of other passengers resulting from the same act.

It is recognized by the court that there may be cases where a person may kill more than one person as the result of the same act. That is one case. I can conceive of another case; a sheriff is charged with the custody and with the safety of the prisoners in jail; he stands there for the purpose of protecting those prisoners; an attack is made on him, and he kills ten men, and he is called for trial for the killing of one of the ten men; he sets up the defense that he killed the ten men in the discharge of his official duty; that a mob came there for the purpose of taking the prisoners from the jail, and in defense of their lives he took the life of ten men who were killed. He is tried for killing one of those men, and that question is submitted to the jury, and the jury say he is not guilty; that he was excusable in taking life. There is one act and one purpose to protect the prisoner; that is an adjudication the sheriff acted within the law. There is an instance where the sheriff shot repeatedly, but it was from one design and one purpose, and an adjudication in one case would be an adjudication in all.

No one can testify as to the intent of a person. I cannot testify as to what is in the mind of any other man, but I can testify as to my own intent, and the only person who can testify as to the intent of any person is that person himself. We have in this paper here, admitted by the demurrer, the declaration of the defendant under oath that he had one purpose and one intent, and that was to defend himself against his aggressors. It has been held in a number of cases that the defendant may testify as to his purpose and intent. That is the only evidence we have in the case, and that is admitted by the demurrer.

I am sorry that the state admitted these facts in the demurrer. I am called on to rule on this paper with an admission on behalf of the state; it becomes a question of law, and I am bound; I could not rule otherwise with this admission of intent, the admission of one purpose and one act; I could not rule otherwise than that the demurrer must be overruled in the case, and therefore it becomes a question of law, and it being admitted that the killing of the three men was the result of one impulse, and it being alleged that it was done in defense of the defendant's home and person, I cannot say that that does not state a proper defense.

I will have to overrule the demurrer, and, for the reasons stated above, the demurrer is overruled.

T. M. Rayson, A. H. Moss, and A. J. Hydrick, all of Orangeburg, for the State.

Wolfe & Berry, of Orangeburg, Cole L. Blease, of Columbia, M. L. Smith, of Camden, J. L. Dukes, of Orangeburg, J. H. Fanning, of Springfield, and B. J. Wingard, of Lexington, for respondent.

COTHRAN, J. At the May term of the court of general sessions for Orangeburg county true bills, upon separate indictments, were returned against the defendant, charging him with the murders, respectively, of Bryan Salley, Julian Cooper, and Hugh Fanning, on March 27, 1920. At the September term he was tried upon the indictment charging him with the murder of Bryan Salley, and was acquitted. At the following January term he was called for trial upon the indictment charging him with the murder of Julian Cooper. He thereupon filed a plea of former acquittal, based upon the proposition that the three homicides, resulting from a single act, intent, impulse, and volition, constituted but one offense, and that, having been acquitted of any criminality in connection therewith, as evidenced by his acquittal as stated, he was entitled to be discharged.

To this plea the state demurred, upon the ground that the indictment in the case in which the acquittal occurred and that in the case at bar show that the offenses charged in the two indictments are distinct and different, and require proof of distinct and different facts.

The circuit judge heard argument upon the plea and the demurrer, and orally announced his ruling (which is incorporated in the record and should also be in the report) overruling the demurrer. He then passed a formal order, rectifying the fact that he had overruled the demurrer, and adjudging that the plea of former acquittal be sustained. From said ruling and order the state appeals.

[1] Upon the presentation of the plea two courses were open to the state: To traverse the plea, or to demur. The state adopted the latter course, and the legal effect thereof was to admit the allegations of fact contained in the plea. State v. De Wees, 76 S. C. 74, 56 S. E. 674, 11 Ann. Cas. 991.

[2] The question at issue must therefore be decided upon the plea, the demurrer, and the two indictments, without reference to the testimony taken upon the trial which has been had. It was unnecessary and improper that this testimony be incorporated in the record for this appeal. The exceptions of the state to the order of the circuit judge striking out this testimony in settling the case for appeal are therefore dismissed.

The main facts, pertinent to the present inquiry, alleged in the plea and admitted by the demurrer, are the following, omitting those already stated herein and certain argumentative statements therein:

On the night of March 27, 1920, while the defendant was in his front yard, several men, among whom were Bryan Salley, Julian Cooper, and Hugh Fanning, advanced upon him; that in self-defense, to protect his person and habitation from their joint and confederated attack, the defendant fired at them several times with an automatic revolver, firing as rapidly as the pistol would fire, not aiming particularly at any one of them, but shooting at them one and all, whereby the three men named were instantly killed; that in said shooting the defendant was actuated and moved by the same and identical impulse, a single act of volition to do anything and everything against said three men to protect his person and habitation against their joint and confederated aggression.

The validity of the defendant's plea of former acquittal depends upon a solution of the following questions, battle ground upon which the defendant has pitched this controversy:

(1) Were the three homicides a single act on the part of the defendant?

(2) If the three homicides were a single act on the part of the defendant, is he entitled to claim that the act constituted but one offense?

It is apparent that if each homicide was a separate act, then necessarily each act constituted a distinct and separate offense; or if the three homicides were a single act from which distinct and separate results flowed, each homicide was a separate offense.

1. Were the three homicides a single act on the part of the defendant?

[3] The defendant so alleges in his plea, and now contends that the state by its demurrer has admitted that to be a fact. We do not so regard the demurrer. The allegation in the plea is nothing more than a characterization, in the interest of the defendant—an inference favorable to him, which he draws from certain alleged facts; the issue is one of law, therefore, not of fact; and a demurrer admits only facts.

As is declared by the court in State v. De Wees, 76 S. C. 75, 56 S. E. 675, 11 Ann. Cas. 991:

"If the two indictments charged offenses which in their nature are so separate and distinct as to be incapable of legal identity, then defendant's allegation that they charged the same offense would not make it so, since the demurrer only admits the facts properly pleaded."

So here, when the defendant alleges the circumstances of the affray; that the three men and another were advancing upon him; that he shot them down, inferentially, one at a time; that he fired his pistol as rapidly as it would turn the cylinder; that he was determined to do anything and everything to stop their confederated aggression, which of course included as many shots and reloadings as might be necessary—it is not for him to decide or for the state to admit by its demurrer, that such intense, determined, continuous, and effective warfare, defensive though it may have been, was a single act.

Assume as we must that the defendant acted not in malice or in the hot blood of aggravation and exasperation, but in defense of his home and person, a circumstance which goes to the merits of his defense, and not to the discussion of the question whether or not his shooting down three men with separate shots was a single act, the circumstances cry out against his favorable interpretation. His purpose, as he states, was to halt this confederated aggression; at least four men were advancing upon him; he had a pistol as his weapon of defense; he knew that it fired only one shot at a time, he could not possibly kill all four at one shot; he necessarily, therefore, predetermined to fire at least four times, each firing being a separate act, and each, as events developed, followed by the fall of a man. The admitted facts, aside from the argumentative characterization of the shooting as a single act, show a predetermined and pursued series of acts, to shoot, and shoot, and shoot; to do "anything and everything against the three men * * * to protect his person and habitation." We are concerned here with what he did, not with the purpose; and in the attempted justification of his conduct he reveals the character of his conduct as a series of acts, and not a single act.

[4] The authorities are simply overwhelming that under the circumstances stated the defendant was guilty of a separate crime (if a crime) against each one of his victims, and that the acquittal of one charge is not a bar to a further prosecution.

"But when one assaults or kills two persons by separate strokes, although in the same riot or affray, one acquittal or conviction of one assault or homicide is no bar to an indictment for the other, as they are distinct acts." 12 Cyc. 289.

In Gunter v. State, 111 Ala. 23, 20 South. 632, 56 Am. St. Rep. 17, the court declared:

"If, in the same affray, one person shoots and kills one person, and by a second act shoots and wounds another, in such case the two results, the killing of the one and the wounding of the other, by different acts of shooting, cannot be said to grow out of the same unlawful act, but out of two distinct acts, and the party shooting is responsible for the two results from the two separate acts, and may be indicted and punished separately for each."

In Bell v. State, 120 Ark. 530, 180 S. W. 186, the defendant was incensed with the sister of his wife, her husband, her father, and her brother, on account of their alleged participation in the separation of himself and wife. He determined to exterminate the entire family; armed with a repeating shotgun he went to their home, and in turn killed each one. It was one intent, one volition, one transaction, one impulse. He was convicted of the murder of the husband and sentenced to life imprisonment. Upon the trial for the killing of his wife's sister, he pleaded former conviction. The court said:

"The court did not err in overruling appellant's plea of former conviction. The conviction of appellant at a former term of the court for the crime of murdering Eard Bearden was a conviction for an entirely separate offense than that of the murder of Abbie Bearden. The proof shows that the killings were not simultaneous; that they were not the result of one shot, but were the result of entirely separate acts. The question as to whether the murder of two persons by the same act would constitute but one offense is not presented. Therefore a conviction in one of the cases could not be set up in bar of a prosecution for the other."

In Morris v. Territory, 1 Okl. Cr. 617, 99 Pac. 760, the defendant claimed to have been attacked by father and son, and that in self-defense he killed them both, shooting as fast as he could with a shotgun and a pistol. The father was killed by shots from the gun; the son, from the pistol, not more than 30 seconds later; the transaction was one; the intent, purpose, volition, impulse, were one. The defendant was acquitted of the murder of the father, and pleaded that acquittal as a bar to the indictment for killing the son. The court, upon full discussion of the subject, ruled, quoting from the syllabus:

"If in the same affray a person shoots and kills one person, and by a second shot kills another person, he may be separately prosecuted for killing each of them, and may be properly acquitted in one case and convicted in the other."

In Com. v. Anderson, 169 Ky. 372, 183 S. W. 898, the defendant, in an alleged effort to defend himself against a confederated attack by two brothers, rapidly firing, killed one of them and wounded the other. He was acquitted of murder in the one case, and to a separate indictment for assault upon the other brother pleaded former acquittal. The court refused to sustain the plea, holding:

"But we have been unable to find any case holding that where, by two separate and distinct acts of the defendant, two separate and distinct offenses were committed, they could in any sense be called 'the same offense' as is required to successfully invoke the constitutional provision. The fact that these two distinct offenses were committed in close proximity as to time, and while engaged in one affray, cannot be allowed to unify the two offenses, when as a matter of fact they are not so. The time intervening between the commission of the two offenses can have no effect on the case whatever"—citing 12 Cyc. 289, and many cases from Kentucky; Keeton v. Com., 91 Ky. 522, 18 S. W. 359; Com. v. Browning, 146 Ky. 770, 143 S. W. 407.

The case of Com. v. Browning, 146 Ky. 770, 143 S. W. 407, cited in the Anderson Case, is stronger for the defendant than the Anderson Case or the case at bar, and while we are not called upon to approve its conclusions, the facts are interesting in this connection and its reasoning instructive. In that case the defendant with one shot from a pistol wounded two men with whom he was engaged in a fight. Defendant was convicted of assault upon one of the men, and to a separate indictment for assault upon the other he pleaded former conviction. The court overruled the plea, saying:

"Manifestly, appellee, if first tried for the shooting and wounding of Caywood, could not be convicted on proof that he shot Stewart, though both Caywood and Stewart were wounded by one and the same shot. As well might it be argued that, in the killing of several of the same family by putting poison in the food eaten by them, conviction of the prisoner for the death of one of them would bar a prosecution for the killing of the others. * * *

"The offenses committed by appellee were not included within one another, though resulting from the same act, but were separate and distinct offenses. Therefore he was not protected by section 13, Bill of Rights, against a prosecution for either by a conviction or acquittal for one of them."

In Keeton v. Com., 91 Ky. 522, 18 S. W. 359, it was held, quoting from the syllabus:

"Presenting a pistol at two persons at the same time, coupled with a demand of their property, and compelling a surrender thereof by both at the same time, constitutes distinct offenses against them—an assault on and robbery of each."

In Kelley v. State, 43 Tex. Cr. R. 40, 62 S. W. 915, the defendant and the two De Walt brothers were working in adjoining fields, a wire fence separating them; one of the De Walts accused defendant of sending a valentine reflecting upon their sister; hot words ensued, and the two De Walts made for the defendant, and as they were in the act of breaking down the strands of wire to cross the fence to attack the defendant, he fired, killing one and wounding the other. He was tried for the murder of the one killed, and acquitted; upon the trial for assaulting the other, he pleaded former acquittal. The court held that the plea was insufficient.

In Augustine v. State, 41 Tex. Cr. R. 59, 52 S. W. 77, 96 Am. St. Rep. 765, the defendant was one of a mob which fired at and killed two men, they being killed by different shots from different members of the mob. The defendant was acquitted of the murder of the one whom he had not shot, and upon trial for the murder of the other, whom he had shot, he pleaded former acquittal. The court overruled the plea, saying:

"But here the testimony shows that the parties were killed by distinct acts. Mr. Bishop says: 'Obviously, there is a difference between one volition and one transaction, and on the view of our combined authorities there is little room for denial that in one transaction a man may commit distinct offenses of assault or homicide upon different persons, and be separately punished for each.'"

In State v. Robinson, 12 Wash. 491, 41 Pac. 884, the defendant in an affray killed two men, Schultz and Smith; he was acquitted of the murder of Schultz, and then, upon trial for the murder of Smith, he pleaded former acquittal. We quote at length from the interesting opinion of the court:

"It follows that, if the killing of each of the men constituted a distinct crime, there was no proof tending to show that the appellant had been formerly acquitted of the crime alleged to have been committed in the killing of Smith. The fact that the same line of proof was introduced for the purpose of showing that he was guilty of the killing of Schultz as that introduced to show his guilt in the killing of Smith would in no manner tend to show that an acquittal for the killing of the former would constitute an acquittal for the killing of the latter, if the killing of each was a distinct crime. That such proofs in reference to two prosecutions for the commission of a single offense would be proper to go to a jury upon the question of former acquittal or conviction is beyond question, but to us it seems equally clear that proof which was necessary and competent to convict of one crime would have no weight upon such question in the prosecution for another, even although the same criminalizing circumstances were relied upon in the latter as in the former case. Was the killing of each of these men a distinct crime? They were killed in a single affray, and the connection of the appellant was substantially the same in his relations to such affray, as it related to each of such men. If the result of the meeting at which the two were killed had been the death of only one of them, a prosecution for murder could have been founded upon his death, and under the circumstances of this case this would have been true whether the one so killed had been Schultz or Smith; and there can be no good reason why that which would have warranted a prosecution for murder should lose force by reason of the fact that another circumstance, which in itself would warrant such a prosecution, occurred at the same time and place. If the prosecution had been founded upon the killing of the two, and the case had gone to trial upon a plea of not guilty, proof of the killing of either of them would have warranted a conviction. It follows that the killing of each was, so far as the homicide was concerned, a distinct transaction. The taking of a human life with certain intent constitutes murder, and neither law nor public policy will justify a holding that each life is of less value when taken with another than it would be if taken alone. If a person without justification intends to kill A. and does so, he will be guilty of a crime; if he intends to kill B., he will be guilty of another and a different crime; and the fact that he entertains the intent to kill both, and carries such intent into effect at the same time and place, should not be held to make of that which would otherwise be a foundation for two distinct prosecutions a foundation for only one. In our opinion, the undisputed proofs, when interpreted in the light of the law which it was the duty of the court to find, clearly showed that the appellant had never been on trial for the killing of Smith."

In Winn v. State, 82 Wis. 571, 52 N. W. 775, the defendant had an altercation with one De Foy in a saloon, and was assaulted by him; he went home, secured a pistol, and returned; De Foy was on the sidewalk with others, including one Coates; the defendant snapped his pistol at De Foy, and in the struggle to disarm him the pistol was discharged, killing Coates; the defendant was acquitted of the murder of Coates, and was then indicted for the assault on De Foy; he pleaded former acquittal. The court disallowed the plea, holding:

"The rule is that the offenses charged in two indictments are not identical unless they concur both in law and in fact, and that the plea of autrefois acquit or convict is had if the offenses charged in the two indictments be distinct in law, no matter how closely they are connected in fact. In order to determine whether there is a concurrence in law, that is, whether a conviction or acquittal on one indictment is a good bar to a prosecution on another, the true inquiry is whether the first indictment was such that the accused might have been convicted under it by proof of the facts alleged in the other indictment. If he could not, the conviction or acquittal under the first indictment is no bar. The result of an application of this test to the present inquiry is obvious. Winn could not have been convicted of the murder of Coates merely upon proof that he made a felonious assault upon De Foy. Proof that he killed Coates would also be required. Hence an acquittal on the information charging the murder of Coates is no bar to this information for a felonious assault on De Foy, and the special plea was properly overruled."

In a note to Roberts v. State (Ga.) 58 Am. Dec. 540, Judge Freeman says:

"When same act constitutes two or more distinct offenses, each is separately indictable. The defendant may be separately punished for each offense, and an acquittal, or conviction, or pardon, of one of these distinct offenses is no bar to the prosecution of the others. [Citing cases.] And the test will here apply. In each case the plea of autrefois acquit or convict is bad, because the facts of the two offenses are different. The proof of the allegations of the second indictment would not secure a legal conviction under the allegations of the first. A well-settled example of this—of two offenses distinct from each other, arising from the same act—occurs when the criminal act affects two different persons"—citing State v. Fife, 1 Bailey, 1.

Further the learned annotator observes:

"So where the defendant, by his act, injures in fact two or more persons, though it be accomplished in the same transaction, yet as many distinct offenses are committed. The facts of one are materially variant from those of the other. Such is the case where two or more persons are shot at the same time."

We conclude, therefore, that the killing of Bryan Salley physically could not have been the same act as that which took the life of Julian Cooper, and that the law, so far from compelling a disregard of what we know the fact to have been, is in harmony with the dictates of reason, physical laws, and common sense.

2. If the three homicides were a single act on the part of the defendant, is he entitled to claim that the act constituted but one offense?

Assuming, however, for the sake of argument that the defendant's contention in this regard may be sustained, it by no means follows necessarily that but a single offense has been committed. On the contrary, the rule in this state is that under certain circumstances more than one offense may follow from a single act.

In State ex rel. Burton v. Williams, 11 S. C. 292, the court declared:

"And of the other result—that of subjecting an offender to two punishments for the same act, not the same offense—it may be said that it is not so monstrous as might at first be supposed, inasmuch as we find that our own courts have decided that for the same act a man may be twice punished, because by the one act he has violated two distinct statutes of the state, committed two distinct offenses, and is therefore liable to two distinct punishments."

In State v. Switzer, 65 S. C. 187, 43 S. E. 513, the court says:

"It is not sound to say unqualifiedly that more than one criminal offense cannot be predicated upon a single act; for when a single act combines the requisite ingredients of two distinct offenses, the defendant may be separately indicted and punished for each, as shown in State v. Taylor, 2 Bailey, 49, and State v. Thurston, 2 McM. 395."

In State v. Thurston, 2 McM. 382, the defendant was charged in three separate indictments with having stolen at the same time cotton belonging to three separate individuals. The act, intent, and volition was one and the same. The court held (quoting from syllabus):

"That the cotton so stolen by the defendant belonged to three different individuals, and he was very properly indicted in three cases, and a conviction in one case was no bar to a conviction in the two others. The stealing of the goods of different persons is always a distinct larceny."

In State v. Sonnerkalb, 2 Nott & McC. 280, the defendant raised the question of being liable to two indictments for separate offenses both growing out of a single act. The court said:

"But let it be admitted that the defendant committed physically but one act; two offenses may be committed by one act, even at the common law; a person fires a gun, kills one, and wounds another; if he escapes for the homicide (that is, if his life be not taken), he may be indicted for the assault on the other; or suppose he severely wounded two, he may be indicted for two assaults."

In Hellams v. Switzer, 24 S. C. 39, the action was brought by several plaintiffs severally owning land claiming damages on account of a dam of the defendant. The court held that they could not maintain a joint action; that their injuries were several. The opinion contains this statement pertinent to the pending issue:

"The principal underlying is that it is not the act, but the consequences, which are looked at. Thus, if two persons are injured by the same stroke, the act is one, but it is the consequences of that act, and not the act itself, which is redressed; and therefore the injury is several."

In a full note by Judge Freeman to People v. McDaniels (Cal.) 92 Am. St. Rep. 120, he points out the two lines of decisions in reference to a single act causing death to two or more persons, placing this state in line with others holding that two offenses have been committed, though rather leaning to the opposite holding. He points out very clearly, however, that whatever doubt may exist upon that proposition there is none where more than one act has been committed. He says:

"If one shot is fired and injures two people, there is, as we have seen, a conflict of authority as to the possibility of separate and successive prosecutions. But where several shots are fired, each injuring one person, the mere propinquity, in point of time or action, of the two assaults does not make them a single assault, and all the authorities agree in holding that there may in such a case be as many prosecutions as there were assaults."

A familiar illustration of the rule is where the single act is a separate and distinct offense under municipal, state, and federal statutes, or where the single act is a distinct infraction of more than one state statute. Surely if a single sale of liquor may constitute three statutory offenses, or if a single act of theft may constitute more than one offense, a single murderous shot may constitute a separate offense as to each human being whose life is cut short. If a malpracticing physician in producing an abortion should cause the death of the mother and of the child breathing after its forced birth, can there be a question that from his single act, actuated and moved by a single intent, impulse, and volition, there would spring three separate offenses?

If, the act being single, only one offense has been committed, the rule should apply to civil actions as well as to criminal prosecutions; and yet we do not apprehend that, if the defendant should have prevailed in an action by the administrator of Bryan Salley for damages on account of his alleged wrongful death, he could defeat a similar action by the administrator of Julian Cooper upon the ground of former adjudication; or that that rule would apply in the case of a negligent collision at a railroad crossing by which the lives of several persons were lost. It would indeed be anomalous to hold in the criminal prosecution that the act was single, and only one offense was committed, and in the civil actions the act was single and several offenses (civil) were committed; the plea of former adjudication being sustained in the one case and denied in the other upon opposite conclusions from the identical state of facts.

Mr. Van Fleet in his work on Former Adjudication, vol. 3, par. 622, states that the rule that, if several persons are injured in person or property by the same act, there is but one offense, is maintained in the courts of several states named, but that the contrary is held in Arkansas, California, Kentucky, New York, South Carolina, and Virginia.

There is another view of this question which, however, it is really not necessary to discuss, in view of the foregoing conclusions, but which is equally fatal to the defendant's plea. The constitutional provision invoked is:

"Nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or liberty." Const. art. 1, § 17.

Note that the identity of the offense, and not of the act, is referred to. Hence, in order to claim the benefit of this protection it must be made to appear that the latter indictment contains a charge of the same offense of which the defendant may have previously been acquitted or convicted.

From a common-sense, layman's view there could be no hesitation in saying that the first indictment charges the murder of Bryan Salley, one distinct crime; the second, of Julian Cooper, another distinct crime. But we are expected to throw to the winds this chart and compass, and be guided by a strained technicality of the law. The law does not compel this conclusion. In determining the question of the identity of the offenses, the law prescribes the following test:

In State v. Glasgow, Dud. 40, the court declares:

"The test by which the question is to be determined, whether a former conviction is a bar to another prosecution, is this: Would the evidence necessary to support the second indictment have been sufficient to procure a legal conviction on the first?"

The same test is applied in the case of State v. Thurston, 2 McM. 382, and in State v. Risher, 1 Rich. (S. C.) 219, in practically the identical terms. In State v. Parish, 8 Rich. (S. C.) 322, the court declared (referring to former conviction):

"To constitute this a good defense the offense must be identical or necessarily included the one within the other."

In State v. Jenkins, 20 S. C. 351, the court lays this down as the test:

"Could the accused have been convicted at the first trial and under the first indictment of the offense charged in either of the other two? * * * If, then, the accused could not, under any circumstances, have been convicted of the present offense in the former trial, how then can it be said that upon the present trial he has been put in jeopardy twice for the same offense?"

In State v. Switzer, 65 S. C. 187, 43 S. E. 513, the court says:

"In determining whether both indictments charged the same offense, the test generally applied is 'whether the evidence necessary to support the second indictment would have been sufficient to procure a legal conviction upon the first.'"

In State v. Switzer, 65 S. C. 191, 43 S. E. 513, it is held that the plea of former acquittal must be sustained when it appears that the offense charged in the second indictment is not legally distinct from that in the first.

In State v. Van Buren, 86 S. C. 297, 68 S. E. 568, the court declares:

"The test laid down as useful and generally adequate, though not infallible, by which it may be decided whether two indictments charge the same offense, is: 'Would the evidence necessary to support the second indictment have been sufficient to procure a legal conviction upon the first?'"

In State v. Rodgers, 100 S. C. 77, 84 S. E. 304, the same test was applied as in the case of State v. Jenkins, 20 S. C. 351.

In Burton v. United States, 202 U. S. 344, 26 Sup. Ct. 688, 50 L. Ed. 1057, 6 Ann. Cas. 362, it is said:

"A plea of autrefois acquit must be upon a prosecution for the same identical offense. 4 Bl. 336. It must appear that the offense charged, using the words of Chief Justice Shaw, 'was the same in law and in fact. The plea will be vicious, if the offenses charged in the two indictments be perfectly distinct in point of law, however nearly they may be connected in fact.'"

In Ebeling v. Morgan, 237 U. S. 625, 35 Sup. Ct. 710, 59 L. Ed. 1151, it is said:

"The principle applied in Gavieres v. United States, 220 U. S. 338, is applicable, where this court held that, when in the same course of conduct, and upon the same occasion, certain rude and boisterous language was used, and an officer insulted, two offenses were committed, separate in their character, and this, notwithstanding the transaction was one and the same. The principle stated by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts in Morey v. Commonwealth, 108 Mass. 433, was applied, where it was held that a conviction upon one indictment would not bar a conviction and sentence upon another indictment, if the evidence required to support the one would not have been sufficient to warrant the conviction upon the other without proof of an additional fact."

In Morgan v. Devine, 237 U. S. 632, 35 Sup. Ct. 712, 59 L. Ed. 1153, it is said, quoting from Bishop:

"The test is whether, if what is set out in the second indictment had been proved under the first, there could have been a conviction; when there could, the second cannot be maintained; when there could not, it can be."

In Blair v. State, 81 Ga. 629, 7 S. E. 855, the rule is thus stated:

"If the evidence required to convict under the first indictment would not be sufficient to convict under the second indictment, but proof of an additional fact would be necessary to constitute the offense charged in the second indictment, then the former conviction or acquittal could not be pleaded in bar of the second indictment."

In note to Com. v. Vaughn (Ky.) 45 L. R. A. 858, it is said:

"For this reason, therefore, a conviction of one offense will not bar a prosecution for the other, or entitle the defendant to the plea of former jeopardy, autrefois convict, or autrefois acquit, as such plea can only avail a defendant who has already been convicted or acquitted upon the same charge or offense for which he is charged the second time, or, in other words, when the two offenses are identically the same."

In Morey v. Com., 108 Mass. 433, cited with approval in Gavieres v. United States, 220 U. S. 342, 31 Sup. Ct. 422, 55 L. Ed. 489. It is said:

"A conviction or acquittal upon one indictment is no bar to a subsequent conviction and sentence upon another, unless the evidence required to support a conviction upon one of them would have been sufficient to warrant a conviction upon the other. The test is not whether the defendant has already been tried for the same act, but whether he has been put in jeopardy for the same offense."

The Massachusetts case was also cited with approval in Carter v. McClaughry, 183 U. S. 394, 22 Sup. Ct. 193, 46 L. Ed. 236, where the court said:

"The offenses charged under this article were not one and the same offense. This is apparent if the test of the identity of offenses that the same evidence is required to sustain them be applied. The first charge alleged 'a conspiracy to defraud,' and the second charge alleged 'causing false and fraudulent claims to be made,' which were separate and distinct offenses, one requiring certain evidence which the other did not. The fact that both charges related to and grew out of one transaction made no difference."

In Kelley v. United States, 258 Fed. 392, 169 C. C. A. 408, it is said:

"This was in effect a plea of autrefois acquit. Such a plea, however, is unavailing unless the offense presently charged is precisely the same in law and fact as the former one relied on under the plea; thus, as Mr Justice Harlan said (Burton v. United States, 202 U. S. 344, 380, 26 Sup. Ct. 688, 693, 50 L. Ed. 1057, 6 Ann. Cas. 362), in adopting language of Chief Justice Shaw, it must appear that the offense charged 'was the same in law and in fact. The plea will be vicious, if the offenses charged in the two indictments be perfectly distinct in point of law, however nearly they may be connected in fact.' "

In Bens v. United States (C. C. A.) 266 Fed. 152, it is said:

"The prohibition of the Constitution is against a second jeopardy for the 'same offense'; that is, for the identical crime. The offenses charged in the two prosecutions must be the same in law and in fact. Burton v. United States, 202 U. S. 344, 26 Sup. Ct. 688, 50 L. Ed. 1057, 6 Ann. Cas. 392; Thomas v. United States, 156 Fed. 897, 84 C. C. A. 477, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 720, 16 C. J. 263. If the facts which would convict on the second prosecution would not necessarily have convicted on the first, then the first will not be a bar to the second, although the offenses charged may have been committed in the same transaction."

In United States v. Farhat (D. C.) 269 Fed. 33, it is said:

"The test of identity of offenses, when double jeopardy is claimed, is whether the same evidence is required to sustain them. If not, then the fact that both charges relate to and grow out of one transaction does not make a single offense, where two are defined by the statutes."

In People v. Majors, 65 Cal. 138, 3 Pac. 597, 52 Am. Rep. 295, the defendant had counseled and advised another to rob a certain man at his home; the emissary took with him a confederate; they found unexpectedly a friend at the home of the man to be robbed: in the attempt to carry out the design of robbery both the man to be robbed and his friend were killed at the same time by the emissary and his confederates. The defendant was convicted of murder in the case of the man who was to have been robbed, and to an indictment in the case of his friend he pleaded former conviction. The court overruled the plea, saying (quoting from syllabus):

"The murder of two persons constitutes two separate crimes, for each of which a defendant is liable to a separate prosecution and trial, though the killing be by the same act; and a conviction or acquittal in one case does not bar a prosecution in the other on the plea of once in jeopardy."

Applying this test, it must be apparent that the plea must fail. In the first case, the defendant was charged with the murder of Bryan Salley. The state was required to make good the allegation that the defendant took the life of Bryan Salley; it was compelled to prove the corpus delicti. In the second, the same burden was upon it with reference to Julian Cooper, necessarily a difference in the proof. The proof of Cooper's death would not have answered the obligation resting upon the state in the first case to prove the death of Salley and, conversely, the same could be said of the second case.

In People v. Albez, 49 Cal. 452, an indictment charged the defendant with the murder of three persons by the administering of strychnine at the same time. The court arrested the judgment upon the ground that three distinct offenses had been charged in one indictment.

[5] We take occasion to say that it did not necessarily follow from the order overruling the demurrer that the defendant was entitled to an order sustaining his plea of former acquittal. Assimilated to demurrers in civil actions, the demurrer is usually accorded the privilege of answering over; and doubtless this privilege, that of traversing the plea, would have been allowed the state if it had been applied for. In the absence of such a request the defendant was entitled to and the circuit judge was authorized to pass the order in question, subject, of course, to review on appeal.

The judgment of this court is that the order appealed from be reversed, and that the case be remanded to the court of general sessions for Orangeburg county for trial.

EUGENE B. GARY, C. J., FRASER, J., and PRINCE, WILSON, SEASE, FRANK B. Gary, Moore, BOWMAN, TOWNSEND, and PEURIFOY, Circuit Judges, concur in the opinion of COTHRAN, J.

DE VORE and RICE, Circuit Judges, concur in the result.

EUGENE B. GARY, C. J. The defendant was charged in three separate indictments for the murder of Bryan Salley, Julian Cooper, and Hugh Fanning. He was tried under the indictment charging him with the murder of Bryan Salley, and the jury rendered a verdict of not guilty. At the next term of the court, he was called upon to answer to an indictment charging him with the murder of Julian Cooper, and he set up the plea of former jeopardy. It does not appear that a motion was made to consolidate the cases and try them together. If they had been tried at the same time, and the jury had rendered a verdict of not guilty as to the homicide of Bryan Salley alone, the defendant could not again have been placed in jeopardy. But those were not the facts. Having failed to make such motion, he was not in jeopardy for the killing of Julian Cooper when he was only tried for the murder of Bryan Salley.

It would be an anomaly to allow a plea of former acquittal, unless there had been a former trial for the homicide of Julian Cooper.

WATTS, J. For the reasons assigned by Judge Shipp, I think the exceptions should be overruled and the judgment affirmed.

ROBINSON v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE RY. CO. (No. 10746.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 4, 1921.)

1. Trespass ⇐67—Nonsuit for failure to prove title held properly denied.

In an action for trespass in which plaintiff alleged and produced testimony tending to prove that he was in peaceful possession of the land, denial of motion for nonsuit on ground that plaintiff had failed to prove title in himself held proper.

2. Railroads ⇐114(1)—Charter held admissible under general denial in trespass.

In action against a railroad for trespass in construction of track upon land of which plaintiff claimed to be in peaceful and rightful possession, the charter of defendant's predecessor held admissible, under a general denial, to prove defendant's right to the possession of the land for corporate purposes and to disprove the allegations and testimony of the plaintiff to the effect that he was in peaceful and rightful possession of the land.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Sumter County; Edward McIver, Judge.

Action by Frank Robinson against the Atlantic Coast Line Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Exceptions referred to in opinion follow:

1. The court erred in refusing to grant a nonsuit at the close of plaintiff's testimony for the reasons stated in the ground of said motion, which was as follows:

The defendant moves for a nonsuit on the ground that as this action alleges an injury to the title by the absolute taking of possession of part of the land alleged to be the land of the plaintiff and is not a mere action of trespass against the possession of the land, it was necessary for the plaintiff to prove his title, and this he has failed to do.

2. The court erred in holding that this was an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, that the defendant, not having pleaded title in itself in its answer, could not justify its entry under a claim of title, and on these grounds refusing to admit in evidence the charter of the Wilmington & Manchester Railroad Company offered by the defendant as the title of its predecessor and under which it claimed.

3. The court erred in refusing to allow the defendant to offer in evidence the charter of the Wilmington & Manchester Railroad Company, its predecessor in title, for the reason that the defendant was entitled as against the plaintiff alleging possession, to show under its answer pleading a general denial that it was in possession for railroad purposes at the time of the alleged trespass, and that any use which plaintiff was making of the property at that time was not inconsistent with defendant's possession for railroad purposes under the original charter.

4. The court erred in refusing to admit in evidence the charter of the Wilmington & Manchester Railroad Company when offered by the defendant as the title of its predecessor, for the reason that it was not necessary in this case for the defendant to plead title in itself in order to be allowed to introduce such charter in evidence.

5. The court erred in holding that after the plaintiff withdrew his claim for punitive damages, the defendant was not entitled to introduce in evidence the charter of the Wilmington & Manchester Railroad Company to show that its entry on the land was not done in a willful and wanton way, for the reason that since a plaintiff is entitled, upon proof of willfulness, to recover both actual and punitive damages, the withdrawal of the claim for punitive damages did not destroy the cause of action for willfulness, and the defendant had the right to introduce evidence as to the claim under which it entered, for the purpose of defeating the recovery of actual damages on the cause of action for willfulness.

6. The court erred in refusing to direct a verdict in favor of the defendant for the reasons stated in the grounds of said motion, which were as follows:

(1) Because the plaintiff fails to show title in himself.

(2) Because no demand for the possession was ever alleged to have been made, or was ever made, upon the defendant.

(3) Because no damages recoverable in an action in the nature of a trespass quare clausum fregit have been proven in this case.

7. The court erred in refusing defendant's motion for a new trial, for the reasons stated in the grounds thereof, which were as follows:

(1) The verdict of the jury was excessive and against the weight of the evidence, both the testimony of the witnesses and the actual inspection of the premises.

(2) The action was not brought for the value of the land claimed to have been trespassed upon, as for a perpetual ouster of plaintiff, but was for damages for a willful tort in committing the acts alleged in the complaint, and it was error to permit the jury to consider and assess damages as for a taking of the land in question.

(3) It was error to hold that the action was in the nature of quare clausum fregit, and therefore and thereupon to exclude the evidence offered by defendant of its right to an easement over the land for railroad purposes, and thereafter as the applicable measure of damages in the case permit the jury to consider and find a verdict for plaintiff as for the actual taking of the land in question by an ascertainment of the difference in value of the entire tract before and after the construction of the track.

(4) Plaintiff was not in possession of the land within the limits of the original right of way of the Wilmington & Manchester Railroad Company as against the defendant, because there was no evidence (or, if there was, it was for the jury to pass upon) that any use which plaintiff may have made thereof was inconsistent with its possession by defendant for railroad purposes under the original charter, and defendant was entitled as against plaintiff alleging possession, to show under its answer pleading a general denial that it was in possession for railroad purposes at the time of the alleged trespass.

P. A. Willcox and H. E. Davis, both of Florence, and L. W. McLemone, Mark Reynolds, and H. D. Moise, all of Sumter, for appellant.

L. D. Jennings and A. S. Harby, both of Sumter, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. This is an action for damages to the plaintiff's lot, in the city of Sumter, S. C. The allegations of the complaint, material to the questions under consideration, are as follows:

"That the plaintiff is the owner in fee, and at the times hereinafter mentioned was in peaceable possession of the following described lot of land in said city of Sumter, to wit: * * *

"That on or about the 20th day of March, 1917, the defendant caused a gang of laborers to approach plaintiff's property for the purpose of laying a railroad track thereon. That when said laborers commenced to go upon plaintiff's land, he warned them, together with the foreman or person in charge of them, not to trespass upon his property, and ordered them to desist from attempting to lay said track thereupon, and positively refused to allow them to encroach upon his property, and in order to make his property line more apparent, and to prevent any mistake as to its location, and to further signify his refusal to permit the defendants to lay their track thereon, the plaintiff erected a wooden fence along the line of his property.

"That on the following day the plaintiff's property and said fence was left alone, until late in the afternoon, when the said construction gang of said defendant, under the orders and directions of the defendant, as plaintiff is informed, approached said fence, dug up his posts, cut the land away from underneath the same, and ran their track upon plaintiff's land, and later tore down said fence altogether, all against the will, and without the consent, and over the objection, of the plaintiff."

The answer of the defendant was a general denial.

The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $2,000, and the defendant appealed upon exceptions which will be reported.

[1] At the close of the plaintiff's testimony the defendant made a motion for a nonsuit, on the ground that the plaintiff had failed to prove title in himself. As the plaintiff alleged that he was in peaceful possession of the lot, and there was testimony to that effect, the refusal to grant the nonsuit was free from error. Investment Co. v. Lumber Co., 86 S. C. 358, 68 S. E. 637, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 243.

Furthermore, the plaintiff's attorneys stated in open court that they were not asking that the land be surrendered to the plaintiff, but merely for damages for the trespass. His honor the presiding judge also stated:

"They do not ask for the recovery of the land, but they ask for damages for your having broken into their possession, and invaded their quiet possession. That does not bring up the question of title. I think this is clearly a case of quare clausum fregit, and in actions of that kind the title does not enter."

Therefore the exceptions raising this question cannot be sustained.

[2] We proceed to the consideration of those exceptions assigning error on the part of the circuit judge in refusing to allow the defendant to introduce in evidence the charter of the Wilmington & Manchester Railway Company, its predecessor.

In ruling upon this question his honor, the presiding judge, used the following language:

"Now for the defendant to say, 'I went in on that property and I was justified by showing I had a right to do it under our statutes, under any charter, or under a grant from somebody else,' that is, an affirmative defense that he must set up in his answer. I can't see it any other way, and consequently I am obliged to rule this testimony out."

In Hill v. Bailey, 8 Mo. App. 85, the court, in holding that a general denial of the plaintiff's title will admit evidence of adverse possession, said:

"The plaintiffs insist that the finding and judgment were erroneous, because the answer did not set up the statute in defense. When the statute is relied on as a bar to the remedy merely, it must be specially pleaded. The rule is ancient, and needs no citation of authorities to sustain it. But where the title to real estate is in question, the operation of the statute is found to have a higher range. It is capable of conferring an absolute title. Hence it has long been held that a general denial of the plaintiff's title will suffice for the admission of evidence of adverse possession for the statutory period; because this will not merely bar the remedy, but may establish a title in the defendant which will conclusively negative any ownership in the plaintiff. In other words, it sustains and verifies the denial of the plaintiff's title. Nelson v. Broadhack, 44 Mo. 596. The rule is not confined to actions of ejectment. The reasoning upon which it is founded sanctions its application to any case wherein the title to land is in dispute. There was, therefore, no error in admitting this defense under the general denial."

The foregoing is quoted with approval in Sutton v. Clark, 59 S. C. 440, 38 S. E. 150, 82 Am. St. Rep. 848.

If the defendant had pleaded a bar to the plaintiff's action, testimony offered by him would have been admissible to prove it, but not under a general denial. It, however, was offered for the purpose of establishing the right of the defendant to the possession of the land for corporate purposes, and to disprove the allegations and testimony of the plaintiff, to the effect that he was in peaceful and rightful possession of the lot in question.

The exceptions raising this question are sustained. All other exceptions were dependent upon the questions which we have considered.

Reversed and remanded for new trial.

CUNNINGHAM v. ATLANTIC COAST LUMBER CORPORATION et al. (No. 10724.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 10, 1921.)

1. Logs and logging §3(11)—Grantor of timber rights held to acquiesce in fixing reasonable time for removal of timber.

Where a contract gave a lumber company 10 years from the beginning of operations in which to cut and remove the timber, and the owner of the land permitted the lumber company to enter and remove timber more than 10 years after the date of the contract, the owner, by so doing, acquiesced in fixing that time as a reasonable time in which to commence to cut and remove the timber.

2. Logs and logging §3(11)—Timber contract construed as to time of expiration.

Where a contract provided that a lumber company should have 10 years, beginning from the time of the beginning of the cutting and removing of the timber, in which to cut and remove it, and the company commenced operations 11 years after the date of the contract with the landowner's acquiescence, the company had, as a matter of law, 10 years from such commencement of operations in which to cut and remove the timber.

3. Logs and logging §3(11)—Application for extension of time not a waiver of rights under timber contract.

Where a contract for cutting and removing timber provided for an extension on payment of interest, that the company operating under the contract endeavored to procure an extension of time held not a waiver of its rights under the contract.

Watts, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Williamsburg County; James E. Peurifoy, Judge.

Suit by J. S. Cunningham against the Atlantic Coast Lumber Corporation and another for an injunction and for damages. Judgment for defendants on the report of a special referee, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The report of the special referee, the exceptions thereto, and the order were as follows:

Report of Special Referee.

On the 26th day of August, 1899, the plaintiff, in consideration of $750, conveyed to Atlantic Coast Lumber Company all the timber of every kind and description, both standing and fallen, 12 inches stump diameter and upwards, 12 inches from the ground at the time of cutting, on a tract of 919 acres of land in Williamsburg county, in said state, fully described in the deed, with a certain reservation not here involved.

Along with the sale, there was a grant that the purchaser and its successors and assigns should have 10 years, beginning from the time of the beginning of the cutting and removing of the timber, in which to cut and remove it, and, if not then removed, additional time should be had, upon paying 7 per cent. per annum on the purchase price.

Atlantic Coast Lumber Corporation, one of the defendants, afterwards acquired the timber and rights under this deed, and on the 1st day of November, 1910, entered upon the premises and cut at least half, if not more, of the timber.

On the 13th day of September, 1920, the said defendant again entered upon the premises and sought to cut timber from the land which had not been cut over. This was done over the protest of the plaintiff, and after the defendant had endeavored to procure an extension of time from the plaintiff, but had failed in so doing.

This suit was brought to enjoin the defendant from cutting and removing any more of the timber, and for damages. The cause was referred to me, by consent, to take the testimony and determine all of the issues. At the hearing before me a statement of the plaintiff's testimony was submitted in the shape of an affidavit, and was made subject to objections noted. Oral testimony was also offered.

The plaintiff bases his right to prevent the cutting of the timber, in substance, upon the ground that, if the defendant be permitted to cut and take away the timber at this time, it would get a large number of trees which had grown to the stated size after the time of making the contract, and not contemplated nor included in the estimate of the parties, thereby stripping the lands of large quantities of timber for which no consideration had been paid, that a reasonable time had elapsed for cutting and removing the timber, and that the time had long since expired for the exercise of the rights granted, and that it would be inequitable at this time to permit the defendant to re-enter and cut and remove the timber.

A number of cases have recently been passed upon by our courts, but the principal point involved here has never been passed upon.

The cases already decided were brought in some instances by the owners of the land for the purpose of declaring the rights of the purchasers forfeited, and in other instances were brought by the purchasers of the timber to prevent trespasses by the owners of the land, raising practically the same issues; the objects of the suits in other cases being to ascertain and protect the rights of the parties bringing the suits.

I will not undertake to review and discuss these cases at length.

Commencing with Flagler v. Lumber Corporation, 89 S. C. 328, 346, 71 S. E. 855, a well-defined principle is announced and maintained. Quoting from Flagler v. Lumber Corporation: "Suffice it to say that we are of opinion that, both by the inherent reason of the thing, as well as by authority, that the true rule is that wherever it is apparent in a contract that the parties had in view some time for the commencement of the removal of the timber, which intent was not embodied in the terms of the contract, that the law will presume and will enforce that such commencement of the removal of the timber shall be within a reasonable time from the date of the contract." This principle is reaffirmed in McClary v. Lumber Corporation, 90 S. C. at page 163, 72 S. E. 145.

The court was asked to review these decisions in Atlantic Coast Lumber Corporation (one of the defendants here) v. Litchfield, 90 S. C. 368, 73 S. E. 182, 728, but declined to disturb the rulings in the other cases. The same doctrine was reaffirmed and enforced in Minshew v. Lumber Corporation, 98 S. C. 8, 81 S. E. 1027, and in Gray v. Lumber Co., 102 S. C. 298, 86 S. E. 640.

The difficulty in deciding this case arises from the fact that here a part of the timber has been cut and removed, and then a period of nearly 10 years has elapsed from the time of the commencing of the operation, while in the other cases this state of facts did not exist.

Mr. Justice Watts made a thorough review of the cases in passing upon the issues raised in the Minshew Case and used this language (98 S. C. at page 22, 81 S. E. 1032): "Under contracts of this character, the purchaser has only the right to have a reasonable time to get the fruits of his purchase. He has no right to enjoy by indefinite extension what would practically amount to a perpetuity and deprive the owner of enjoyment of his property. What is a 'reasonable time' depends upon the circumstances of each case, and is a question of fact, and no particular rule has yet been laid down to govern cases."

The contention of the plaintiff is, in substance, that the defendant should have commenced and completed the removal of the timber within a reasonable time, in order to get the fruits of his purchase, and the question in my mind has been whether it was the duty of the defendant, although not so provided in the contract, that it should go on and continuously cut until it had executed its contract, after having once commenced to cut the timber. Along with the statement in the Minshew Case, Mr. Justice Watts also says: "That the grantee must begin the removal of the timber within a reasonable time and it follows as a natural, logical, and irresistible sequence that, upon the failure to commence the removal within a reasonable time, the estate of interest granted is terminated and the interest granted reverts to the grantor or his privies."

Mr. Justice Hydrick in writing the opinion of the court in Gray v. Lumber Co., 102 S. C. at page 294, 86 S. E. 641, says: "The circuit court found that the failure to commence to cut for nearly 15 years was unreasonable, but, leaning no doubt to the principle of equity against forfeiture, held that the court should fix the time within which the cutting should have commenced just as if it had in fact been commenced, and thus put in operation the running of the first definite period of 10 years. But the court must enforce the contract as made and performed by the parties and declare their rights accordingly, and not as they should have made it, or exercised their rights under it. The court cannot, therefore, fix the time when the cutting should have begun, and add to that the 10 years during which it might have been continued, if it had been begun, and, in addition to that, allow the defendant the option of extending it 10 years longer by the payment of interest."

Had the contract simply been to the effect that the purchaser of the timber should commence to cut it within 10 years, then there would be less difficulty in deciding the question, but the terms of the contract are explicit and provide that the purchaser shall have 10 years after the time of commencing to cut the timber. To hold otherwise would be to change the terms of the contract made by the parties.

There are two things that appear to be plain as conclusions from the decisions referred to. The one is that the purchaser must commence to cut the timber within a reasonable time, and the other is that, if this be done, it will be in operation and running for 10 years' time from that date in which to cut and remove the timber, and the latter conclusion is simply following the terms of the contract.

In this case, I think it is fair to assume that the plaintiff was not advised of the plans of the purchaser or of the extent of its holding at that time, or of its contemplated purpose of adding to these holdings immense quantities of timber. I think it is fair to assume also that at the time a part of the timber was cut and removed from his land the rights of parties under contracts of this kind were little understood and very uncertain as to their effect; for it was soon after that time that litigation commenced concerning the consideration of contracts made practically at the same time as the making of this contract.

The testimony in this case shows that the defendant had large connected timber interests covering a great many tracts of land, and that its plan of operation was to put a railroad track alongside of these holdings and cut the timber from each of them as it went along, cutting, as was testified to in this case, some distance into the tracts of land and leaving the remainder of the timber to be reached by a track running on the other side of the holdings, and thus removing the remainder of the timber, as was sought to be done in this case.

At the time of the making of this contract these lands were not known to the plaintiff, but it is fair to assume that after the purchase of large bodies of timber by the defendant and extensive operations on other tracts adjacent to or near by the defendant was charged with the extent of the holdings of the defendant and its mode of operation, and most likely had constructive notice from the records although such does not appear in this record.

The statement of the plaintiff was read in lieu of his appearance and testifying orally, and certain objections were made to his testimony. I find that these objections should be sustained, as they state conclusions on his part and in contradiction of his contract; but if the objections were not sustained, and were the testimony to remain as competent, it would not be hurtful to the defendant, for the reason that, if the plaintiff's understanding were to be admitted as testimony, then it would appear that, after understanding that the timber was to be cut and removed before the time that they actually commenced to cut, he waived his right to insist upon his construction of it, by permitting the defendant afterwards to exercise its rights after, as a matter of fact, more than 10 years had elapsed before the cutting was commenced.

I therefore find, and conclude, as matters of fact:

[1] (1) That the plaintiff permitted the defendant lumber corporation to enter upon the land in question and cut and remove a part of the timber under this contract more than 10 years after its date, and thereby acquiesced in fixing that time as a reasonable time in which to commence to cut and remove the timber.

[2] (2) As a matter of law, that the defendant lumber corporation had 10 years from the 1st day of November, 1910, in which to cut and remove the timber from the land not already cut over, and that the injunction should be dissolved and the complaint dismissed.

[3] (3) That under this contract the defendant lumber corporation had until the 1st day of November, 1920, in which to cut and remove the timber, and that it did not waive its right thereto by endeavoring to procure an extension beyond the time.

It has the same number of days of which it was deprived, in which to hereafter cut and remove the timber, but it must exercise its rights with due diligence after the final determination of this case, and what is due diligence must depend on the situation of the defendant at that time.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Exceptions to Report of Referee.

To Messrs. Kelley & Hinds, Attorneys for the Defendant: Take notice that the plaintiff herein excepts to the report of referee in the above-stated case, dated the 14th day of February, 1921, on the following grounds, to wit:

I. Because the referee erred in sustaining defendant's objections to plaintiff's testimony as to his understanding at the time the timber contract in question was entered into as to when the timber would be cut and removed, and as to the right of the defendant lumber company to once cut a large portion of the timber, and then some 10 years later re-enter and cut the remainder of the same, in that anything which took place at the time the contract was entered into that goes to show the intention of the parties as to the time of cutting and removal would be competent as evidence.

II. Because the referee erred in sustaining defendant's objections to plaintiff's testimony as to his understanding at the time the contract was entered into as to what timber he was selling and the lumber company was buying, in that the circumstances surrounding the parties at the time the contract was made can be stated, and any separate agreement or separate understanding apart and not embodied in the written contract, and in no sense a part of the written contract entered into, is competent evidence.

III. Because the referee erred in finding and holding as a matter of law that the defendant lumber company had 10 years from November 1, 1910, in which to cut and remove the timber from the lands not already cut over, and that the injunction should be dissolved and the complaint be dismissed in that: (a) This gives the defendant lumber company an unreasonable time in which to cut and remove the said timber without paying anything further for it; (b) in that the defendant lumber company will get timber which has since the date of the contract grown to be of the size mentioned in the contract as being sold for which he has paid nothing, and was not understood to be sold at the time of making the contract; (c) this would give the defendant lumber company what practically amounts to a perpetuity, as it could, just prior to the termination of the 10 years provided for, pay 7 per cent. on the purchase price of the timber and have such additional time as it desires to cut same, thereby making a further extension of 20 years or more if the same is desired; (d) in that under the laws of this state a lumber company under similar contracts is given only a reasonable time to get the fruits of its purchase and has no right to enjoy the indefinite extension what would amount to a perpetuity, and thereby deprive the owner of the enjoyment of his property.

IV. Because the referee erred in finding that the defendant has the same number of days of which it was deprived in which to hereinafter cut and remove the timber, in that a reasonable time within which to cut and remove the same had expired long before the present entry and the date of the issuance of the injunction herein; therefore the defendant's entry was unlawful, and it had no legal right to go upon the premises when the said injunction was issued.

V. Because the referee erred in finding and holding that, under a proper construction of the timber deed in question, the lumber company would have 10 years from its entry, even though that was made more than 11 years after the date of the deed, in that the courts have held that under similar deeds the lumber company has only a reasonable time to get the fruits of its purchase, and 21 years would be an unreasonable time to give it to cut the timber in this case.

VI. Because the referee erred in finding that, because the defendant company was permitted to go upon the premises and cut the timber in the first instance, 1910, that fixed a reasonable time, and that it would have 10 years from the date of that entry in which to remove the remainder of the timber, in that, under a proper construction of the deed, the defendant would have only a reasonable time within which to cut and remove same regardless of the date of its first entry, and that, merely because the plaintiff permitted it to cut in 1910, that would fix a time for the beginning of the 10-year period mentioned in the contract, because more than a reasonable time would expire before the end of the 10-year period.

VII. Because the referee erred in finding and holding, in substance, that from August 26, 1899, to November 1, 1920, was a reasonable time within which to cut and remove the timber in question, in that this finding is not supported by the evidence.

VIII. Because the findings of fact and conclusions of law of the referee are not supported by the testimony and the law of the case.

Order.

This matter was called up for a hearing before me in the court of common pleas for Williamsburg county on March 4, 1921, upon the exceptions from the report of the special referee. I did not then have sufficient time to hear argument of counsel upon the exceptions, and it was agreed by and between the attorneys for both parties that the matter should be heard and disposed of at chambers in Manning, S. C. Pursuant to that agreement, I heard argument of counsel for plaintiff and defendants at Manning, S. C., on the 17th day of March, 1921, and, after hearing argument of counsel and taking the matter into consideration, I have reached the conclusion that the report of the special referee herein is correct.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said exceptions to the said report of the special referee herein be, and the same hereby are, overruled.

It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said report of the said special referee herein be, and the same hereby is, in all respects ratified and confirmed and made the judgment of this court.

It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the injunction heretofore issued herein by his honor Judge I. W. Bowman, and dated September 21, 1920, be, and the same hereby is, dissolved.

It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the complaint herein be, and the same hereby is, dismissed.

It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the Atlantic Coast Lumber Corporation has the same number of days of which it was deprived in which to hereafter cut and remove the timber owned by it and remaining uncut upon the tract of land described in the complaint herein.

Kelley & Hinds, of Kingstree, for respondents.

GARY, C. J. For the reasons therein assigned, the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

SIMS et al. v. CAMP CREEK SCHOOL DIST. No. 15 of LANCASTER COUNTY. (No. 10728.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 10, 1921.)

1. Reformation of Instruments ¶13(4)—Deed to school district properly reformed by adding forfeiture clause.

Where a deed to a school district recited that the land was conveyed for the purpose of erecting a schoolhouse for white children, but it appeared that the district abandoned the school and threatened to sell the land, and that the intention of the parties was that in such case the land should revert, but that a clause to that effect was omitted through mutual mistake, held that reformation of the deed by adding such a clause was proper.

2. Reformation of Instruments ¶8—Deed for school purposes held not voluntary.

As respects the right to reformation, a deed of land to a school district for the purpose of erecting a schoolhouse for white children was not voluntary, where grantor would secure a school on his land for the benefit of his own family, his tenants and his neighbors, thus enhancing the value of his land.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Lancaster County; Edward McIver, Judge.

Action by S. Agnes Sims and others against Camp Creek School District No. 15 of Lancaster County. Decree for plaintiffs and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The decree of the court below was as follows:

The plaintiffs, as the only heirs at law of J. Bart Sims, deceased, bring this action to reform a deed executed by him to two of the trustees of the defendant on July 29, 1907. The material allegations of the complaint are: That this deed for 1½ acres of land was made by Sims to the school district for the purpose of erecting thereon the schoolhouse for the benefit of the white children of that district, which condition was sufficiently expressed in the deed in the following language: "This land is conveyed for the purpose of erecting thereon a public schoolhouse for white children for the benefit of this school district situate in Gills Creek township." But that it was also agreed between the grantor and grantees that if said district ceased to use said land for the purpose of maintaining thereon a school for white children the land and any buildings thereon should revert to the grantor or his estate, and that this condition was left out of the deed by the scrivener, he and the contracting parties being mutually mistaken in thinking that the language used was sufficient, inasmuch as it specified the use for which the property was conveyed, and that it could not be used for any other purpose than that specifically mentioned. In other words, that the grantor, grantee, and scrivener were all laymen, and did not know that a forfeiting clause was necessary to revert the property to Sims in the event it should be abandoned for school purposes. Another clause of the deed is, "But if said schoolhouse is not erected within the next three years from date then this deed shall be null and void and title to said land shall remain in said Sims and his heirs." The complaint said further that a schoolhouse was erected on said land in 1911, a public school taught therein until the autumn of 1915, when the defendant abandoned said school and threatened to sell the land and schoolhouse in violation of the rights of plaintiffs. This action was brought in March, 1916, following a consent demurrer to a complaint in a case between the same parties, asking that the property be declared forfeited on the terms of the deed as it then stood, unless the defendant should continue the school. This action was brought within a few days after the demurrer was consented to in the first case. That demurrer was that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that the deed sued on did not contain a forfeiting clause in the event the property was abandoned for school purposes, but on its face showed the defendant to be the owner in fee.

The defendant admits the execution of the deed, admits its abandonment for school purposes, admits its intention to sell the entire property and use the proceeds thereof elsewhere, contends that it is the owner in fee of the property, and denies that there were any stipulations or agreements between the grantor and grantees than those mentioned in the deed. It also sets up various special defenses, viz. ultra vires, in that the trustees were without authority to accept a deed with the limitations set out in the complaint; former judgment, in that the demurrer to the first complaint was an adjudication against the plaintiffs of the issues here; statute of limitation, in that the cause of action did not accrue within six years before the commencement of the action; the statute of frauds, in that no writing other than the deed was signed by either party, stipulating any agreement other than those in the deed; that the complaint does not state mutual mistake as to the facts of the transaction or as to the terms of the deed, and therefore states no equity; and, last, that in the year 1915 the school trustees decided to abandon this schoolhouse and erect a larger one elsewhere in the district as a consolidated school. The plaintiff moved to amend the complaint by more specifically alleging mutual mistake, conforming to the facts proved in certain minor particulars, and striking out a certain clause, to wit, "And especially agreeing to maintain a school thereon," from paragraph 6 and also moved to strike out from the answer the entire seventh defense on the ground that it is redundant and constitutes no defense. A separate order defines the amendment to the complaint. The motion to strike the seventh defense from the answer is allowed. What the trustees did in 1915 could have no bearing on the agreement between the grantor and grantee in 1907, when the deed was made.

The special defenses herein enumerated are overruled. I do not think any of them go to the real issues in the case, or in any event can affect their decision. What are the issues? What is the law governing their decision? The issues are: Did J. Bart Sims, on July 29, 1907, before and when he signed the deed, say that he was conveying the land for the purpose of the school authorities erecting a schoolhouse thereon for white children, but that if said authorities should cease to use said land for the purpose of maintaining thereon a school for white children the lands and any buildings thereon should revert to him, or in the event of his death to his estate? Did he say that to the scrivener that drew the deed; did he say it to the representative of the defendant there, and did they all believe that the language of the deed expressed the terms of his grant? Without reciting the testimony I hold that it overwhelmingly proves that Sims made these statements, that the scrivener heard them, that the party de jure and de facto, representing a school district, heard them, and subsequently told the grantor's wife, when she renounced her dower, that the deed fully covered the condition, and that it was the intention to put into the deed the terms necessary to state legally these conditions, and that it was a mistake of Sims, of the scrivener he was not a lawyer and of the person Long, there publicly recognized as representing the district, that they were not put there.

Sims represented himself, who represented the school district? Having accepted the benefit of what he did, can the district repudiate any of his acts, even if detrimental, and retain the benefit secured by him. The plaintiff alleges that M. J. Long, was a trustee of the school district, every witness for the plaintiff swears that he was, and that he was everywhere recognized to be such, and Hallman says that, he (Long) asked him to see Sims about getting the land for a school; that Sims told him how he would grant the land; that he told Long, and Long agreed to all conditions prescribed by Sims. Long was present when the land was surveyed; he was present when the deed was drawn; he took charge of the deed for the district; if he did not, who did?

The defendant went into possession of the land, the deed was recorded; the defendant brings it into court. If Long did not represent the school district, who did? The deed was made to W. T. Morris and L. N. Montgomery as trustees. Only two are mentioned; the law requires three. Plaintiff suggests that Long's name was left out because he as a notary intended taking Mrs. Sims' renunciation of dower. Be that as it may, the witnesses testify that he was publicly acknowledged as trustee; that he negotiated the transaction as such. The records in the office of the county superintendent of education show that he was trustee in the first half of the year 1907; that he was again trustee in 1908; that he signed pay vouchers in 1907; that the district paid for surveying the land, thus showing ratification of his act in having it surveyed. It is true that the book of trustees, in the office of the county superintendent of education, shows that Sims was appointed trustee on July 1, 1907, but A. M. L. Hallman subsequently a trustee says that Sims refused to act or that he thinks so. I am forced to the conclusion that Sims refused to serve; that Long, the trustee appearing on the books in 1907, simply held over, and was again formally appointed in 1908. If Sims had served, his term would have been three years; Long's name again appears on the books in 1908. This fact, with Hallman's testimony, indicates that Sims never served at all, but that Long continued to act. The testimony is that neither Morris or Montgomery were present when the deed was drawn; Long was. Montgomery says Sims never met the board of trustees nor acted as one. The law says that they shall at once meet and organize their board. I am therefore of the opinion that Long was de jure or de facto a trustee; that he represented the school district; that he accepted the deed, and that he represented the school district in so doing; and that he and Sims were mutually mistaken in believing that the terms of the deed sufficiently expressed all the conditions of Sims' grant. Montgomery says he never saw the deed until after this action was brought. At the time the schoolhouse was built in 1911, Sims was dead. The trustees were L. N. Montgomery and W. T. Morris, the two named in the deed and A. M. Hallman, a witness to the deed, and one of the witnesses testifying to Sims' statement when the deed was drawn. Montgomery testified on cross-examination: (a) That he understood before and at the time the schoolhouse was built that Sims had given the land for school purposes for white children only; and (b) that from reading from the deed he would so construe it, thus showing his understanding of the terms of the grant, and that he would have construed the deed just as Sims and Long did, thus also showing that if he had been present when it was drawn he would have also been mistaken as to the legal import of its terms. Hallman, the other building trustee, said that he had personal knowledge of the terms of the grant; that he contributed heavily to the building of the house under such knowledge, so that we see that two of the building trustees personally knew of the terms of the grant before the schoolhouse was built in 1911. The defendant cannot therefore claim that it did not have actual knowledge of what Sims had granted it when it built the house, and until that time it had done no act affecting it in any way. What was in the deed did not influence Montgomery when the house was built; he had never seen it, Hallman knew what was in it, and believed it expressed the agreement between Sims and Long. Morris is now dead. Had he seen the deed? Long is also dead, but witnesses tell us what he said.

[1] Having concluded that Long represented the district, and that he and Sims were mutually mistaken in believing that the deed expressed the agreement between them, ought the deed to be reformed? I so hold. The law is clear as laid down in the following authorities: Byrd v. O'Neal, 106 S. C. 348, 91 S. E. 293; Cook v. Knight, 106 S. C. 810, 91 S. E. 312; Hutchison v. Fuller, 67 S. notes; 2 Pom. Eq. 845; Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1376; Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law (1st Ed.) vol. 20, 713, and cases cited 714-716, and 770; Railway v. Jones, 73 Miss. 110, 19 South. 105, 55 Am. St. Rep. 492; Lawrence v. Beaubien, 2 Bailey, 623, 23 Am. Dec. 155; Lowndes v. Chisolm, 2 McCord, Eq. 455, 16 Am. Dec. 667; Cunningham v. Cunningham, 20 S. C. 319. The evidence is competent to reform the deed. Marshall v. Railway, 73 S. C. 241, 53 S. E. 417; Earle v. Owings, 72 S. C. 362, 364, 51 S. E. 980; Whitman v. Corley, 72 S. C. 410, 52 S. E. 49.

[2] The deed here is not a voluntary one. There were certain stipulations and agreements moving Sims to its execution; among them the securing of a school on his land for the benefit of his own family, his tenants and his neighbors, thus enhancing the value of his land and benefiting him in various other ways. In the absence of these benefits, it is inconceivable that he would have carved out 1¼ acres of his most valuable land on the public highway, his most desirable house seat, and given it to the school district so that it could abandon the school at its pleasure and sell the land to any one for any purpose the purchaser might see fit to use it. He would not knowingly have assumed the risk of having a gin or a mill or a negro dwelling placed upon his farm in such a prominent and desirable location.

I am of the opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to the relief demanded in the complaint as to the reformation of the deed. It is therefore on motion of J. Harry Hines, plaintiffs' attorney, ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said deed to wit, that executed by J. Bart Sims to W. T. Morris and L. N. Montgomery, trustees, on July 29, 1907, and recorded in Deed Book Q, p. 117, in the office of R. M. C. for Lancaster county, be, and the same is hereby, reformed by adding after the clause therein, "This land is conveyed for the purpose of erecting thereon a public schoolhouse for white children for the benefit of this school district situated in Gills Creek township," the following additional clause: "Provided that if said school district shall ever cease to use said land for the purpose of maintaining thereon a public school for white children in said school district, then and in such event the title to said land and all buildings thereon shall thereby immediately revert to me or in the event of my death, to my estate"—and that there be added to the habendum clause of said deed the following: "For the uses and purposes herein mentioned and no other." Ordered, further, that clerk do enter upon the record of the said deed the judgment of this court that it is reformed as herein ordered.

Harry Hines and John T. Green, both of Lancaster, for respondents.

COTHRAN, J. This court is entirely satisfied with the conclusions of the circuit judge, and for the reasons assigned by him the decree is affirmed.

FAUST v. RICHLAND COUNTY.KELLY v. SAME. (No. 10752.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 11, 1921.)

Eminent domain — 293(1)—Highways — 120(4)—Complaint held to state cause of action for damages against county and for taking of private property for public use.

Complaint in action against county, alleging that defendant in repairing highway filled ditch and diverted water on plaintiff's premises, to his damage, held to set forth a cause of action for damages against the county and a good cause of action for the recovery of compensation for taking of private property for public use, under Const. art. 1, § 17.

Cothran, J., and Rice and Mauldin, Circuit Judges, dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; M. S. Whaley, Judge.

Actions by J. H. Faust and Ben L. Kelly, respectively, against Richland County. Judgments for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The complaint alleged, inter alia:

"(2) That a certain highway, known as the Two-Notch or Camden road, and leading from Columbia, S. C., to and beyond Camden, S. C., is one of the highways under the management, control, and supervision of the defendant, it being the defendant's duty to keep the said highway in proper and suitable repair.

"(3) That the plaintiff herein did, at the time hereinafter mentioned, own, and now owns, a lot of about three acres of land, upon which his dwelling stands, situate on the right-hand side of the said Two-Notch road about a mile northeast of the city of Columbia, plaintiff's land and his dwelling being situated on the side of an elevation or hill which slopes toward the east, so that all the waters accumulating from rainfall upon a considerable area of land, lying west of plaintiff's lot, flows upon and over the plaintiff's property, first, however, crossing or flowing under the highway hereinabove mentioned.

"(4) That, previous to the making of the repairs on said highway, hereinafter referred to, there extended along both sides of the said highway which passes in front of the plaintiff's premises a drainage ditch, into which the rainwater which fell on lands in that immediate vicinity was caught and conveyed to another ditch which intersects the said highway at right angles, and which passes through and over the plaintiff's premises, and by means of which the said water was conveyed away, without doing injury to plaintiff's premises.

"(5) That on or about the 1st day of December, 1920, the defendant herein, through its servants and agents, while engaged in making repairs to said highway, carelessly and negligently, and in utter disregard of the rights of the plaintiff, filled in the said drainage ditches, which ran along the side of the road in front of plaintiff's house, and elevated the roadbed to such an extent and in such a way as to cause the rain which falls upon the road, and lots adjacent thereto on the southern side of the plaintiff's premises, to accumulate in great volume and to flow with great force across plaintiff's yard, under his house and through his premises, said water carrying with it great quantities of trash, leaves, litter, and such filth as accumulates upon a public road, and depositing the same on plaintiff's premises; and the plaintiff alleges that the said rainwater, which has been caused to flow through his premises as aforesaid, has washed great holes in his garden and yard, and has undermined the pillars of his house, and has caused him great damage to repair the same.

"(6) And the plaintiff further alleges that the defendant herein, by elevating the roadbed in front of the plaintiff's premises, has built a dam which prevents the natural flow of the rainwater that accumulates on the land adjacent to plaintiff's premises, and which ponds the same up in front of plaintiff's premises, where the said rainwater is accumulated in great volumes, and from which it flows in great volume and with great force, through a ditch and culvert leading through the said highway and through the plaintiff's premises; and the plaintiff alleges that, by reason of its carelessness and negligence in elevating the said roadbed and ponding the water in front of the plaintiff's premises, and causing the same to flow in great and unnatural volume through the plaintiff's premises, the defendant has washed away a large part of the top soil of the plaintiff's garden, and has washed great holes therein and rendered the same unfit for use."

W. O. McLain, of Columbia, for appellant.
J. H. Hammond and J. S. Verner, both of Columbia, for respondents.

EUGENE B. GARY, C. J. The only question properly and specifically raised is by the second exception. The cases of Lawton v. Railway, 61 S. C. 548, 39 S. E. 752, Brandenberg v. Zeigler, 62 S. C. 18, 39 S. E. 790, 55 L. R. A. 414, 89 Am. St. Rep. 887, Cain v. Railway, 62 S. C. 25,¹ and Hopkins v. Clemson College, 221 U. S. 636, 81 Sup. Ct. 654, 55 L. Ed. 890, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 243, clearly show that if an individual, instead of the defendant, had flooded the lands of the plaintiff in the manner alleged in paragraph 6 of the complaint, he would have subjected himself to an action for damages.

But there is even a stronger reason why the demurrer was properly overruled, to wit: The overflowing of the plaintiff's lands in the manner alleged in the complaint was in violation of the constitutional provisions prohibiting the taking of property without due process of law, and likewise without just compensation being first made.

the college having built a dyke, which forced the waters of the Seneca river across his land, whereby the soil was washed away and the land rendered unfit for agricultural purposes.

The Supreme Court of the state dismissed the complaint, on the ground that the state was a necessary party, and had not consented to be sued. Thereupon the plaintiff sued out a writ of error to the United States Supreme Court. In that case the United States Supreme Court said:

"Neither a state nor an individual can confer upon an agent authority to commit a tort, so as to excuse the perpetrator. In such cases the law of agency has no application—the wrongdoer is treated as a principal and individually liable for the damages inflicted and subject to injunction against the commission of acts causing irreparable injury. * * *

"Neither public corporations nor political subdivisions are clothed with that immunity from suit which belongs to the state alone by virtue of its sovereignty. In Lincoln County v. Luning, 133 U. S. 520, 530, the court said that: 'While the county is territorially a part of the state, yet politically it is also a corporation, created by and with such powers as are given to it by the state. In this respect it is a part of the state only in that remote sense in which any city, town, or other municipal corporation may be said to be a part.' The court there held that the Eleventh Amendment was limited to those cases in which the state is the real party, or party on the record, but that counties were corporations which might be sued. * * * Undoubtedly counties, cities, townships, and similar bodies politic often have a defense which relieves them from responsibility where a private corporation would be liable. But they must at least make that defense. They cannot rely upon freedom from accountability, as could a state. * * * If the state had in so many words granted the college authority to take or damage the plaintiff's property, for its corporate advantage without compensation, the Constitution would have substituted liability for the attempted exemption. But the state of South Carolina passed no such act, and attempted to grant no such immunity from suit, as is claimed by the college. * * *

"But an examination of the cases cited, in any respect similar to this, will show that they involve questions of liability in a suit, rather than immunity from suit. Most of them were actions for torts committed, not by the public corporation itself, but by officers of the law. * * * That general rule is of force in South Carolina, as appears from Gibbes v. Beaufort, 20 S. C. 213, 218, cited in the opinion of the court below, where it was said that 'a municipal corporation, instituted for the purpose of assisting the state in the conduct of local civil government, is not liable to be sued in an action of tort for nonfeasance or misfeasance of its officers, in regard to their public duties, unless expressly made so by statute.' But the plaintiff is not seeking here to hold the college liable for nonfeasance or misfeasance either of its own officers or officers of the public. This is a suit against the college itself for its own corporate act in building a dyke, whereby the channel had been narrowed, the swift current had been diverted from the usual course across the plaintiff's farm, and, as is alleged, destroying the banks, washing away the soil, and for all practical purposes as effectually depriving him of his property as if there had been a physical taking. * * *

"For protecting the bottom land, the college, for its own corporate purposes and advantage, constructed the dyke. In so doing it was not acting in any governmental capacity. The embankment was, in law, similar to one which might have been built for private purposes by the plaintiff on the other side of the river. If he had there constructed a dyke to protect his farm, and in so doing had taken or damaged the land of the college, he could have been sued and held liable. In the same way, and on similar principles of justice and legal liability, the college is responsible to him if, for its own benefit and for protecting land which it held and used, it built a dyke which resulted in taking or damaging the plaintiff's farm. * * * These suggestions, though made in a plea to the jurisdiction, afford no reason why the college should be granted immunity from suit, when it is claimed that, in violation of the Constitution, it has taken private property for its corporate purposes without compensation. * * * And, if the facts hereafter warrant it, the college may be enjoined against further acts looking to the maintenance or reconstruction of the dyke."

The judgment of the state court was reversed. We have quoted somewhat at length from the case of Hopkins v. Clemson College, supra, for the reason that its authority is binding upon the courts of the several states; and it is contended that our decisions are in irreconcilable conflict.

In the cases of Irvine v. Greenwood, 80 S. C. 511, 72 S. E. 228, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 363, and Triplett v. Columbia, 111 S. C. 7, 96 S. E. 676, 1 A. L. R. 349, this court has cited the Hopkins Case with approval.

The facts in the Triplett Case alleged by the plaintiff were, in substance, as follows: That the defendant, through its negligence and mismanagement, permitted a large pool of stagnant water, containing large quantities of decaying matter, to remain upon one of the streets of Columbia; that the plaintiff, who resided near the said pool, was caused to contract colitis, whereby she was made sick, to her damage in an alleged amount mentioned in her complaint.

A motion was made to dismiss the complaint, and the sole question was whether the municipality was liable under section 3053 of the Code of Laws 1912. The circuit court ruled that she was not, and dismissed the complaint. On appeal to the Supreme Court the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed. In delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court, Mr. Justice Hydrick reviewed the decision in the case of Mayrant v. Columbia, 77 S. C. 281, 57 S. E. 857, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1094, saying:

"Though the decision in the Mayrant Case was right, it was not put upon the right ground. In the Mayrant Case the wrong was alleged to have been caused by negligence in raising the level of the street, closing up the existing surface drains, and so negligently installing drain pipes of insufficient size and fall to carry off the surface water (which had theretofore been carried off by the surface drains) that it was thrown and ponded upon plaintiff's lot. * * * If we follow our previous decisions construing section 3053, the conclusion is inevitable that the decision in the Mayrant Case was rested upon an untenable ground. It might have been rested upon * * * section 3026 of the Civil Code of 1912. The decision might have also been rested upon the principle upon which the decision of this court in Hopkins v. Clemson College, 77 S. C. 12, was reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States (221 U. S. 636), in which liability was imposed on the ground that the diversion of the waters of Seneca river upon the plaintiff's land was tantamount to a taking thereof without compensation."

He then refers to the consideration of that ground in Irvine v. Greenwood, supra. Turning to that case, we find that Mr. Justice Woods, who delivered the opinion of the Court, used this language:

"In Hopkins v. Clemson College, 77 S. C. 12, 57 S. E. 853, the question was whether Clemson College, a corporation created for a public purpose, was liable for overflowing plaintiff's land in constructing a dyke to protect the crops on the college lands from the floods in the Seneca river. This court held that the case fell within the rule laid down in Gibbes v. Beaufort, 20 S. C. 213, Dunn v. Barnwell, 43 S. C. 398, 21 S. E. 315, and the other cases decided in this state cited above, and that therefore the plaintiff could not recover. On appeal the Supreme Court of the United States reversed the judgment of this court holding that the flooding of plaintiff's land was the taking of private property without due process of law, and that the taking was by the corporation itself for corporate purposes, and not by its officers or agents. As we understand, it was on these grounds that the case was distinguished from Gibbes v. Beaufort, supra, and other like cases decided in this state. The doctrine of the decision, however, is not applicable to this case, for the reason that here there is no taking of private property by the corporation, but an injury resulting in death from the alleged failure of an employee of the municipality to perform the duties imposed on him by the municipality."

It will thus be seen that this court recognized the fact that the case of Dunn v. Barnwell, 43 S. C. 398, 21 S. E. 315, 49 Am. St. Rep. 843, and other cases announcing the same doctrine, are inapplicable to cases involving the taking of property without due process of law or just compensation being first made, and, in this respect, that they were practically overruled by the case of Hopkins v. Clemson College.

We call attention also to the fact that Mr. Justice Hydrick, in the Triplett Case, did not mention the case of Hopkins v. Clemson College as applicable to the facts in the Triplett Case, but stated that the judgment in the Mayrant Case could be sustained by the Hopkins Case, on the ground that in the Mayrant Case there was a taking of private property without compensation. The right to throw surface water upon the lands of another was involved, both in the Mayrant Case and the Triplett Case. The reason why he did not apply the same doctrine as to taking property without due process of law to both cases, was because the facts in the Mayrant Case were sufficient to constitute a cause of action against an individual, and brought the case within the doctrine announced in Brandenburg v. Zeigler, 62 S. C. 18, 39 S. E. 790, 55 L. R. A. 414, 89 Am. St. Rep. 887, while the facts in the Triplett Case were not sufficient to constitute a cause of action, even if the defendant in that case had been an individual, which is the true test, as the case of Hopkins v. Clemson College shows that, in cases involving the taking of property without due process of law, the governmental subdivisions of the state are to be regarded as if they were individuals. The case of School District v. Marion County, 114 S. C. 382, 103 S. E. 767, is sustained by the Hopkins Case.

If these were not the reasons which governed Mr. Justice Hydrick, then he was in error in stating that the judgment in the Mayrant Case was right, as otherwise, the judgment in both cases should have been the same.

Affirmed.

SHIPP, MEMMINGER, DEVORE, FRANK B. GARY, and PEURIFOY, Circuit Judges, concur.

MOORE, Circuit Judge (concurring). Concurring in the opinion of Associate Justice OOTHRAN that the complaints in these two cases cannot be sustained as setting forth a cause of action for damages against the county for negligent construction or repair of a highway under the provisions of section 1972 of the Civil Code, nevertheless, upon a fair consideration of the complainants' allegations in each of these cases, it is concluded that each of these complaints contains a statement of facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action for the recovery of compensation for the alleged taking of private property for public use under the statutes of this state passed in pursuance of the declaration of the state Constitution that such property shall not be so taken without just compensation being made therefor.

In the exhaustive opinion herein pronounced by Mr. Justice COTHRAN, the common-law doctrine in force in this state as to surface water is correctly stated to the effect that such water is regarded as a common enemy which each landed proprietor may keep off his own premises by any reasonable means, even though he should thereby throw or keep it on his neighbor's land. See Lawton v. Railway, 61 S. C. 548, 39 S. E. 752. But the learned justice in this opinion has failed to give due consideration to the well-settled exception to or qualification of this rule clearly set forth by Justice Gary, now Chief Justice, in the case of Touchberry v. Railway Co., 87 S. C. 415, 69 S. E. 877, in the holding there made, which is fully sustained by well-settled authority, that it is an actionable injury for one to collect surface water into an artificial channel, and thence cast the same in concentrated form upon adjacent lands. See Brandenberg v. Zeigler, 62 S. C. 18, 39 S. E. 790, 55 L. R. A. 414, 89 Am. St. Rep. 887; Cain v. Railway, 62 S. C. 25, 39 S. E. 792.

These cases proceed upon the principle that the owner has a property right in his lands which is invaded by the act of another in casting surface water in concentrated form upon such lands. It is therefore manifest that, if the defendant has invaded the rights of the plaintiff by so casting surface water upon the lands of the latter in concentrated form, such act would amount to the taking of the property of the plaintiff pro tanto; and such a taking being charged in the complaint to have been done by the defendant for the construction, alteration, or repair of a public highway, the defendant would thereby be taking private property for public use, for which taking just compensation must be paid as required by section 17 of article 1 of the state Constitution.

Rejecting as surplusage the averments of the complaints in the cases here at bar in so far as they charge negligence by the defendant in the construction of the highway, there still remains allegations sufficiently charging the taking of the property of the plaintiff for public use by the defendant, and a consequent liability of the defendant to make compensation therefor. It is well established in this state that such an action for compensation for the taking of private property for public use may be maintained in this state where the right to compensation is denied by the defendant. See Cureton v. Railway, 59 S. C. 371, 37 S. E. 914; Railway v. Reynolds, 69 S. C. 481, 48 S. E. 476, and cases there cited.

For these reasons, the circuit orders overruling the demurrers to these complaints should be affirmed.

SEASE, BOWMAN, and TOWNSEND, Circuit Judges, concur.

COTHRAN, J. (dissenting). These two actions were heard together upon demurrers by the defendant to the complaints. The demurrers were overruled by the county judge and from his orders the defendant has appealed. In each case the plaintiff claimed damages by reason of injury to his premises on account of the elevation of the roadbed of a highway and the filling in of parallel drains, resulting in the throwing back of surface water upon his premises.

The complaints in the two cases are practically identical; an analysis of one will apply equally to the other, as will also the determination of the legal questions involved. We adopt the trial judge's statement of the facts constituting the alleged cause of action in the case of J. H. Faust:

"Plaintiff's land and his dwelling are situated upon a hillside which slopes toward the east, so that waters accumulating from a rainfall over a considerable area to the west naturally flow over his land. Previously much of the water was caught by ditches alongside of the public road, and finally conveyed away in a ditch intersecting said road, without any injury to plaintiff's property. By elevating the roadbed and filling in the said drainage ditches, the defendant is alleged to have caused the rain-water to accumulate and be forced in great volume onto plaintiff's property, corroding the surface soil, weakening the foundations to his dwelling, and otherwise causing damage. All such results are alleged to have been due to defendant's negligence in repairing the said highway."

We adopt also his statement that the complaint concerns surface water only, and presents a case, not of draining surface water by a ditch onto the lands of a lower proprietor, "but of preventing the flow of surface water upon your own," "even if in so doing he throws it back upon a coterminus proprietor to his damage." As he declares: "We are now dealing with a case of the latter class."

The defendant demurred to the complaint in each case upon the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; the specification will be reported.

The demurrers were heard by the Honorable M. S. Whaley, county judge, who filed an order, which will be reported, overruling the same. From this order the defendant has appealed.

Under the interpretation of the complaint placed upon it by the trial judge, to which the respondent has made no objection, and which we therefore assume to be correct and adopt, the case presented is one of a lower proprietor fighting off surface water and throwing it back upon the upper proprietor to his injury. If, under these circumstances, the defendant were a private person or corporation, and not a municipal corporation, as the trial judge holds, the case of Baltzeger v. Ry. Co., 54 S. C. 245, 32 S. E. 359, 71 Am. St. Rep. 789, would be "conclusive of the issue here against the plaintiff." that case holds that—

"No legal right of any kind can be claimed, jure nature, in the flow of surface water, so that neither its detention, diversion, nor repulsion is an actionable injury, even though damage ensue." "The only exception to the rule that, surface water being a common enemy, every landowner has the right to deal with it in any such manner as he may see fit, is that it is subject to the general law in regard to nuisances. * * *"

To which should be added the further exception that he may not, by artificial means, pond surface water upon his own premises, and by ditches, drains, or other channels, discharge it thus concentrated upon the lands of the lower proprietor to his injury. Brandenburg v. Zeigler, 62 S. C. 18, 39 S. E. 790, 55 L. R. A. 414, 89 Am. St. Rep. 887.

The doctrine declared in the Baltzeger Case is sustained by the following cases: Edwards v. R. Co., 39 S. C. 472, 18 S. E. 58, 22 L. R. A. 246, 39 Am. St. Rep. 346; Lawton v. Ry. Co., 61 S. C. 548, 39 S. E. 752; Brandenburg v. Zeigler, 62 S. C. 18, 39 S. E. 790, 55 L. R. A. 414, 89 Am. St. Rep. 887; Johnson v. Ry. Co., 71 S. C. 241, 50 S. E. 775, 110 Am. St. Rep. 572; Touchberry v. R. Co., 87 S. C. 415, 69 S. E. 877.

Notwithstanding this apparently insuperable obstacle to the plaintiff's alleged cause of action, he insists that he is entitled to recover upon either of two grounds:

(1) That the immunity referred to, which extends to every class of proprietors at common law, whether they be private individuals, private corporations, or municipal corporations, is annulled by the provisions of section 1972, vol. 1, Code of Laws A. D. 1912.

(2) That the exercise of the common-law right of a lower proprietor to detain, divert or repel surface water, for the protection of his own property, when injury results to an upper proprietor, constitutes a taking of, or damage to, his property without compensation, in violation of the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and of a similar provision in the Constitution of South Carolina.

As to the first proposition: It being the settled law of this state that surface water, in contradistinction to the waters of a natural water course, is regarded as a common enemy, hostis humani generis, and that a lower proprietor has the legal right to fight it back from his land, even if in so doing injury may result to the upper proprietor, it is clear that, if the plaintiff can obtain relief under section 1972, that section must be construed to have accomplished a double result: (1) To render a county liable for an injury resulting from a defect in, or the negligent repair of, a highway, etc., a liability which did not theretofore exist against a county; and (2) To render a county liable for throwing back surface water upon an upper proprietor by means of the elevation of the roadbed, a liability which did not theretofore exist against a county or against any other class of proprietors.

The section as variously amended, which we take from the advance sheets of the Revisal of 1922, there numbered 8163, is as follows:

"Any person who shall receive bodily injury or damage in his person or property through a defect or in the negligent repair of a causeway, or bridge, or of any ferry operated by the county, may recover in an action against the county the amount of actual damage sustained by him by reason thereof: Provided, such person has not in any way brought about such injury or damage by his own act or negligently contributed thereto. If such defect in any road, causeway, or bridge, or in any ferry operated as aforesaid, existed before such injury or damage occurred, such damage shall not be recovered by the person so injured if his load exceeded the ordinary weight: Provided, further, that such county shall not be liable unless such defect was occasioned by its neglect or mismanagement: Provided, further, that if in any case brought under this section it is made to appear that before the damage occurred the supervisor or other officer or officers of such county, who is or are thereunto charged by law, had been notified in writing, by any citizen, that the highway, causeway, or bridge, or ferry operated as aforesaid, at or on which the damage occurred, was defective, or needed repair, the burden of proof as to the negligence of county officials shall not be upon the county to show, either that such defect did not in fact exist, or that it had been properly repaired, or that a reasonable time had not elapsed since such notice within which to make such repairs."

Attention is called to the fact that in the amendatory act of 1920 [31 St. at Large, p. 1021], and in this Revisal, the word "highway" has been omitted. A serious question might arise as to the effect of this omission as a repeal of the prior law. Our conclusion upon other grounds, however, renders a discussion of this question unnecessary at this time.

Section 1972 is a process in the evolution of the law. The act of which it is a reproduction was intended to provide a remedy (under certain prescribed conditions) which did not theretofore exist; to remove the immunity which a county enjoyed under the common law, from liability in damages, on account of an injury sustained by a person "through a defect in the repair of a highway."

It is very true that it was intended to create a liability in the county which did not theretofore exist, but which did exist in every tort-feasor not clothed with a governmental attribute, in other words, to place the county, so far as the particular duty of keeping highways in repair was concerned, upon the same plane of liability as that occupied by every other tort-feasor; it clearly was not intended, in addition to this, to make a discrimination against the county and create a liability in it which did not, and does not, exist in any other lower proprietor. This is apparent from a further consideration: If the conditions were reversed and the plaintiff were throwing back surface water upon the property of the county, an upper proprietor, he would be entitled to the immunity on this account accorded to all lower proprietors. The plaintiff can therefore get no relief from this section, so far as it may be claimed to create a liability in the county, which therefore did not exist in any lower proprietor similarly situated.

But assume for the sake of argument that no such manifest injustice appears as to hold the county liable for fighting back surface water (an immunity enjoyed by every other class of proprietors, including the plaintiff, should conditions be reversed), and that the facts present a case of liability against any other proprietor for ponding surface water upon his own land and discharging it, concentrated in a ditch, upon a lower proprietor; we are of opinion that they do not present a case of liability under the Statute against a county, for the reasons: (1) That the alleged injury is not shown to have resulted from a defect in or the negligent repair of a highway; (2) that the plaintiff is not shown to have been at the time of the injury in the exercise of his right to the use of the highway as such.

As the court says in Chick v. Newberry, 27 S. C. 419, 8 S. E. 787:

"Prior to its adoption, the disability was general, and still remains as to all except such as are taken out by the act."

In that case it was held that a county was not liable for injuries caused by a defective flatboat on a ferry operated by the county commissioners, the court declaring:

"The act in question undertakes to enumerate the cases in which the right to sue the county is given, viz., 'for defects in the repair of a highway, causeway, or a bridge.' This enumeration, as it seems to us, excludes matters not enumerated"

—which illustrates with what strictness the statutory liability is limited. There it was conceded that the ferry connected the two termini of the highways at the river; that it was owned and controlled and operated by the county commissioners; that the flatboat was defective, and that injury resulted.

There are two sections of the Code of Laws which come under consideration in the discussion of the question: Section 1972, relating to the liability of counties; and section 3053, to the liability of cities and towns. There are some slight differences in the provisions of the two sections, but in the main the purpose is the same, and is expressed in practically the same language. Hence the decisions concerning the one are instructive in the consideration of the other.

It will be noted that the phrase, "mismanagement of anything under the control of the corporation," occurs in section 3053, relating to cities and towns, but does not occur in section 1972, relating to counties.

It will also be noted that section 3026, prescribing the duty of a city or town in reference to the drainage of its streets, and prohibiting the turning of water upon a property owner, applies only to cities and towns, and not to counties. This is important, for the reason that in some of the cases involving section 3053 the liability of the city is sustained under section 3026, and not 3053.

There are certain principles applicable to both sections which have been thoroughly established. They are:

(1) A municipal corporation, being a governmental agency, charged with the duty of keeping its avenues of travel in proper repair, is not liable, in a civil action, for damages on account of injuries sustained in consequence of a breach of this duty on the part of the agents of the corporation, in the absence of a statute imposing such liability, and only then upon a substantial compliance with the requirements and conditions upon which such liability is predicated. Bryant v. City Council, 70 S. C. 137, 49 S. E. 229; Gibbes v. Beaufort, 20 S. C. 218; White v. City Council, 2 Hill, 572; Coleman v. Chester, 14 S. C. 290; Black v. Columbia, 19 S. C. 412, 45 Am. Rep. 785; Young v. City Council, 20 S. C. 116, 47 S. E. 827; Dunn v. Barnwell, 43 S. C. 398, 21 S. E. 315, 49 Am. St. Rep. 843; Bramlett v. Laurens, 58 S. C. 60, 36 S. E. 444.

(2) The statutes create a liability upon a municipal corporation for a breach of this duty only where the injury has resulted from a defect in or the negligent repair of said avenues of travel. Hutchison v. Summerville, 66 S. C. 442, 45 S. E. 8; Irvine v. Greenwood, 89 S. C. 511, 72 S. E. 228, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 363; Creps v. Columbia, 104 S. C. 371, 89 S. E. 316; Burnett v. Greenville, 106 S. C. 255, 91 S. E. 203, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 363; Dunn v. Barnwell, 43 S. C. 398, 21 S. E. 315, 49 Am. St. Rep. 843.

Mr. Justice Hydrick, in his dissenting opinion in the case of School District v. Marion, 114 S. C. 382, 103 S. E. 767, correctly declares the law to be:

"The language of the section makes it almost too plain for argument that the negligence for which the county is made liable must result in such a defect in, or defective condition of, the highway, as makes it unsafe for travel, and such has been the uniform construction of it by this court."

Acker v. Anderson, 20 S. C. 495: The plaintiff was injured in consequence of the mule that he was driving taking fright at an advertisement board upon a bridge and backing the buggy down the embankment. The court held that the case did not fall within the statute, declaring:

"Even if the commissioners had allowed it to be placed there, it is more than doubtful whether the county could have been made liable. The only matter for which the act gives an action against the county is 'a defect in the repair of a highway, causeway or bridge.'"

Duncan v. Greenville, 71 S. C. 170, 50 S. E. 776: The leaving of a wagon on the public road so as to put travelers in peril was held under section 1972 a failure to keep the road in repair, a defect in the road. See, also, Stone v. Florence, 94 S. C. 375, 78 S. E. 23.

Moss v. Aiken, 114 S. C. 147, 103 S. E. 520: A negligent collision between a motor truck operated by an employee of the county and an automobile operated by one lawfully on the highway, and using it as such, was held within the provisions of section 1972, evidently upon the ground that the negligent interposition of the truck, in the pathway of the automobile was a defect in the highway, and obstruction of the free passage to which the operator of the automobile was entitled. The case of Burnett v. Greenville, 106 S. C. 225, 91 S. E. 203, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 363, was relied upon as decisive of the question.

In Dunn v. Barnwell, 43 S. C. 398, 21 S. E. 315, 49 Am. St. Rep. 843, the court declares:

"There is nothing whatever in the act indicating an intention on the part of the Legislature to make a municipal corporation liable for any other nonfeasance or misfeasance on its part, except such as was connected with the keeping of the streets, etc., in proper and safe repair."

(3) Those only who at the time of the injury are making use of said avenue of travel for the legitimate purposes of travel are entitled to the benefit of the statutes.

That the section was intended to cover only an injury sustained by a person who was at the time using the highway as a highway of travel is apparent from the terms of the section: An injury through a defect in the highway; an injury through the negligent repair of the highway; no liability where the load of the person injured exceeded the ordinary weight; no liability where a reasonable time had not elapsed since notice to the county officials, within which to make the repairs. There is not an expression in the section which indicates that the section was intended to cover any other injury than that sustained by one using the highway as such.

Discussing the Mayrant Case, 77 S. C. 281, 57 S. E. 857, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1094, Mr. Justice Hydrick, for the court, says:

"In the Mayrant Case the wrong was alleged to have been caused by negligence in raising the level of the street, closing up the existing surface drains, and so negligently installing drain pipes of insufficient size and fail to carry off the surface water (which had theretofore been carried off by the surface drains) that it was thrown and ponded upon plaintiff's lot. In this case, the negligence alleged consists in failing to drain the surface water off the street, and thereby allowing a cesspool to be created and remain in the street which caused plaintiff's sickness. In neither case was the injury caused by any defect in the street which interfered with or affected the use of it for legitimate street purposes."

Burnett v. Greenville, 106 S. C. 255, 91 S. E. 203, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 363: A collision between an automobile which was negligently allowed by the city to use a main thoroughfare as a place of practice for hill climbing, racing at great speed, and an automobile operated by one lawfully entering the street from a cross street, was held within the provisions of section 3053, which contains provisions applicable to cities and towns similar to those of section 1972. The ground of the decision was:

"That the street thus dedicated by the authorities to a hazardous use was not then reasonably safe for prime purposes;" and "these words [through a defect in any street] * * * include the keeping of a street in such physical condition that it will be reasonably safe for street purposes."

Irvine v. Greenwood, 89 S. C. 511, 72 S. E. 228, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 363: Allowing a chain to hang down from an electric light, charged with electricity, in easy reach of a boy playing in the street, was held within the provisions of section 3053. The ground of the decision was that such act constituted a defect in the street:

"To keep a street in repair means to keep it in such physical condition that it will be reasonably safe for street purposes. It is not enough that its surface should be safe; a street is not in repair when poles or wires or other structures are so placed in or over it as to be dangerous to those making a proper use of the street."

The court, construing the statute further, says:

"In the case of Dunn v. Barnwell, 43 S. C. 398, 21 S. E. 315, the court, construing the statute in the light of its title, held that the liability created by it was limited to misfeasance or nonfeasance connected with the keeping of 'any street, causeway, bridge or public way' in proper repair."

Creps v. Columbia, 104 S. C. 371, 89 S. E. 316: A pedestrian was injured by a fire engine belonging to the city, alleged to have been negligently operated. The act was held within the statute (section 3053) upon either ground, that the negligent operation of the fire engine constituted a defect in the street, in not keeping it "in repair and reasonably safe for street purposes," and also was the "mismanagement of anything under the control of the corporation," a clause which appears in section 3053, relating to cities and towns, but not in 1972, relating to counties.

The question is concluded by the decision of this court in the case of Triplett v. Columbia, 111 S. C. 7, 96 S. E. 675, 1 A. L. R. 349 (which distinctly overrules a contrary conclusion in the case of Mayrant v. Columbia, 77 S. C. 281, 57 S. E. 857, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1094, unless this court is prepared to hold that the case of School District v. Marion County, 114 S. C. 382, 103 S. E. 767, overrules the Triplett Case. The two cases are in direct opposition to each other; both cannot stand. The Triplett Case is in harmony with a long line of decisions of this court; the decision commends itself to our judgment; the other is not, and does not. The former is accordingly reaffirmed, and the latter overruled.

In the Triplett Case, 111 S. C. 7, 96 S. E. 675, 1 A. L. R. 349, the court held, construing section 3053, affecting cities and towns, that it was applicable only to injuries sustained by a person using the street as such through a defect in or negligent repair of the street or negligent mismanagement of something under the control of the corporation, and that it does not apply to the case of a property owner made ill by a depression in the street filled with stagnant water. This presents really a stronger case for the plaintiff than the one at bar, for the reason that there the depression in the street which caused the formation of the pool of water was a defect in the street itself, an instance of negligent repair, while here there is no such claim; in fact, here, the more perfect in construction and repair the elevated highway may be, the more efficient it becomes in throwing the water back upon the plaintiff.

The facts in that case upon which the plaintiff relied were, in brief, as follows: The city through neglect and mismanagement permitted a large pool of stagnant water, 15x25 feet, and in places 4 feet deep, filled with trash, refuse, and decaying matter, to remain in a street, which caused the illness of the plaintiff. The city demurred to the complaint upon the ground that the action was not justified by section 3053. The demurrer was heard by Circuit Judge Mendel L. Smith, who in an elaborate and convincing decree sustained the demurrer, or motion to dismiss, as it is termed. This court unanimously, with the exception of the Chief Justice, who did not sit in the case, sustained not only the conclusions, but the reasoning, of Judge Smith, and filed an opinion for the purpose only of overruling a contrary conclusion in the Mayrant Case, 77 S. C. 281, 57 S. E. 857, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1094.

It is impossible to differentiate this case from the case at bar, unless it be determined that top soil, fruits and vegetables must be accorded a more favorable consideration than health and life.

The case of Heape v. Berkeley, 80 S. C. 82,

61 S. E. 203, is a stronger case for the plaintiff than the case at bar, in that the act there complained of was that of the road overseer in opening a ditch parallel with the highway and extending it at right angle across the highway and through the school lot to the land of the plaintiff, by which surface water collected in the highway was concentrated and emptied upon the plaintiff's land. This presented a case of ponding surface water by an upper proprietor, and by means of ditches throwing it in concentration upon the lower proprietor, which is inhibited under the Brandenburg Case, supra. It was not suggested in the case that the plaintiff had a cause of action under section 1972. The circuit court held that the county was not liable for the acts of the overseer; that there was no statute in this state which authorized the action and dismissed the action against all of the defendants, the overseers having been joined. This court sustained the order below upon the authority of Matheny v. Aiken, 68 S. C. 163, 47 S. E. 56, and Parks v. Greenville, 44 S. C. 168, 21 S. E. 540.

There are also certain well-established principles applicable to injuries sustained in cities and towns, which by reason of the absence of corresponding statutory provisions, are not applicable to injuries sustained in the county:

(1) In addition to liability for injuries arising from defects in or the negligent repair of streets, cities and towns are made liable by section 3053 for injuries sustained by reason of "mismanagement of anything under the control of the corporation."

(2) The phrase "mismanagement of anything under the control of the corporation" is construed to mean mismanagement in making repairs on the streets.

Hutchison v. Summerville, 66 S. C. 442, 45 S. E. 8: This was a clear case of a defect in the street. The town had maintained a sidewalk which ended abruptly in a ditch, unguarded, into which the plaintiff fell. It is cited to show how carefully the court has confined the liability of the municipality under section 3053 to cases of defects in or negligent repair of a street. The court holds that the clause "mismanagement of anything under control of the corporation" was limited, as was done in the case of Dunn v. Barnwell, 43 S. C. 401, 21 S. E. 316, 49 Am. St. Rep. 843, to "mismanagement in making repairs on the streets, so that the corporation should be held liable not only for neglect in making repairs on the streets, but also for mismanagement of anything under the control of the corporation in making such repairs." (Italics by the court.) This clause does not appear in section 1972. See, also, Barksdale v. Laurens, 58 S. C. 413, 36 S. E. 661.

(3) Under section 3026, it is made the duty of a city or town to provide sufficient drainage for surface water so as to prevent the passage of such water over the private property of adjacent owners. For a breach of this duty, the city or town is liable for resulting damages.

Reviewing now the cases in this state, some apparently, and others actually, in conflict with the foregoing conclusions:

Mayrant v. Columbia, 77 S. C. 281, 57 S. E. 857, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1094: It was held that, where a city so negligently constructed its drainage pipes and raised the street that the surface water was ponded and caused the collection of filth, rendering the premises unsanitary and uninhabitable, it was liable in damages to the owner under section 3053. No further discussion of the case is necessary than to refer to the case of Triplett v. Columbia, 111 S. C. 7, 96 S. E. 675, 1 A. L. R. 349, where the ruling is expressly repudiated, and the case, so far as referring the liability of the city to section 3053, is distinctly overruled. The court, however, held that the action was maintainable under section 3026, which, as we have noted, has no application to counties.

Columbia v. Melton, 81 S. C. 356, 62 S. E. 245, 399; Id., 85 S. C. 558, 67 S. E. 902: Mrs. Melton owned a lot in the city; by means of pipes the city was discharging collected surface water on her lands; she instituted condemnation proceedings to assess her damages; the city brought an action to enjoin the proceedings; she answered justifying the proceedings; the city demurred to the answer, alleging that her remedy was an action for damages; this court sustained the order below overruling the demurrer (Mr. Justice Woods dissenting) holding that the appropriate remedy was an action for damages under section 3053 or under 3026; the case was then called for trial and an issue submitted to a jury whether the city had acquired by prescription the right to turn water on the lot, which was answered in the affirmative; the circuit judge set aside the verdict, and refused the city's prayer for injunction against the condemnation proceedings; on appeal the court adopted the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Woods on the first appeal, holding that the property owner's remedy was an action for damages, and not a proceeding in condemnation, and enjoined the condemnation proceeding. This case is not authority to sustain the plaintiff's action in the case at bar against a county under the statute for two reasons: The action there was sustained upon either ground: (1) That the injury was due to the "mismanagement of anything (something) under control of the corporation," which clause does not appear in the county act, section 1972; (2) that the injury was due to the failure of the city to comply with the requirements of section 3026 in the matter of providing drains to prevent the passage of water upon private lands. There is no corresponding statute as to a county.

Scott v. Richland, 83 S. C. 506, 65 S. E. 729: The plaintiff alleged that the defendant, in working upon the highway in front of his house, removed the drains and raised the roadbed, in such a way as to turn the water from the road and neighboring land upon his land to his injury. The defendant interposed a demurrer to the complaint—upon what grounds does not appear—though it may be assumed from the opinion that the ground of the demurrer was the failure to allege that the defect which caused the injury was occasioned by neglect or mismanagement on the part of the county. The court held that, while the complaint was defective in this respect, there was enough alleged to save it from the demurrer. The question under discussion upon this appeal was not suggested or discussed, and we do not regard the case, though quite similar in its facts, as at all bearing upon such question.

The case of School District v. Marion County, 114 S. C. 382, 103 S. E. 767, is in direct conflict not only with the provisions of the section, but with the previous decisions of this court, and should be overruled. It was decided by a divided court, Mr. Justice Watts delivering the opinion, concurred in by the Chief Justice and by Mr. Justice Gage (upon a matter of policy as to pleadings), and attacked by a convincing dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Hydrick, concurred in by Mr. Justice Fraser. The case as made by the complaint was one where the agents of the county, while engaged in the repair of a highway, went outside of the limits of the highway and destroyed certain shade trees upon the schoolhouse lot, which fronted on the highway. It was decided upon a demurrer to the complaint not upon the ground that the acts complained of were within the terms of section 1972, but upon one ground:

"There is no doubt that the hands employed by the county in repairing the road were under the control of the county, acting within the scope of their employment. For any negligent act on their part in building or making repairs on the highway, by which a party is injured, they must respond in actual damages."

If the expression, "they must respond in actual damages," refers to the employees guilty of negligence, the declaration is entirely correct, but it is no ground for sustaining an action against the county; if it refers to the county, it is the declaration of a doctrine that the county is liable for the negligent act of its employees, independently of section 1972, which cannot be sustained, for under the law the county is liable only under the conditions specifically enumerated in the statute.

As to the second proposition. It has been suggested that the plaintiff's action may be sustained upon the ground that to declare the county's immunity from liability for the injury inflicted upon the plaintiff would amount to a deprivation of his property without due process of law, without just compensation, in violation of the Constitution of the United States; and that this proposition is sustained by the case of Hopkins v. Clemson College, 221 U. S. 636, 31 Sup. Ct. 654, 55 L. Ed. 890, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 243.

Of course, if the plaintiff's case can be brought within the principles declared in that case, the position is well taken.

It must be borne in mind however: (1) That the act relied upon to constitute a taking of or damage to the plaintiff's property was committed by the defendant in the exercise of the common-law right of a lower proprietor to detain, divert, or repel surface water, for the protection of his own property, a right out of which no cause of action could arise; it is impossible to conceive that a case of taking or damage can be born of the exercise of a legal right. (2) That the act complained of was committed, not by the corporation, the county, but by its agents and servants, for whose nonfeasance or misfeasance the county cannot be held legally responsible, in the absence of a statute so providing.

These constitute material points of discord between the Hopkins Case and the case at bar, neither of which facts, as we shall see, appear in the Hopkins Case; the result of which discord renders the Hopkins Case entirely inapplicable.

The facts in that case were these: Hopkins owned a body of bottom land on the west side of Seneca river, immediately opposite a similar body owned by Clemson College or by the state of South Carolina; in order to protect its own bottom land from disastrous overflows, the college, by its trustees, erected and maintained a high embankment on the eastern bank of the river, the construction of which, as was perfectly natural, so narrowed the customary overflow channel of the river as to force the water in flood time across the land of Hopkins, destroying the natural bank of the river, washing away the rich soil and practically ruining the bottoms for agricultural purposes. Hopkins sued the college, a corporation, for damages and injunction. There was no demurrer, but the college filed what was treated as a plea to the jurisdiction, in which it was averred that it owned no property and had constructed the dyke as a public agent only, by authority of the state, on land belonging to the state. The circuit decree was in favor of the college. Upon appeal to this court, it was decided that the action was one in tort against the state, that the state was a necessary party to the equitable cause of action for injunction, and that the action could not be maintained without the consent of the state. The circuit decree was accordingly affirmed, and the complaint dismissed. The case was then taken to the Supreme Court of the United States by writ of error.

The main question discussed and decided by that court is thus expressed in the opinion of Justice Lamar:

"Whether a public corporation can avail itself of the state's immunity from suit, in a proceeding against it for so managing the land of the state as to damage or take private property without due process of law?"

In this main question are involved two questions, the main question in fact being a composite of the two:

(1) Was the action really an action against the state?

(2) If not, was the property of the plaintiff damaged or taken without due process of law, in consequence of the construction and maintenance of the dyke by the college, the agent of the state?

In discussing the first question, the court seems to have considered it a federal question, and declares:

"With the exception named in the Constitution, every state has absolute immunity from suit. Without its consent it cannot be used in any court by any person, for any cause of action whatever."

From this statement it would naturally be inferred that this guaranty of immunity was secured by some provision in the Constitution of the United States. As a matter of fact, the only guaranty of immunity is contained in the Eleventh Amendment, which relates to actions in the federal courts and actions between a state and citizens of another state or subjects of a foreign state. The question of the immunity of a state from an action by a citizen of that state is essentially a state question and not a federal one, as seems to have been considered.

Attention is called to this matter, not with any inclination to disregard the conclusions of the court which are binding upon this court, but that we may not be misled into the erroneous conception that the question of the state's immunity from suit in an action by a citizen of that state is a federal question.

The questions of the state's immunity from suit, and whether or not certain alleged facts constitute a suit against the state, are entirely distinct. It is conceded that, in passing upon the question of the deprivation of the plaintiff's property without due process, in violation of the federal Constitution, the question is open to the federal court whether or not the facts alleged really constitute a suit against the state; the federal Supreme Court was therefore within its rights in determining that question, and following it with a discussion and determination of the second question stated above.

It is worthy of notice that the opinion draws a distinction between the immunity of a state from suit and the immunity of a political subdivision from liability, conceding that, while the latter cannot claim the immunity from suit accorded to the state, it may claim, under well-recognized principles, immunity from liability when sued. It is said:

"If they were indeed agents, acting for the state, they—though not exempt from suit—could successfully defend by exhibiting the valid power of attorney or lawful authority under which they acted."

Again:

"Undoubtedly counties, cities, townships, and similar bodies politic often have a defense which relieves them from responsibility where a private corporation would be liable. But they must at least make that defense. They cannot rely on freedom from accountability as could a state."

And, referring to cases holding that certain boards have been held to be agents of the state, not liable to suit unless expressly made so by statute, the court adds:

We do not quite appreciate the practical results of the distinction between immunity from suit and immunity from liability; yet, following up the line of thought suggested, and applying it to this case, the county may not be immune from suit, but, being sued, it may set up the defense which is obliged to prevail that it is not liable for the nonfeasance or misfeasance of its agents while in the performance of governmental duties, unless expressly so made by statute.

It will be observed that the first point of distinction between the two cases adverted to above plainly appears. In the Hopkins Case the tort complained of consisted in the diversion of the waters of a natural water course, the Seneca river. The right to have it flow as it was accustomed to flow was a right incident to the proprietorship of the plaintiff's land as a riparian owner, and interference with that right was an actionable wrong, which was none the less so because committed by an agent of the state; if it was a wrong, the legal right to do so was necessarily denied. In the case at bar the tort complained of is the throwing back of surface water by a lower proprietor upon the land of the upper proprietor, a privilege which, under the unbroken line of decisions in this state, the lower proprietor has the right to exercise, without accountability for consequent damage; it is damnum absque injuria. Being the exercise of a legal right, and not the commission of a wrong, as in the Hopkins Case, it is impossible to make out of it a taking or damage without compensation in the sense of the constitutional inhibition.

The court further sustains the liability of the college by a kind of reciprocal argument thus:

"The embankment was in law similar to one which might have been built for private purposes by the plaintiff on the other side of the river. If he had there constructed a dyke to protect his farm, and in so doing had taken or damaged the land of the college, he could have been sued and held liable. In the same way, and on similar principles of justice and legal liability, the college is responsible to him," etc.

By analogy, if the positions were reversed, and the plaintiff, to fight back surface water, should construct an embankment along his line and throw the surface water back upon his neighbor, an upper proprietor, who might be the county, he would be immune from liability for resulting damage, under the Edwards and other cases cited above. If so, why, upon the same principles "of justice and legal liability," should not the defendant be likewise immune from liability to him?

The second point of distinction adverted to above appears with equal clearness. After deciding that the action was not one against the state, out of which would have arisen absolute immunity from suit or liability, the court holds that the destruction of the plaintiff's property amounted to an unlawful taking, upon the ground that the act complained of was committed by the college itself, and not by its officers or by the officers of the public; that it was the corporate act of the college, distinguishing the case from Gibbes v. Beaufort, 20 S. C. 213, and recognizing that case to correctly declare the law, in this state, at least, that—

"A municipal corporation, instituted for the purpose of assisting a state in the conduct of local self-government, is not liable to be sued in an action of tort for nonfeasance or misfeasance of its officers in regard to their public duties, unless expressly made so by statute."

In other words, in effect holding that, if the college had not, as the act of the corporation, directed the construction of the dyke, and the tort complained of had been the result of the unauthorized negligent acts of its employees, the college as an instrumentality of the government, an agent of the state, would not have been held liable.

In Mullinax v. Hambricht, 115 S. C. 76, 104 S. E. 309, the plaintiff sued the Cherokee county highway commission for the wrongful death of his intestate caused by the negligent act of the individuals composing the commission. The order of the circuit court sustaining a demurrer to the complaint was affirmed by this court, upon the ground that the commission, being a governmental agency, was not subject to an action for tort. This principle was reaffirmed in the second appeal in the same case, recently decided, when the order of the circuit court sustaining a demurrer to the complaint so far as the individual members of the commission were concerned was reversed.

"It is a well-settled rule that a public officer is not responsible for the acts or omissions of subordinates properly employed by or under him, if such subordinates are not in his private service, but are themselves servants of the government, unless he has directed such acts to be done or has personally co-operated in the negligence." 23 A. & E. 382.

"A public officer or agent is not responsible for the misfeasances or positive wrongs, or for the nonfeasances * * * or omissions of duty, of the subagents or servants or other persons properly employed by or under him, in the discharge of his official duties." Robertson v. Sichel, 127 U. S. 507, 8 Sup. Ct. 1236, 32 L. Ed. 203.

"Public officers are not, as a general rule, liable for the acts of subordinates, even where such subordinates are employees rather than officers, except where the negligence of such subordinates is attributable to the superior." 29 Cyc. 1445.

"Public officers and agents of the government are not liable for the acts or defaults, negligence or omissions of subordinate officials in the public service, whether appointed by them or not, unless they direct the act complained of to be done, or personally co-operate in the negligence from which the injury results. Where the subordinates have been appointed by them it is sufficient if they have employed trustworthy persons of suitable skill and ability, and have not been negligent in selecting such subordinates." 22 R. C. L. 487.

This principle was held inapplicable in the Hopkins Case, for the reason that the action was brought, not against the agents of the college, but against the college itself, the perpetrator of the tort, the corporate act of the college, as these extracts from the opinion show:

"The Eleventh Amendment was not intended to afford them freedom from liability in any case where, under color of their office, they have injured one of the state's citizens. To grant them such immunity would be to create a privileged class free from liability for wrongs inflicted or injuries threatened. Public agents must be liable to the law, unless they are to be put above the law."

"The many claims of immunity from suit have therefore been uniformly denied, where the action was brought for injuries done or threatened by public officers."

"Besides, neither a state nor an individual can confer upon an agent authority to commit a tort so as to excuse the perpetrator. In such cases the law of agency has no application—the wrongdoer is treated as a principal and individually liable for the damages inflicted and subject to injunction against the commission of acts causing irreparable injury."

"Plaintiff was denied a hearing, not on the ground that his complaint did not set out a cause of action, but solely for the reason that, even if the college did destroy his farm, the court had no jurisdiction over a public agent."

"If the state had in so many words granted the college authority to take or damage the plaintiff's property for its corporate advantage without compensation, the Constitution would have substituted liability for the attempted exemption."

"Most of them [cited cases] were actions for torts committed, not by the public corporation itself, but by officers of the law. These public corporations were held free from liability in the suit."

And, as declared by this court, in commenting upon the Hopkins Case, in Irvine v. Greenwood, 89 S. C. 511, 72 S. E. 228, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 363:

"On appeal the Supreme Court of the United States reversed the judgment of this court holding that the flooding of plaintiff's land was the taking of private property without due process of law, and that the taking was by the corporation itself for corporate purposes, and not by its officers or agents. As we understand, it was on these grounds that the case was distinguished from Gibbes v. Beaufort, supra, and other cases decided in this state."

It is said in the opinion in the Hopkins Case:

"Undoubtedly counties, cities, townships, and similar bodies politic often have a defense which relieves them from responsibility where a private corporation would be liable."

That defense is not specified, but it can refer to no other than that sustained in Gibbes v. Beaufort, namely, that, being governmental agencies, they are not responsible in damages for the nonfeasance or misfeasance of their agents in the performance of governmental duties.

The distinction is this: If the tort complained of was an act done or specifically directed by the defendant not in the line of its governmental duties, or improperly done, and resulted in the damaging or taking of the property of the plaintiff, without compensation, the defendant, even though a political subdivision of the state or an agent of the state, is responsible in damages to the plaintiff. The state cannot authorize its agent or a political subdivision to deprive a citizen of his property without just compensation. But if the tort complained of was the result of the nonfeasance or misfeasance of the officers of the political subdivision in regard to their public duties, the political subdivision is not liable, unless expressly made so by statute; the liability is that of the offending officers alone.

It is alleged in the complaint that the injury was sustained in consequence of the negligent conduct of the agents and servants of the county of Richland, and therefore comes within the second alternative of the rule just stated. Even if the work was directed by the corporation in the line of its governmental duties, and carefully done, the corporation is not responsible.

"Authority to establish grades for streets, and to grade them, involves the right to make changes in the surface of the ground, which may affect injuriously the adjacent property owners; but where the power is not exceeded, there is no liability, unless created by special constitutional provision or by statute (and then only in the mode and to the extent provided), for the consequences resulting from the power being exercised and properly carried into execution. On the one hand, the owner of the property may take such measures as he deems expedient to keep surface water off from him, or turn it away from him, or turn it away from his premises onto the street; and, on the other hand, the municipal authorities may exercise their lawful powers in respect to the gradation, improvement, and repair of streets, without being impliedly liable for the consequential damages caused by surface water to adjacent property." 4 Dillon, M. C. (8d Ed.) § 1738.

The observations of Mr. Justice Hydrick in the Triplett Case as to the applicability of the Hopkins Case to the facts of the Mayrant Case are easily reconcilable with the principle above announced, upon the ground that in the Mayrant Case the act complained of was the corporate act of the city, and did not result simply from an act of nonfeasance or misfeasance of its officers and agents. As thus construed the remark is entirely correct; but if it was intended to state that under the Hopkins Case the city could be liable for the negligent act of its officers and servants, such conclusion is disapproved.

It is a mistake to suppose, as has been suggested, that the case of Dunn v. Barnwell, 43 S. C. 398, 21 S. E. 315, 49 Am. St. Rep. 843, and other cases announcing the same doctrine, are inapplicable to cases involving the taking of property without compensation, and that in this respect they are overruled by the case of Hopkins v. Clemson College. On the contrary, the Hopkins Case distinctly recognizes the authority in this state of the Gibbes Case, which is but an earlier expression of the doctrine declared in the Dunn Case, both of which were cases of attempted imposition of liability upon the municipality for the torts of the agents and servants. The effect of the Hopkins Case is not to interfere in the least with the doctrine of these cases, for they present different grounds of attempted liability; in them liability is sought to be imposed on the corporation for the negligent act of its agents, while in the Hopkins Case the liability is imposed upon the ground that the tort was that of the corporation itself. What we recognize to be the doctrine of the Hopkins Case is that where the tort was committed by or under the specific direction of the corporation, it cannot claim immunity from suit or immunity from liability, for the reason that neither the state by statute nor the courts by decision can authorize a political subdivision or an agent of the state to damage the property of a citizen without compensation, but that, where the tort was committed by the agents of the political subdivision, whether it amounted to a taking of property without compensation or not, the plaintiff's remedy is alone against the offending servant, unless the state has by statute provided otherwise.

Another consideration is conclusive of the question at issue: If liability upon the county can be predicated upon the negligent act of its servants, it can only be done upon the principle of "respondeat superior," in the absence of a statute providing otherwise. Unlike the principle "Qui facit per alium facit per se," the principle of "respondeat superior" is based upon public policy, a matter with which the courts, in the absence of a statute, have a right to deal, and which they have the right to construe. The liability of a master for the negligent act of his servant is an imputed, not an absolute, liability, and is referable to this principle. The liability of a master for his own acts and those delegated to a servant is an absolute one, referable, so far as the acts of the delegated servant are concerned, to the principle of "Qui facit per alium facit per se." In the application of this principle the courts have no latitude. It does not depend upon public policy, but upon substantive law. In the application of the other they have great latitude. It is for them to divine what is public policy, and declare whether it demands the application of the principle in certain cases or not.

In the case of Lindler v. Hospital, 98 S. C. 25, 81 S. E. 512, the court declined to extend the doctrine of respondeat superior to a case brought against a charitable corporation for the negligence of an employee, and reaffirmed the principle in Vermillion v. College, 111 S. C. 156, 97 S. E. 619.

In view of the decisions of this court denying liability in municipal corporations for the nonfeasance or misfeasance of their agents, in the absence of a statute providing otherwise, we may safely, in construing and applying the public policy of the state, decline to extend the doctrine in such cases.

The judgment of this court is that the orders appealed from be reversed, and that the complaint in each of the cases above stated be dismissed.

HOLBROOK, Sheriff, v. JAMES H. PRICHARD MOTOR CO. (No. 12512.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Oct. 7, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Contempt \S 21—Courts \S 1—Jurisdiction depends upon right to decide case, and not on merits of decision.

"The jurisdiction of a court depends upon its right to decide a case, and never upon the merits of its decision. If it makes an order in a cause over which it has no jurisdiction, or, having jurisdiction of the cause, makes an order in it beyond its power, the order in either case is a nullity, and no one is bound to obey it or liable for disobeying it; but if it makes an order within its jurisdiction and power, it must be obeyed, however clearly it may be erroneous, and a disobedience of it is a contempt of the court."

2. Contempt \S 21—Sheriff disobeying order held guilty of contempt.

Where a sheriff has made a seizure of an automobile for violation of the prohibition laws of this state, and, following this seizure, condemnation proceedings have been instituted by the solicitor general, and one claiming to be the owner of the automobile intervenes in the proceedings, the sheriff is compelled to obey any order issued by the court in which the proceedings are pending. The case being clearly within the jurisdiction and power of the court, he must obey the order, however clearly it may be erroneous, and his disobedience of the order, whether as a ministerial officer of the court or as a party to the suit therein pending and in which the order was passed, is a contempt of the court.

Error from Superior Court, Forsyth County; D. W. Blair, Judge.

Proceedings by the State to condemn an automobile seized by R. L. Holbrook, Sheriff, in which the James H. Prichard Motor Company intervened. From an order requiring him to deliver the automobile to the intervenor, the Sheriff brings error. Affirmed.

This case arose on the following state of facts:

The sheriff of Forsyth county seized a Ford automobile containing, for transportation 21 gallons of whisky. Subsequently the solicitor general instituted condemnation proceedings under the provisions of section 20 of the act of the General Assembly approved March 28, 1917 (Laws [Ex. Sess.] 1917, p. 16). The James H. Prichard Motor Company filed an intervention, wherein it set up that it held the legal title to the automobile, by virtue of a duly recorded contract retaining title, and it had no knowledge or notice of the illegal use to which the automobile had been put, and prayed that it be allowed to intervene in the cause and be made a party thereto in order that it might set up its title to the automobile, and that it be permitted to give bond in a sum to be fixed by the court for the final condemnation money, and that upon the giving of such bond it be allowed to have possession of the automobile. The court passed an order permitting the intervention to be filed, and providing that—

"Upon the giving of bond by the within intervenor in the sum of $400 for the eventual condemnation money, as provided by law, the sheriff is ordered to deliver to said intervenor the property described in the within intervention, said bond to be approved by the sheriff or the solicitor general of this court."

Subsequently, by a petition for a rule against the sheriff, the intervenor set up the provisions of the order quoted above, and that the sheriff had failed and refused to comply with the order and accept the bond, although the intervenor had tendered to the sheriff a good and solvent bond as required by the order of the court, and the sheriff had refused to deliver the automobile to the intervenor. Rule nisi was granted, and the sheriff interposed a demurrer and a motion to dismiss the rule, upon the following grounds: (a) Under the facts set forth in the original petition, the intervention, and the rule, as applicable to the act of the General Assembly, approved March 28, 1917, it is the duty of the respondent, as sheriff, to retain possession, custody, and control of the car in question until the issue made on the intervention is determined, and, if the intervention is determined against the claimant, to sell the car as provided by the act. (b) Under the facts set up in the original petition, the intervention, and the rule, and the law applicable thereto, it is the duty of the respondent in any event to sell the interest owned in said car by the person unlawfully using the same, or to sell the car and pay over to the claimant any balance of the purchase money the jury might find was due him. (c) The court was without authority of law to pass any order, under the allegations of fact made in said proceedings, to require the respondent to deliver the car in question to the intervenor on the giving of the bond. (d) The order of the court requiring the respondent to accept the bond was without authority of law, and is therefore nugatory. The court overruled the demurrer, and the sheriff excepted.

Morris & Hawkins, of Marietta, for plaintiff in error.

Mallet & Bell, of Atlanta, and Howard Tate, of Canton, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1, 2] Reduced to its last analysis, the position of the sheriff, the plaintiff in error, before this court, is that the order passed by the trial court, requiring him to accept the bond and deliver possession of the automobile to the intervener, was without authority of law and was therefore nugatory, and that his failure to comply therewith did not subject him to attachment for contempt. This court does not agree with the position of the plaintiff in error. It is of the opinion that the sheriff, as the ministerial officer of the court, has no right to question the validity of an order passed by the court in a case in which the court has unquestionably unlimited jurisdiction. The superior courts of this state, under the Constitution and laws, have jurisdiction of all suits in cases of a civil character. The superior court of Forsyth county had jurisdiction both of the parties and the subject-matter of the case involving the seizure and title to the automobile in question, and any order passed by the judge of that court was within its jurisdiction, although the order might have been erroneous, and the only question for the sheriff, who was a party to the suit as well as a ministerial officer of the court, was one of obedience.

The jurisdiction of a court depends upon its right to decide a case, and never upon the merits of its decision. The distinction between want of jurisdiction and error is clear. When a court makes an order in a cause over which it has no jurisdiction, it is a nullity. No one is bound to obey it or is liable for disobeying it. Similarly if a court have jurisdiction of a cause and yet make an order in it beyond its power, the order is void. In the one case there is action without any authority; in the other, action in excess of authority. In both cases the order is a nullity, and affords no foundation for contempt proceedings. Ex parte Fisk, 113 U. S. 713, 5 Sup. Ct. 724, 28 L. Ed. 1117; In re Sawyer, 124 U. S. 200, 8 Sup. Ct. 482, 31 L. Ed. 402.

But if the court has jurisdiction to make an order, it must be obeyed, however wrong it may be.

"The principle is of universal force, that the order or judgment of a court having jurisdiction is to be obeyed, no matter how clearly it may be erroneous." People v. Sturtevant, 9 N. Y. 263, 266, 59 Am. Dec. 536.

Errors must be corrected by appeal, and not by disobedience. The sheriff proceeded against for disobeying an order of the court in a case in which it had full jurisdiction can never set up as a defense that the court committed an error in issuing the order. He must go further and make out that in the law there was no authority because the court had no right to issue the order or to adjudicate the case.

"Where a court has jurisdiction, it has a right to decide every question which occurs in the cause; and whether its decision be correct or otherwise, its judgment, until reversed, is regarded as binding in every other court. But, if it act without authority, its judgments and orders are regarded as nullities. They are not voidable, but simply void." Elliott v. Peirsel, 1 Pet. 328, 340, 7 L. Ed. 164.

In the case of Rogers v. Silas, 42 Ga. 541, the court, by a majority, held that the sheriff was not in contempt because of his refusal to levy an execution issued from the superior court because the court, under the Constitution of 1868 (article 5, § 17), had no jurisdiction to give any judgment or enforce any debt the consideration of which was a slave, and the fi. fa. that he refused to execute was of this character; that the court had no jurisdiction to issue the judgment upon which the fi. fa. was based, the judgment was therefore invalid, null, and void, and was not binding upon the sheriff or any one else. Judge Warner dissented from this view and held that this defense set up by the sheriff in answer to the rule constituted no legal defense; that the sheriff could not go behind the judgment or execution and attack its legality. In other words, the distinguished jurist held that the duty of the sheriff was simply one of obedience.

To sum up the whole matter, it is perfectly clear and well settled that if a court makes an order in a case within its jurisdiction and power, that order must be obeyed, however clearly it may be erroneous, and disobedience of it is contempt of court. Therefore it followed that as the superior court of Forsyth county had jurisdiction of the case in which the order against the sheriff was issued the order was valid until reversed. Whether as a ministerial officer of the court or as a party to the case, it was the sheriff's duty to obey, regardless of whether the order was erroneous or not, and his failure to do so placed him in contempt of the court's order. The contention of the plaintiff in error that officers of courts or parties to cases in courts are only called on to obey valid orders and judgments of the courts in such cases or against such officers, if true, would render many judgments nugatory. Officers and parties must obey, where the court has jurisdiction. And admitting for the sake of the argument, and only for the sake of the argument, that the position of the plaintiff in error is correct as to the law in reference to the seizure of automobiles engaged in the transportation of intoxicating liquors, and the rights of all the parties before the court, either original or by intervention, and that the court did not have authority, under the law, to grant to the intervener the right to give bond and take possession of the automobile, yet the order was within the constitutional jurisdiction and power of the court, although it may have been erroneous. There is a vast distinction between a judgment invalid and a judgment erroneous. We therefore do not pass upon the question made by counsel for the plaintiff in error as to the legality of the order passed by the judge in the present case. This court simply holds that the order, whether erroneous or not, was within the jurisdiction of the court and demanded implicit obedience, without question, not only by the sheriff as an officer of the court, but by the sheriff as a party to the suit in which the order was passed, and of which the court had full jurisdiction both of the subject-matter and of the parties.

GREATER SAVANNAH CO. v. OLIVER & OLIVER. (No. 12139.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. Oct. 24, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Pleading \S 248(3)—Amendment striking items held not to add new cause of action.

Where plaintiffs, as copartners engaged in the practice of law, sued upon a quantum meruit for a certain amount on account of services rendered to the defendant corporation, the bill of particulars showing that part of the services were rendered by the firm as attorneys, and part by the respective members of the firm as officers of the defendant corporation, an amendment to the bill of particulars, striking therefrom the items for services rendered as such officials, was not subject to the objection that it added a new and distinct cause of action, notwithstanding that by the terms of the amendment the amount originally sued for remained the same, and the amount claimed for the stated legal services was in this way increased. Huger v. Cunningham, 126 Ga. 684 (4), 56 S. E. 64; Danielly v. Cheeves, 94 Ga. 263 (1), 267, 21 S. E. 524; Wilson v. Bush, 22 Ga. App. 88 (2), 95 S. E. 817.

2. Attorney and client \S 140—Suit on quantum meruit for services may be based on monthly valuation.

The ground of demurrer that, as the suit for legal services was based upon a quantum meruit and not upon an express contract, a recovery could not be had on the basis of a monthly valuation of such services, and that consequently the bill of particulars was inadequate, was not well taken. For general advice and services of the nature and character indicated by the petition and shown by the evidence, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover ordinary and reasonable charges, fixed according to the mode usually observed by members of the legal profession. Marshall v. Bahnsen, 1 Ga. App. 485, 486, 57 S. E. 1006.

3. Verdict supported by evidence.

The verdict was supported by the evidence.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; P. W. Meldrim, Judge.

Action by Oliver & Oliver against the Greater Savannah Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The plaintiffs, as a copartnership engaged in the practice of law, sued for $2,350, for services rendered to the defendant corporation, as shown by an itemized statement attached to the petition. The itemized statement read as follows:

To services rendered to said company as attorneys, in all matters requiring legal attention since February 3, 1915, to January 1, 1919, a period of 47 months, such as conferences with and advice to the president relative to controversies which have arisen from time to time between the company and the lessee, the Newcomb Hotel Company, conferences with and advice to the president in the matter of renewal and reduction of indebtedness due by the company to the Citizens' & Southern Bank, advising Citizens' & Southern Bank on all matters requiring legal attention in behalf of the company, conferring with and advising president in the matter of claim made by the mayor and aldermen of the city of Savannah relative to defect in pavement and sidewalk due to alleged improper method of construction, during the construction of the hotel, and correspondence with the chief engineer of the city of Savannah relative thereto, conferences with and advice given to the president and Mr. Quinan in the preparation of income tax and corporation returns, both state and federal, conferences with the president and advice given relative to complaints of lessee in the matter of alleged defects in roofing, flashing, and skylights as against leakage that might develop, conferences with and advice given to president, and letter written Newcomb Hotel Company, Mr. J. H. Benton, manager, relative to obedience by the Newcomb Hotel Company, as lessee, to the prohibition laws of Georgia, which took effect on and after May 1, 1916, and services of Mr. E. J. Oliver, as acting secretary of the company for said period of time, 47 months, all for the monthly charges of $25 per month.... $1,175 00
Services of F. M. Oliver, as vice president of the company, acting upon all matters requiring the attention of the president during his absence or disability, at $25 per month, for said period of time..... 1,175 00

In response to a demurrer entered by the defendant's attorney, plaintiffs, over objection of the defendant, were allowed to amend their petition—

"by striking out of the first paragraph of Exhibit A, attached to said petition, the words 'and services of Mr. E. J. Oliver, as acting secretary of the company for said period of time, 47 months, all for the monthly charge of $25 per month, $1,175,' and by striking out the second paragraph of said Exhibit A, to wit, 'services of F. M. Oliver, as vice president of the Company, acting upon all matters requiring the attention of the president during his absence or disability, at $25 per month, for said period of time, $1,175,' and substituting, in lieu of the words so stricken, the words 'all for the monthly charge of $50 per month, $2,350.'

After this amendment the defendant's demurrer as renewed was overruled. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for the amount sued for.

In his order overruling the motion for new trial, the judge said:

"The difficulty I have in deciding the motion arises out of the want of clearness in the original petition and in the amendment thereto. The petition averred that the plaintiffs were attorneys at law, and that they had rendered certain services to the Greater Savannah Company, a corporation. The action seems to be on account for services, and the plaintiffs aver that the amount set out, $2,350, is reasonable. An 'Exhibit A' is attached and made part of the petition. After stating the services rendered, we find the following words, 'and services of Mr. E. J. Oliver, as acting secretary of the company for said period of 47 months, all [italics mine] for the monthly charge of $25 per month, $1,175.' Then follows another paragraph: 'Services of F. M. Oliver, as vice president of the company, acting upon all matters requiring the attention of the president during his absence or disability, at $25 per month for said period of time, $1,175—$2,350.'

"It will be noted that the $1,175, set out as due to Mr. E. J. Oliver as acting secretary and a like amount to Mr. F. M. Oliver, as vice president, aggregate $2,350, the exact sum claimed to be due to plaintiffs for 'services rendered to said company as attorneys.' The original petition averred that the plaintiffs were attorneys at law and as such had rendered services to the defendant. I therefore allowed an amendment, striking out the amount as to the $25 per month to Mr. E. J. Oliver as secretary and the like amount to Mr. F. M. Oliver as vice president. The petition thus amended was for services rendered by the plaintiffs to defendant as attorneys. At the end of the amendment are these words, 'all for the monthly charge of $50 per month.' The verdict was for $2,350. The defendant moves for a new trial. There are no objections to evidence and no complaints as to the charge. The movant's contention is that the verdict is unauthorized by the pleadings and evidence.

"The principles of law applicable to the case are few and simple. Thus, the evidence should sustain the allegations and the verdict should be supported by the evidence. If the contract were express—that is, if the defendant agreed to pay a fixed sum of $50 per month—then the plaintiffs cannot recover in this action. In the view which I take of the case, the action was not on an express contract, but was quantum meruit. There is evidence tending to show that there was no express contract, but that valuable services were rendered by plaintiffs and accepted by defendant. I have reached the conclusion that the averment 'all for the monthly charge of $50 per month' should be regarded as the expression of an opinion as to the value of the services—an estimate or measure of value. The issue of fact was clearly submitted, and that issue was thus stated: 'The plaintiffs, if they recover, must recover as attorneys for the services rendered as attorneys to the defendant company.'

"Plaintiff's attorney in open court stated that the suit was for quantum meruit, and I expressly ruled that there could be no recovery on an express contract. There was no averment of an express contract and no evidence of one. The jury found that services had been rendered by the plaintiffs and accepted by the defendant. They found the value of the services to be $2,350, which is equal to 47 months, at $50 per month.

"I cannot say that the verdict is not authorized by the pleadings and evidence. The motion is overruled."

F. H. Saffold, of Swainsboro, for plaintiff in error.

Travis & Travis, of Savannah, for defendants in error.

JENKINS, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1,2] The original petition, as we construe it, was not brought solely for the recovery of reasonable compensation rendered by plaintiffs in their respective capacities as vice president and secretary of the company, although this seems to be the theory on which the argument by counsel for plaintiff in error is based. Had the items in the bill of particulars definitely made it to appear that half of the amount sued for was for services rendered solely by E. J. Oliver as secretary, and that the other half was for services rendered solely by F. M. Oliver as vice president, then it would seem very doubtful whether the mere general statement in the petition that plaintiffs were a legal copartnership would be sufficient to indicate that the suit was in any wise brought for legal services. And it is the opinion of the writer that, if the original petition had been thus limited to a suit for services rendered by the plaintiffs solely in their respective official capacities, it could not be amended by setting up services rendered as attorneys, since to do so would be to change altogether the relationship of the parties to the suit. Central of Ga. Ry. Co. v. Williams, 105 Ga. 70, 72, 31 S. E. 134. But not only, as is indicated in the judgment of the trial judge, the petition set forth that plaintiffs were a legal copartnership composed of F. M. Oliver and E. J. Oliver, engaged in the practice of law, and that the defendant is indebted to the firm in the sum sued for, but, as we construe it, the suit as originally brought, and as is shown by the bill of particulars itself, was not only in part for services rendered by one of the members of the firm as secretary of the corporation, but was partly for attorneys' fees for services rendered in all matters requiring legal attention within a designated period, such as conferences and advice to the president relative to various specified legal matters, and such as certain other designated legal services rendered for and accepted by the defendant corporation,

"a3 for the monthly charge of $25." It will thus be seen that, even by the original bill of particulars, this charge of $25 per month was in part for attorney's fees on account of legal services rendered; and the effect of the amendment was therefore but to eliminate the other kind of service and to increase the amount sued for as attorney's fees, and this would seem not to be prohibited, since "an allegation in a petition, that under the facts pleaded the plaintiff is entitled to recover a certain amount, is not an estoppel in judicio which precludes an amendment that under the same facts the plaintiff is entitled to a larger recovery." Wilson v. Bush, 22 Ga. App. 83, 86, 95 S. E. 317, 318; Huger v. Cunningham, 126 Ga. 684 (4), 56 S. E. 64. Judgment affirmed.

PAYNE, Agent, v. SIMMONS. (No. 12262.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Oct. 24, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Master and servant \S 258(1), 278(18)— Liability for injuries to track worker shown by petition and evidence.

The portion of the amendment to the petition to which, by the charge of the court, the plaintiff was expressly limited as a ground of recovery, was not subject to demurrer; and the allegation of negligence therein set forth being sustained by the evidence, the verdict will be allowed to stand.

2. Appeal and error \S 1050(1)—Admission of evidence not reversible error where similar evidence admitted without objection.

If, under the ruling made in Dowdy v. Georgia Railroad Co., 88 Ga. 726(2), 16 S. E. 62, the court should have excluded, as a conclusion of the witness, the testimony set forth in the first and second grounds of the amended motion, relative to whether or not there was sufficient time to have removed the car if the plaintiff's fellow servant had not dropped his hold, this does not afford cause for a reversal, since other testimony to the same effect was subsequently introduced both by the plaintiff and defendant without objection. Matthews & Son v. Richards, 19 Ga. App. 489(2), 91 S. E. 914.

3. Instructions held fair.

The remaining assignments of error, relating to alleged inadequacies and want of completeness in the charge, are not well taken. The principles of law governing the issues raised by the evidence under the pleadings were fully and fairly submitted.

Error from Superior Court, Habersham County; J. B. Jones, Judge.

Action by Seaborn Simmons against J. B. Payne, agent, etc. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

J. J. & Sam Kimzey, of Cornelia, and W. A. Charters, of Gainesville, for defendant in error.

JENKINS, P. J. [1-3] A previous verdict in behalf of the plaintiff was set aside by a judgment rendered by this court. Southern R. Co. v. Simmons, 24 Ga. App. 93, 100 S. E. 5. Before the second trial of the case in the superior court, the petition was amended by setting forth additional grounds of negligence. While exception is taken to the order of the court overruling the demurrer to each of the additional allegations of negligence as set forth in the amendment, the court in its charge plainly and expressly limited the right of plaintiff to recover to the one ground of the amendment setting up the negligence of a fellow servant. The amendment showed that Dalton Lovell was the foreman in charge of the plaintiff, and was in control of the kind, place, and manner of work to be performed by the plaintiff: that it was his duty to give orders to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff was bound to obey such orders; that when it became apparent that the locomotive which struck the lever car, as set out in the original petition, was approaching that car, Lovell commanded the plaintiff and plaintiff's coemployees, by direct and immediate order, to remove the lever car from the railroad track, and in pursuance of this order, given in the emergency stated, the plaintiff and his coemployee, one Buchannon, took hold of the front end of the lever car to remove it but Buchannon turned the car loose and caused its wheel to hang on the rail; that if Buchannon had not thus turned the lever car loose it would have been removed from the track, and would not have been struck by the locomotive, there being ample time for its removal, but for the negligence of Buchannon in turning it loose: that, when the order was given by Lovell to remove the lever car, the plaintiff believed Buchannon would perform his part of the labor in doing so, and Buchannon did undertake to aid in removing the car, but negligently turned it loose, and the plaintiff not being able unassisted to lift the front end of the car from the track, the wheel of the car caught and hung on the rail, and the car was struck by the locomotive, and the plaintiff was injured; that the plaintiff relied upon Buchannon's assistance in removing the lever car, and, knowing that if the train should strike the lever car a wreck would probably ensue, and imperil the passengers on the train, did his utmost to remove the car from the track, and, being thus absorbed in the performance of his duties, did not observe that Buchannon had ceased to assist him, until it was too late for the plaintiff to escape from the peril brought upon him by this emergency; that there was ample time to have removed the lever car before being struck by the locomotive if Buchannon had not ceased to assist plaintiff in removing it; and that, after the plaintiff discovered that Buchannon had turned the car loose, it was too late for the plaintiff to avoid the consequences of Buchannon's negligence. By another amendment the plaintiff set forth that the injury was caused to him by the locomotive striking the lever car after he had ceased to undertake to remove the car, and while he was undertaking to escape from his perilous situation, the locomotive striking the car and demolishing it, and causing a part thereof to strike his leg while he was some distance away in his effort to escape.

The evidence before the jury was not altogether the same as that set out in the previous decision of this court, there being additional testimony particularly relating to the negligence of the fellow servant. In brief, the evidence showed that when the plaintiff and his coemployees were ordered by the foreman, Lovell, to remove the lever car from the track, the approaching train was some 250 yards away. There were four men on the lever car, including the foreman, and they united in the opinion that there was ample time for the car to have been removed before it was struck by the locomotive. On direct examination, Lovell, the foreman, testified as follows:

"As to whether or not there was time to have moved the car off before the train got there, I say, Yes, sir; if we all had stayed there, there was time enough to have moved it off."

Buchannon, the defendant's witness, whose negligence is alleged to have caused the injuries to plaintiff, testified as follows:

"We all thought there was ample time to take the lever car out of the way before he (the engineer) reached that point; we thought we did, and we went to work at it to do it."

Buchannon contended that the plaintiff let the load down on him, and testified that "the reason it couldn't be got off was because the weight was let down on me." He further testified, on redirect examination, as follows:

"When my wheel got next to that rail, the thing that prevented me from lifting the rest of the lever car over the rail—I could have lifted my part all right—Simmons gave his weight down and I had to turn mine loose."

Simmons, the plaintiff, testified, however, that the lever car could have been removed but for Buchannon turning loose. There was thus a conflict between these two as to which turned loose first, each agreeing that the car could have been removed but for the other's fault. The jury was warranted in deciding that the car was not removed because of the negligence of Buchannon rather than plaintiff, because Lovell, the foreman, testified that Buchannon turned loose first, and that the plaintiff was the last man to turn loose. Lovell further testified without objection as follows:

"You ask me if we would have got it off if Buchannon had not let loose his hold. I answer, if the rest of us had not also turned loose. Buchannon let loose his hold a little bit before we did. It all happened in a little bit. Buchannon was the first man that let loose. If he had not let loose, we could have got the lever car off the track without it being struck."

It is not necessary to add anything further to the headnotes.

Judgment affirmed.

Error from City Court of Oglethorpe; R. L. Greer, Judge.

Action by Lila B. Meadows against John Barton Payne, Director General of Railroads. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The original petition, among other things, alleged:

"That at the time plaintiff purchased said ticket and mounted said train she was sick and in an emaciated condition and that she forthwith notified the conductor who was in said train, of her condition. That she boarded said train at Valdosta, Ga., and after traveling some few miles she reached Thomasville where she, on account of her sickness and feeble condition changed cars from a day Pullman to a night Pullman. That the said train with its regular line of cars and passengers operated over the line of railroads known as the Atlantic Coast Line to the city of Albany, where its Pullman coaches were attached to the train operated from Albany to Macon over what is known as the Central of Georgia track. * * * She was assured by said conductor and porter that she would be given plenty of time and assistance at Montezuma in alighting from said train.

"Petitioner further avers that when said train reached the station of Montezuma it failed and refused to stop at said station for said plaintiff and her aged mother to alight therefrom, and in fact failed to stop at all, but pulled on through the station only slowing up at the road crossing and finally coming to a stop some several hundred yards beyond said station.

"That her said husband, C. H. Meadows, had been notified of her sick condition and the date and time of her arrival at Montezuma and that in obedience to said notice he had an inclosed automobile awaiting the arrival of said train; said auto having been stationed at the usual place for the Pullman car to stop.

"That when said train passed its usual place and stopped some several hundred yards up the track, the said husband, C. H. Meadows, drove the said inclosed car back to his home, and she, the petitioner, in the sick and feeble condition, alighting from said car, together with her aged mother, who was unable to render any assistance under such conditions, in a very dark and impassable place, up some 100 yards from the usual stopping place; the cross-ties upon which the rails rested being entirely upon the surface, and what few clinkers present were only stumbling blocks; that it was severely cold; that petitioner was hardly able to walk; that the cold and excitement was extremely damaging to her physical and mental condition; that just prior to her boarding said train at Valdosta she was rapidly recuperating from an attack of influenza; that on account of being exposed to the severe cold for an hour or more, together with the excitement attending thereto, she had a severe relapse of the influenza, which lasted for six weeks, together with a menstrual trouble from which she has not yet recovered, and which is likely to grow worse as the years go by, on account of the severe cold to which petitioner was exposed on the night aforesaid.

"Your petitioner further shows that said defendant, in not stopping his train at the usual place, did negligently carry her by and put her off some several hundred yards up the track at midnight in the severe cold weather, and on account of the negligence of said defendant in not stopping said train the said plaintiff was seriously and permanently damaged, to wit: That the injuries to her health on account of the negligence of the defendant aforesaid; that she has suffered and will suffer in the future great mental pain and anguish on account thereof; that she was greatly annoyed and suffered great inconvenience because of being carried by the station at Montezuma, as hereinbefore stated—all to her damage in the sum and amount of $5,000.

Plaintiff, with leave of the court first had, amended her petition, and for amendment said:

"A. That the said defendant was further negligent in not stopping the said train on which your petitioner was a passenger a reasonable length of time at the station at Montezuma, Ga., said county, in which to give her time in which to alight in safety therefrom.

"B. That the defendant was further negligent in not furnishing the plaintiff a safe place to alight from said train.

"C. That said defendant was further negligent in not assisting your petitioner to alight from said train at said station.

"D. That said defendant was further negligent in putting your petitioner off and causing her to leave and alight from said train at a dangerous and unsafe place, and at a place other than the destination called for by her contract of passage.

"E. That said defendant was further negligent in failing to back said train to the station at Montezuma, Ga., so that plaintiff could have a place to alight in safety from said train, when the said defendant discovered the presence of petitioner on the train after it had passed or was leaving the said station at Montezuma, Ga.

"G. That said defendant was further negligent in not announcing to your petitioner the approach of said train to said station at Montezuma, Ga., and in not notifying her when said train had reached said station."

Oct. 24, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. No error.

A careful examination of the record discloses no error of law, and sets out sufficient evidence to support the verdict.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

2. Explosives ⇐8—Petition held to state cause of action.

A petition for death occasioned by taking cap off of dome of tank car, resulting in explosion, held not subject to demurrer.

3. Trial ⇐178—Court may overrule motion without hearing argument.

Court may even in presence of jury, overrule a motion for directed verdict without hearing argument thereon.

4. Carriers ⇐83—Before payment of draft, or without shipper's permission, oil company not entitled to possession of tank car shipped "order notify."

An oil company was not authorized to take possession of a tank car for any purpose without first having paid a draft drawn on it, or without having obtained the permission of the shipper; the shipment being what is ordinarily called an "order notify" shipment.

5. Trial ⇐260(1)—Instructions as to matters fully covered need not be given.

Refusal to give requested instructions was not erroneous, where the given charge fully and clearly applied the law to the facts of the case.

6. Explosives ⇐8—Liability of oil company for explosion held for jury.

In an action against an oil company for death occasioned by an explosion, when an employee of the oil company removed the cap from a dome on a tank car containing gas and vapors reached a furnace 10 feet from the car, whether defendant was negligent held for the jury, even though it be assumed that carrier was negligent in placing the car in such location.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by Mrs. E. S. Smith against the Reed Oil Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and the named defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Mrs. E. S. Smith sued the Director General of Railroads, the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company, and the Reed Oil Company for damages on account of the death of her minor son. On demurrer the trial court struck the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company as a defendant, and the case proceeded to trial against the Director General and the Reed Oil Company. At the conclusion of the evidence a nonsuit was awarded as to the Director General of Railroads, and this judgment was affirmed by this court. Smith v. Payne, 26 Ga. App. 685, 107 S. E. 70. On the trial of the case against the Reed Oil Company alone the jury found a verdict for $7,000. The defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled, and the case came to this court on exception to that judgment.

The material parts of the evidence, which are not in conflict, make the following case against the Reed Oil Company:

In January, 1918, that company ordered from the Motor Gas Company, located in Muskogee, Okl., several tank cars of gasoline, and in February thereafter the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company received two tank cars of gasoline from the consignor, C. O. S. X. 1470 and C. O. S. X. 1459, for delivery to the Reed Oil Company in the city of Atlanta. One of these cars, to wit, C. O. S. X. 1470, was subsequently found to contain a gasoline fluid known as casing head gas, which was exceedingly unstable and volatile, vaporizing and disintegrating rapidly, pouring off fumes and vapors which were exceedingly combustible when escaping, and easily carried by the winds for several hundred yards or more. This car was brought to Atlanta by the Western & Atlantic Railroad, which was then being operated by the Director General of Railroads, and placed on the track of that railroad within a few feet of the rear of a building occupied by one Thomas, in which was an open furnace, where a fire was burning day and night, and the dome of this tank car was within about five feet of the rear of the building, and about 10 feet or less from the open furnace containing the fire. While the tank car was in this situation an employee of the Reed Oil Company acting under instructions of R. N. Reed, its president, went upon the top of the tank car for the purpose of getting samples of its contents for inspection and delivery to the state authorities, under the law. A safety valve was on each side of the cap or dome covering of this car, for the purpose of being used in ascertaining the contents of the car and detecting the presence or absence of vapor pressure, if any, in the car. This employee succeeded in opening one of the safety valves, but could not open the other. He thereupon took up an iron bar, and with this instrument forcibly hammered and unscrewed the dome cover and removed the cap thereof. Immediately upon this removal a quantity of vapor escaped and was carried by the wind into the vulcanizing plant of Thomas, coming in contact with the fire in the open furnace, and an explosion resulted, which wrecked and destroyed the building of Thomas and killed both him and the plaintiff's son, who at the time was in the plant on a matter of business with Thomas.

The car in question, 1470, was properly labeled according to the rules and regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission, showing that it contained gasoline, which rules and regulations contained direction that the car be kept away from fires, stoves, radiators, or lighted matches, and direct sunlight, and admonished the carrier to see that all precautions were taken to prevent accidents and to quickly isolate the car in case of fire. It was charged in the petition and shown by the evidence that the rules and regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission expressly prohibited any person from beating or hammering upon the cap or dome of any gasoline car, or railroad car which contained gasoline, and required a person, before opening any car containing gasoline fluid or mixture, to test the contents of the cars by means of the safety valves and ascertain what the pressure was therein, so as to determine whether or not the opening of the car would be dangerous.

In 16 different paragraphs the petition alleged negligence. In view of the disposition of the case as to the other two defendants, it is only necessary to state those allegations which refer to the act and conduct of the Reed Oil Company, either as sole tort-feasor or as a joint tort-feasor. Summarizing these allegations, they allege that the oil company was negligent: (1) In instructing its agent to enter the premises and to open and inspect the contents of the tank car while the car was adjacent to the vulcanizing plant containing the open furnace with fire, the company, through its president, as well as through its employee who attempted to make the inspection, having full knowledge of the nearness of said vulcanizing plant containing fire; (2) in giving its employee, through the president of the company, instructions to take the cap of the dome off the car while it was so near to the building containing the fire, of which both the president and the employee had notice; (3) in permitting any employee of the defendant company to inspect the contents of the tank car by unscrewing the cap of the dome, without having ascertained the absence of vapor pressure through the valves provided for that purpose, in distinct violation of the rule of the Interstate Commerce Commission; (4) in opening, through the act of its employee, the dome of the car containing gasoline, without first removing the car from the proximity of the fire. The oil company, before the trial upon the merits, presented general and special demurrers to the petition, all of which were overruled, and exceptions pendente lite were duly preserved.

Besides the general grounds the motion for a new trial contains the following special grounds:

(1) Because, at the conclusion of the evidence of both plaintiff and defendant, this defendant desired to and did make a motion for the direction of a verdict in favor of the defendant. The following colloquy occurred between the court and counsel for the Reed Oil Company:

"The Court: Proceed with the argument for the plaintiff.

"Mr. Neufville: I have a motion, your honor.

"The Court: I will overrule it."

This took place in the presence of the jury and while the said jury was in the box. The defendant contended that the counsel for the Reed Oil Company had a right to be heard on the motion to direct a verdict, and the overruling of the motion, without allowing counsel to state the grounds of the motion, was error and prejudicial to the right of the defendant.

(2) Objection was made to the following excerpt from the charge of the court:

"The defendant specifically contends that it had a right to go on this car, by its agent, for the purpose of obtaining samples of the contents, to be submitted to the state inspector of gases and oils. Well, under the undisputed evidence in this case it appears that this car was shipped by the shipper, not to the Reed Oil Company, but to itself, under what is designated as an 'order notify' bill of lading—that is, it retained the title to the car of gas and drew a draft with the bill of lading attached, to a bank in the city, with direction to the railroad company, or to the Director General, to notify the Reed Oil Company. That sort of shipment is called ordinarily an 'order notify' shipment, and under it the Reed Oil Company did not have the right to take possession of this car for any purpose without first having paid the draft, or without having obtained permission from the shipper. Under the law covering such shipments the Reed Oil Company would not have had such right."

It is insisted that this portion of the charge was tantamount to the direction of a verdict for the plaintiff. Several other grounds of error are set out in the motion, which it is deemed unnecessary to set out in this statement.

Neufville & Neufville, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Hewlett & Dennis, and Virlyn B. Moore, all of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above).

[2] 1. No error appears in the rulings of the trial court on the demurrers filed to the petition. The allegations of the petition clearly, fully, and distinctly set forth a cause of action against the Reed Oil Company, either severally or jointly with the other two defendants, and were entirely sufficient to withstand a general demurrer, and there was no merit in any of the special demurrers of that company.

[3] 2. The colloquy between the court and counsel, set out in the motion for a new trial.

was not cause for a new trial. Trial judges have the right to overrule motions without hearing argument, if they do not desire to hear argument. While the overruling of the motion to direct a verdict for the defendant, without hearing argument in support of the motion, may tend to prejudice somewhat the case of the movant before the jury, such prejudicial consequence must be attributed to the conduct of the attorney in making the motion in the presence of the jury. Any prejudicial effect from the ruling on a motion can be easily prevented by counsel before he presents the motion to the court, by requesting that the jury be ordered to retire while the motion is being submitted or argued.

[4] 3. The charge of the court, in effect that the defendant oil company was not authorized to take possession of the car in question for any purpose without first having paid the draft or without having obtained the permission of the shipper, the shipment being what is ordinarily called an "order notify" shipment, was correct. Southern Ry. Co. v. Hodgson Brothers Co., 148 Ga. 851, 98 S. E. 541; Southern Ry. Co. v. Massee & Felton Lumber Co., 23 Ga. App. 309, 98 S. E. 106; Merchants' & Miners' Transportation Co. v. Moore, 124 Ga. 482, 52 S. E. 802.

[5] 4. The refusal to give the requested instructions was not erroneous for any of the reasons stated; the charge having fully and correctly applied the law to the facts of the case.

[1, 6] 5. This leaves in the case only the main question, as to whether there is evidence in the record sufficient to support the verdict. The negligence alleged against the Reed Oil Company, upon which the verdict is probably based, was, first, the act of the president instructing its employee to take possession of the tank car and inspect the contents before it was delivered by the railroad company in accordance with the bill of lading, and the manner in which that unauthorized act was performed by the employee. The evidence is undisputed that in attempting to enter the car and find out its contents this employee violated the express order of the Interstate Commerce Commission that—

"The dome cover should not be hammered and should not be unscrewed until the absence of vapor pressure in the tank is verified by lifting the safety valve."

The employee himself testified that, being unable to lift the safety valve, he took a piece of iron and hammered and loosened the cap of the dome, permitting the vapor to escape. While this court is of the opinion, as before ruled, that the defendant had no right to take possession of this car at all, under the facts, or to make an inspection of its contents in any manner or for any purpose, in view of the fact that the car had not been delivered to the oil company in accordance with the bill of lading, yet it must be admitted that the method of entering the tank car, in violation of the express rule of the Interstate Commerce Commission, constituted negligence which imposed upon the oil company responsibility for all of the reasonable, natural, usual, and ordinary consequences. From this evidence the jury were authorized to find that the vapor would not have escaped, with the resulting damage, except for this negligent act of the employee of the company.

Even, therefore, conceding, as contended by the plaintiff in error, that the act of the shipper in loading this highly volatile and inflammable gas into the tank car, in violation of the instructions of the consignee and without notifying either the railroad or the consignee of that fact, constituted negligence, yet the jury could have inferred that the intervening agency, which did in fact cause the death of the plaintiff's son, and permitted the gas to escape from the tank car, was due to the negligent conduct of this employee. However negligent the act of the shipper may have been, it would have been harmless, but for the negligent act of the oil company, through the conduct of its employee. Whether, if the tank car had been loaded with ordinary gasoline, this negligent conduct would have itself caused the explosion, is a matter of pure speculation.

But the orders and rules of the Interstate Commerce Commission clearly indicate that gasoline of any sort is dangerous when in the proximity of an exposed flame. The tank car was within about 5 feet of the vulcanizing plant, which contained an open furnace, itself only about 10 feet from the car, and according to the testimony of the president of the defendant, as well as the employee in question, both had knowledge of the proximity of the fire to the car. The case having been fully and fairly submitted to the jury after an able and exhaustive charge, and there being evidence to support the verdict against the defendant oil company, the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial is affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

McKENZIE v. PATTERSON. (No. 12484.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Oct. 7, 1921.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. Brokers \S 82(1)—Petition held to allege cause of action for commission.

The allegations of the petition as amended plainly and distinctly set forth a cause of action arising from the failure of the defendant to perform her contract to pay the plaintiff for services rendered in the sale of real estate under an express contract for a definite amount. The demurrers thereto were properly overruled.

2. Trial \S 68(1)—Judge has discretion to reopen and permit introduction of evidence.

The trial judge has the discretion to reopen a case after the plaintiff has announced closed, and to allow the plaintiff to introduce relevant and material evidence to avoid a nonsuit. McColgan v. McKay, 25 Ga. 631; Cushman v. Coleman, 92 Ga. 772, 19 S. E. 46.

3. Husband and wife \S 138(2)—Only slight evidence necessary to charge wife for services rendered by broker.

The evidence is sufficient to show the agency of the husband for the wife (the defendant) in making the contract with the real estate broker (the plaintiff) for the sale of her property. Besides, she ratified the contract and received the benefit of it. Only slight evidence was necessary to charge her. Akers v. Kirke, 91 Ga. 590, 18 S. E. 368.

4. New trial \S 75(1)—Recovery of less amount than that due not ground for new trial.

The plaintiff having recovered apparently less than he was entitled to under the evidence, there was no cause for granting a new trial at the instance of the defendant. Smith v. Lee, 82 Ga. 674, 10 S. E. 201.

Error from City Court of Savannah;
Davis Freeman, Judge.

Action by W. H. Patterson, Jr., against Mrs. L. McKenzie. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The petition as amended alleged:

"First—That petitioner is a duly licensed real estate agent and is actually engaged in the said business in the city of Savannah.

"Second—That on the 15th day of October, 1920, Charles B. McKenzie, the husband of the said Mrs. L. McKenzie, defendant herein named, acting as agent for his wife, employed petitioner to sell the following described property, the same being the property of the defendant, to wit: Lots Nos. 26 and 28, Fennell subdivision, Thunderbolt, Ga., with improvements thereon.

"Third—That a sales ticket was drawn, signed by petitioner and Charles B. McKenzie, as agents for defendant. This sales ticket contained, among other things, that the said property should be sold for the sum of five thousand (\$5,000.00) dollars, and further stipulated that commission be paid to petitioner for his services to be $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the purchase price, this being the commission rate adopted by the Real Estate Association of Savannah and now in force on all sales of improved property outside of Savannah city limits.

"Fourth—That subsequent to this the amount specified in the sales ticket was changed, the sales ticket was destroyed, and never another made.

"Fifth—Petitioner further shows that, pursuant to the agreement above stated, petitioner found prospective purchasers in the persons of Matthew J. and Catherine Reed. Petitioner took these purchasers to the property to be sold and to the house of the defendant numerous times, and worked along between the parties to arrange all details of the sale.

"Sixth—That the defendant, Mrs. L. McKenzie, went out with purchasers and showed the premises, thereby approving and confirming the actions and doings of her agent, Mr. Charles B. McKenzie, as aforesaid.

"Seventh—That after petitioner had procured the purchasers, taken them, and shown the premises, taken them to the house of defendant, and done all other work preliminary to the sale of said property in his capacity as real estate agent, defendant or her agent, without notice to petitioner, on the 29th day of October, 1920, sold the said premises to the said Matthew J. and Catherine Reed for a cash consideration of four thousand six hundred and twenty dollars (\$4,620.00), upon which sum petitioner claims commission of $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. as aforesaid, being the sum of three hundred and forty-six dollars and fifty cents (\$346.50), which sum defendant refuses to pay."

Oct. 8, 1921.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)Master and servant \S 258(11)—Petition held to state cause of action for injuries to ship worker.

The petition in this case set out a cause of action, and the court did not err in overruling a demurrer thereto.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; P. W. Meldrim, Judge.

Action by Q. A. Griffian against the Terry Shipbuilding Corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The petition, among other things, alleged:

"(2) That on July 14, 1920, said defendant was constructing at its plant at Port Wentworth in said county a large iron vessel known as No. 1395.

"(3) That on said July 14, 1920, your petitioner was in the employ of said defendant, and was working in the lower forehold of said vessel No. 1395, engaged in constructing a tank.

"(4) That about 8:30 o'clock a. m. on said July 14, 1920, your petitioner had occasion to leave said forehold of said vessel and proceed to the anglesmith shop of said defendant for the purpose of obtaining a staple for use in building said tank; that to get to the main deck of said vessel from said forehold your petitioner had to climb a scaffolding through hatchways in two decks to get to the main deck of said vessel; that about eight feet above the main deck of said vessel in the fore part thereof is what is known as the forecastle deck; through the forecastle deck and directly above the hatchway in the main deck through which your petitioner had climbed was a circular or oval hole or aperture about 28 inches in diameter, known as the hawse pipe hole.

"(5) That at the time that your petitioner was injured, as hereinafter fully set out, there was standing on said forecastle deck, and within two or three feet of said hawse pipe hole, a portable forge, which was being used for heating rivets to red hot temperature, and said rivets were being passed through said hawse pipe hole to be used by workmen of said defendant on the main deck of said vessel. * * *

"(6) That in some manner unknown to your petitioner said portable forge hereinafter described was upset, and the heavy iron ring, glowing coals, and hot rivets were precipitated through said hawse pipe hole upon your petitioner as he stepped upon the main deck below, said heavy ring striking him upon the head, rendering your petitioner unconscious and injuring him as hereinafter set out. * * *

"(10) That it was known to said defendant that said portable forge had been located in the position where it was immediately before your petitioner was injured for several days before said July 14, 1920.

"(11) Your petitioner further shows that the proximate cause of his injuries hereinbefore described was due to the negligence and carelessness of said defendant company in permitting said portable forge to be in the position in which it was at the time that it was upset, and your petitioner injured, as hereinbefore set out, there being no necessity for its being placed so near to said hawse pipe hole, and to the neglect and carelessness of said defendant company in failing to notify or warn your petitioner that said forge was located where it was at the time that it was upset, said defendant well knowing that your petitioner would necessarily in the scope of his employment be many times during the day immediately under said hawse pipe hole and liable to be injured should said forge or part thereof fall through said hawse pipe hole.

"(12) That your petitioner did not know that said forge was in the position where it was at the time he was injured as hereinbefore set out, and in the exercise of ordinary care could not have known."

1. Judgment ~~on~~ 570(2)—Dismissal of traverse in garnishment proceedings held not adjudication upon question of indebtedness.

Where a creditor of a contractor sued out garnishment against an owner of real estate who had employed the contractor to construct improvements thereon, and the owner answered not indebted, and where a mechanic employed by the contractor sought to intervene by traversing the answer, but failed to give bond to the plaintiff as provided by the Civil Code of 1910, § 5282, and in consequence the traverse was dismissed on the creditor's motion, and where the contractor filed, as a traverse of the garnishee's answer, a denial of the debt and judgment alleged in the garnishment affidavit, which traverse was disallowed by agreement of counsel in the garnishment proceeding, and where the mechanic subsequently claimed and caused to be recorded a lien upon the property of the owner, under sections 3352 and 3353 of the Civil Code, and to enforce it brought suit jointly against the contractor and the owner, praying a general judgment against the contractor and a special lien against the property, a plea of res adjudicata by the owner, setting up the previous dismissal of the plaintiff's traverse in the garnishment proceeding as an adjudication against his rights, and the previous disallowance of the contractor's traverse in that proceeding as an adjudication that the owner was not liable, could not properly be sustained, since the dismissal of plaintiff's traverse because of his failure to give bond to the plaintiff in fi. fa. did not amount to an adjudication upon the question of indebtedness between any of the parties concerned. Gordon v. Wilson & Grady, 99 Ga. 354(1), 27 S. E. 762; Ware & Owens v. Laird, 93 Ga. 342(1), 20 S. E. 635. Moreover, the contractor, defendant in fi. fa., was not a party to such former proceeding on the issue of indebtedness between the creditor, plaintiff in fi. fa., and the owner garnishee. Leake v. Tyner, 112 Ga. 919, 38 S. E. 343; Teft v. Booth, 104 Ga. 590, 591, 30 S. E. 803.

2. Mechanics' liens \S 271(6)—Petition on foreclosure held to show that plaintiff was "mechanic" or laborer.

Where a petition to enforce a mechanic's lien under sections 3352 and 3353 of the Civil Code of 1910, alleges that the plaintiff's employer, a contractor, agreed with the owner "to repair the premises" of the latter, that the contractor, "with the knowledge and consent" of the owner, employed the plaintiff "to work on said house in repairing said house under said contract," that the plaintiff earned the sum sued for, "working under said employment," and that the contractor "earned" the amount sued for, or more—"a sufficient amount to pay petitioner—which has not been paid," and there is attached to the petition, as an exhibit, a copy of the contract between the owner and the contractor, showing that the work to be done was "to refinish by rescraping, smoothing, filling, and polishing the entire first floor, except the cook-room, of the residence" of the owner, the facts alleged are sufficient to constitute the plaintiff a "mechanic" or laborer, within the meaning of the statutes, and the petition is good as against a general demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Mechanics.]

3. Mechanics' liens \S 249, 263(9)—Judgment against contractor must precede mechanic's judgment against owner; contractor and owner may be joined in one foreclosure suit.

While there can be no valid judgment of foreclosure of a mechanic's lien upon real estate improved for labor done for a contractor employed by the owner, in the absence of a judgment in favor of the mechanic against the contractor, yet the contractor and the owner may be joined in one foreclosure suit, with prayers for a general judgment against the former and for the establishment of a special lien against the property. Columbian Iron Works v. Crystal Springs Bleachery Co., 145 Ga. 621(1), 624, 89 S. E. 751; Griffin Bros. v. Gainesville Iron Works, 144 Ga. 840, 842, 88 S. E. 201; Mass. Bonding Co. v. Realty Trust Co., 142 Ga. 499, 500(5), 83 S. E. 210.

4. Mechanics' liens \S 111(1)—Mechanic entitled to lien where his work has been properly performed, although contractor has not performed entire contract.

Where the evidence for the mechanic in his foreclosure is sufficient to authorize a finding that his particular part of the work has been properly performed for the contractor under the latter's contract with the owner, and that the amount due the mechanic does not exceed the amount earned by the contractor under the latter's contract with the owner, the mere fact that the owner may be able to show that the contractor has not performed his entire contract will not authorize a reversal of a judgment setting up the mechanic's lien.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

5. Mechanics' liens \S 95—Not affected by private arrangement between owner and contractor.

The lien of a mechanic is statutory, and is not affected by any private arrangement between the property owner and contractor.

6. Mechanics' liens \S 115(1)—Incumbent upon owner to see that contractor pays claims.

Under the mechanic's lien statute, it is incumbent upon the owner to see that payments to the contractor are to the full amount of the contract price appropriated to outstanding claims of materialmen and laborers.

7. Mechanics' liens \S 253—Claims of third persons no defense in action to foreclose.

Owner cannot defend against a suit of a mechanic or materialman, under Civ. Code 1910, §§ 3352, 3353, to foreclose a lien, by showing that others are claiming liens against the property, and thus proving merely a possible, or even probable, future liability.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County: J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by J. W. Venable against Nina Holmes. From judgment for plaintiff, the defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The main defense of the owner to the foreclosure suit was that the written contract executed by the plaintiff's employer, the contractor, and herself had never been completed. The amount of the lien claimed was $65. The agreed price for the work to be done on the floors of the owner was $115, and the contract provided that this work was "to be done in a first-class workmanship manner"; that certain fillers, varnish, and floor polish were to be used; that the owner should not be liable for labor or material furnished on the work to any one whomsoever; but that when the contract was completed by the contractor, the work accepted by the owner, and affidavits and receipts showing the payment for all labor and material should be submitted by the contractor to the owner, the contract price would become due. The evidence showed that plaintiff was employed and earned his wages by the hour, but was not a party to the owner's contract with his employer, and had no knowledge of its conditions until after completion of his work. Under the contractor's evidence the contract had been fully performed, but under the owner's evidence this was a disputed issue of fact. There was also evidence that the plaintiff mechanic had properly and fully performed his own particular duties. There was no proof that the owner had anyone else perform work not done by the contractor.

A new trial was refused by the judge of the municipal court of Atlanta, who tried the case, certiorari was sued out, and the certiorari was overruled by the judge of the superior court.

R. R. Jackson, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Carl B. Copeland and G. N. Bynum, both of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

JENKINS, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1-7] The ruling upon the question as to whether the plaintiff is entitled to foreclosure his lien until the contractor shall have first fully performed his obligations under his contract with the owner may properly be somewhat elaborated. It is the general rule that, where an owner of real estate engages a contractor to construct or improve a building thereon, and, under employment of the contractor, a mechanic performs labor in constructing or improving the building, there is sufficient privity between the mechanic and the owner to support a lien on the property. Logue v. Walker, 141 Ga. 644 (1), 81 S. E. 849. But while the contract between the owner and the contractor furnishes the basis of the laborer's or materialman's lien, where the work is done or the material furnished upon the employment of the contractor, these liens are not entirely as of subrogation to the right of the contractor to his lien. Prince v. Neal-Millard Co., 124 Ga. 894, 53 S. E. 761, 4 Ann. Cas. 615. The lien of such a mechanic is itself statutory, and is not affected by any private arrangement between the property owner and the contractor (Tuck v. Moss Mfg. Co., 127 Ga. 729 [2], 56 S. E. 1001), but it is subject to the exceptions and requirements imposed by the statute, such as that "in no event shall the aggregate amount of liens set up hereby exceed the contract price of the improvements made" (Civil Code 1910, § 3352 [2]). To this extent the statutory rights of the mechanic to his lien are controlled by the contract between the owner and the contractor, and the mechanic or laborer must show that the amount for which he asserts a lien comes, in whole or in part, within the contract price agreed between the contractor and the owner of the property improved. Stevens v. Ga. Land Co., 122 Ga. 317 (1), 50 S. E. 100. Under the statute it is incumbent upon the owner to see that payments to the contractor are, to the full amount of the contract price, appropriated to outstanding claims of materialmen and laborers. Green v. Farrar Lumber Co., 119 Ga. 30, 46 S. E. 62. The owner may defend by showing that the lien "has been waived in writing" by the materialman or mechanic, or that the owner has taken from the contractor the statutory affidavit that such material and labor claims have been paid, or that the money paid the contractor actually went to the discharge of liens created by the contractor in the purchase of material or the employment of labor. But he cannot defend against the suit of a mechanic or materialman to foreclose such a lien by showing that others are claiming liens against his property, and thus proving merely a possible or even probable future liability. Tuck v. Moss Mfg. Co., 127 Ga. 733, 56 S. E. 1001.

The lien of the mechanic and the procedure for its enforcement being statutory, it is not necessary to allege or prove that the contractor completed his contract with the owner; but the mechanic need only show a compliance on his part with the statute, and that he comes under its protection. Arnold v. Farmers' Exchange, 123 Ga. 731, 733, 51 S. E. 754. Still he cannot, in any event, recover an amount greater than the amount for which the owner has become liable to the contractor under their contract; and thus it would seem that on a foreclosure of a mechanic's lien the owner might be able to defend completely by showing that the contract was an entire one, and that the contractor, by abandoning his contract before its completion, has necessitated its completion through another contractor at an amount exceeding the original contract price and therefore at a loss to the owner. Rowell v. Harris, 121 Ga. 239, 48 S. E. 948; Prince v. Neal-Millard Co., 124 Ga. 884, 893, 894, 53 S. E. 761, 4 Ann. Cas. 615. The evidence does not, however, bring the instant case within the exception made by this rule.

Judgment affirmed.

1. Mechanics' liens §249, 271 (1)—Foreclosure of materialman's lien entitled to proceed on proper amendment; no foreclosure in absence of judgment against contractor.

While there can be no valid judgment of foreclosure of a materialman's lien for material furnished to a contractor upon the real estate improved with it, in the absence of a valid judgment in favor of the materialman against the contractor for the price of the material, and while in such a foreclosure suit, where the contractor is not a party, unless the petition alleges that the plaintiff has a judgment against the contractor, it should be dismissed on general demurrer (Baldwin v. Shields, 134 Ga. 221, 67 S. E. 798; Holmes v. Venable, 109 S. E. 176, yet, where, as here, an amendment setting up such fact was allowed without objection, the foreclosure of such a special lien is entitled to proceed.

2. Appeal and error §195—Objection to amendment not raised first on appeal.

An objection to the allowance of an amendment cannot, for the first time, be raised in the brief of counsel appearing in this court.

GEORGIA LUMBER & TURPENTINE CO. v. MILLTOWN LUMBER CO. (No. 12305.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2, Nov. 1, 1921.)

Evidence \Leftrightarrow 433(5), 461(3)—Lease describing timber sold not to be varied by parol agreement except in certain cases.

Where a lease in terms describes the timber sold and conveyed as being the timber upon certain land described as being lots of certain numbers in a certain numbered district, and contains no further words of description, but thus plainly and unambiguously identifies the property, covered by its terms, evidence that the vendor or its agent, prior to the purchase, had pointed out a certain tract of timber as being within the boundaries of the lots so numbered, and that it was understood by both vendor and vendee, prior to the preparation of the lease, that such tract was so included, is inadmissible to vary the terms of the instrument. The mere fact that both parties were in error as to the correct location of some of the true lines of the numbered lots, and were mistaken in thinking that such lines embraced timber which in fact was not included, is not a mistake that can be pleaded as such by the vendee in defense to a suit by the vendor under the contract. Thompson v. Hill, 137 Ga. 308(3), 73 S. E. 640; Harries v. Brandon, 135 Ga. 131, 68 S. E. 1040; Hall v. Davis, 122 Ga. 252(2), 253, 50 S. E. 106; Weaver v. Stoner, 114 Ga. 165, 166, 39 S. E. 874; Bell v. Redd, 133 Ga. 5, 8, 65 S. E. 90; Haley v. Ray, 142 Ga. 390(1), 82 S. E. 1058.

(a) The rule is different in a case where the plea does not attempt to show a different consideration from that constituting a part of the expressed terms and conditions of the written instrument, but where it is sought to avoid the contract as being without any sort of legal consideration, on account of its whole consideration or subject-matter being the outgrowth of a mutual mistake, or mutual misunderstanding as to its legal effect. Phillips v. O'Neal, 87 Ga. 727(2), 13 S. E. 819; Dolvin v. American Harrow Co., 125 Ga. 699(3), 704, 54 S. E. 706, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 785; Hawkins v. Collier, 101 Ga. 145(1), 147(1), 28 S. E. 632.

(b) Likewise, the rule is otherwise where, by mistake of the scrivener or oversight of the parties, the writing itself does not express the intended agreement. Kitchens v. Usry, 121 Ga.

204(2), (8), 48 S. E. 945; Brown v. Davenport, 76 Ga. 799, 800(b); Bridwell v. Brown, 43 Ga. 180, 181, 182. In the instant case such does not seem to be the purport of the plea, although in one part it is alleged that the strip of timber in question "was intended by the plaintiff and the defendant to be included in the description of said lots of land." In any event, neither by the evidence admitted nor by the evidence excluded could it be taken to be shown that the instrument itself was written otherwise than as had been intended by the parties.

1. Certiorari \Leftrightarrow 70(7)—First grant of new trial not disturbed.

2. Contracts \Leftrightarrow 296—Contractor must use material specified.

Where a contract provides that a job shall be done by the use of specified materials, the owner for whom the work is to be done and for whom the material is to be used is entitled to stand upon the express terms of the agreement; and the fact that other and different materials, which were to some extent substituted, may be shown to have been just as good as those specified by the contract, or that it was usual and customary to thus make use of such other materials in good and workmanlike jobs of similar kind, would not be sufficient to show a substantial compliance with the terms of the contract, but, upon proof of such a variation therefrom, the owner would be entitled to damages. *Cannon v. (Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. Nov. 1, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Commerce §27(5)—Employee demolishing trestle of abandoned track held not engaged in interstate commerce.

This was a suit by an injured employee against the Director General of Railroads. The petition contained two counts—the first under the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665); the second under the state law. The injury occurred while the plaintiff, with other employees, was engaged in demolishing an old trestle which was a part of an abandoned spur track. This spur track was not a part of any other track, served no purpose, and performed no function in connection with the operation of the railroad, and was not intended for future use in its operation. Held not a case within the federal Employers' Liability Act: *Payne v. 2. Appeal and error §1097(1)—Decisions on former appeal control.

As to all the other points in the record, the case is controlled by the decision of this court when the case was previously here on the same allegations and substantially the same evidence, and by authority of that decision the judgment of nonsuit is affirmed. *Gray v. HOLSTON CORPORATION v. WISE COUNTY.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Counties \S 153½ — County guaranty of payment for rock furnished contractors on roads not within inhibition of Constitution, as granting aid and credit.

A county guaranty of payment for stone furnished contractors to be used in paving county roads is not within Const. § 185, providing that "the credit of the county shall not be granted."

2. Highways \S 109 — Contract for stone by county engineer ratified by board of supervisors held binding on county.

Since, under Acts 1910, c. 47, the county supervisors might have guaranteed payment for crushed stone furnished contractors for use on county roads, such a contract by the county engineer was binding on the county, where ratified by the supervisors, and where the benefits of the contract were accepted.

3. Highways \S 109 — Contract between quarry company and road contractor held not to release county from guaranty of stone furnished contractor.

Where a quarry company contracts with a county to furnish crushed stone to contractors on the roads of the county, the county guaranteeing payment for the stone, the contract embraced all the stone which the quarry company might supply to any and all contractors, and an agreement between the quarry company and a contractor that in no way increased the liability of the county did not operate to release the county.

4. Guaranty \S 46(2) — Notice to county that quarry company claimed under its guaranty of payment for stone furnished bankrupt contractor held sufficient.

Where a county contracted with a quarry company and in consideration of a low fixed price, the county guaranteed payment for stone furnished contractors on the roads and one of the contractors was adjudged bankrupt in August, 1913, and in May, 1914, the quarry company notified the county that stone furnished contractor in July and August of 1913 was not paid for, without expressly notifying the county that the quarry company held it liable under the guaranty, such notice was sufficient that the quarry company claimed under its contract of guaranty, notwithstanding the county had money owing the bankrupt's trustee at the time of the notice and did not protect itself, but paid it to trustee.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wise County.

Action by the Holston Corporation against Wise County. An appeal from a decision of the Board of Supervisors was dismissed, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and ordered.

In this case there was an appeal to the circuit court by appellant from a decision of the board of supervisors of Wise county, disallowing a claim of appellant against the county for the amount of $2,425. A jury being waived, the case was submitted to the court upon the following agreed statement of facts:

"(1) On or about the — day of —, 1911, the county of Wise entered in a very extensive enterprise of building in the said county a system of public roads, and to that end the county and the different districts thereof voted a bond issue of over $1,000,000, which was subsequently expended in the building of the said roads, the said system of roads being completed on or about the — day of —, 1914, a very considerable portion of the whole of the roads constructed, which was approximately 130 miles, having been constructed with limestone macadam, there being approximately 45 miles of such construction.

"(2) That the board of supervisors of Wise county duly appointed and employed one William Cocke as county engineer, to whom was given over, in large part, the preparation of forms of bids to be submitted to the board for the construction of various different sections of the said road construction, and the form of contract to be executed by the respective bidders, when their bids should be accepted, and to produce for the county and through it the contractors, after they became such, limestone to be used by the contractors in the construction of the said sections of macadam road, and to procure, in advance of the letting of the contracts, the lowest bid that responsible producers of limestone material proper for the construction of such roads would give to the county.

"(3) That in pursuance of the authority thus conferred upon him by the board of supervisors of Wise county the said William F. Cocke, county engineer, as aforesaid, wrote numerous letters to the end set out in the last preceding paragraph, and among which he, on the 7th day of August, 1911, wrote to the appellant a letter as follows:

"Norton, Va., Aug. 7, 1911.

"Mr. J. S. Mackenzie, St. Paul, Virginia—Dear Sir: Your favor of August 5th received, and I too, am surprised to note that the price of 50 cents per ton f. o. b. Quarry, Va., has already been made to Wise county, as I have known nothing of it before receiving your letter. As you say this is a most satisfactory price and I wish to express my appreciation of same to yourself and C., C. & O. R. R. Co., of giving the contractor the benefit of this price, but I presume that this is the case. This, of course, with the understanding that the county guarantees to your company payment for the stone furnished. Please advise me by return mail if this is your understanding, and if we may advertise that the contractor will be furnished with stone at 50 cents per ton f. o. b., also the minimum number of tons in any one contract for which stone will be furnished at this price.

"Yours truly,

"[Signed] Wm. F. Cocke, County Engineer."

"And that the following correspondence passed:

"Johnson City, Tenn., August 12, 1911.

"Mr. William F. Cocke, County Engineer, Wise County, Norton, Virginia—Dear Sir: In answer to the proposition contained in your letter of August 11th: I beg to advise that this company will deliver stone at 50 cents per ton of 2,000 pounds f. o. b. cars at our flag stop at Quarry, 1½ miles south of St. Paul, with the understanding that stone delivered at this rate is to be used exclusively in the building of public highways in Wise county, Virginia, and the further proviso that Wise county will guarantee the payment for said stone.

"Yours truly, [Signed] M. J. Caples,
"Vice President and General Manager."

"Norton, Va., Aug. 15, 1911."

"Mr. M. J. Caples, Vice Pres. and Gen. Mgr. C. C. & O. R. R. Johnson City, Tenn.—Dear Sir: Your favor of the 12th inst. received, and I note that you will allow us the privilege of making the price of 50 cts. per ton on crushed stone f. o. b. Quarry flag stop, available to the contractors, with the understanding that the stone is to be used exclusively for Wise county highway work and that Wise county will guarantee payment for same.

"I will therefore publish in our "Instructions to Bidders" that stone may be had by contractors doing work on this Wise county highways at the above prices.

"Thanking you for your consideration and interest in our work, I am

"Yours truly,

"[Signed] Wm. F. Cocke, County Engineer."

"(4) That appellant was and is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of Virginia, and was and is engaged under its charter powers, principally, in the manufacturing and making out of limestone railroad ballast and limestone material proper for the construction of limestone macadam roads, one of its plants for the purpose of such manufacturing being on the C., C. & O. Railway, in Russell county, Va., a short distance south of the town of St. Paul, in Wise county, Va., made to the county of Wise, through its said agent, William F. Cocke, the proposition to furnish limestone material for the construction of said roads in Wise county, or such parts thereof as the county might desire, at the price of 50 cents per ton f. o. b. cars at its said Russell county plant, as shown in said letter above quoted, dated August 12, 1911, from M. J. Caples, appellant's vice president and general manager.

"(5) The said proposition which appellant submitted was accepted by the county of Wise, the county agreeing to guarantee payment for the price of said material, as shown in said letters above quoted from W. F. Cocke, appellee's agent and engineer, and, after having completed said arrangements in reference to limestone material and other preliminary arrangements, advertised extensively for bids for the construction of various sections of the then contemplated public roads in Wise county, and in the said advertisements for bids announced the price that the county had been able to procure for limestone macadam, being the price which appellant had submitted, as aforesaid, and which had been accepted by the county, as aforesaid.

"(6) That in pursuance of all of the above, one D. J. Phipps became a contractor, after having duly complied with all the requirements of the county as giving bond, etc., for the construction of two of the macadam sections of the said public roads in Wise county, one locally designated as the Coeburn section, and the other locally designated as the Wise section, and that in pursuance of the arrangement above stated, the appellant from time to time furnished to the said D. J. Phipps, contractor as aforesaid, limestone material for the construction of the said Coeburn section of said road, an itemized statement of which is hereto attached, marked 'A,' and that pursuant to the same arrangement the appellant furnished to the said Phipps, contractor as aforesaid, limestone material for the construction of the said Wise section of said public road, an itemized statement of which is hereto attached, marked 'B,' the aggregate of the two items for limestone material furnished said Phipps, contractor as aforesaid, being $2,425, said material being furnished as of the dates specified in said itemized accounts, and if appellant is entitled to recover, interest on the claim should be allowed from September 21, 1915, till paid.

"(7) That the said D. J. Phipps never paid for said limestone material, as set out in said two itemized accounts, or any part thereof, but, on the contrary, the whole of the amount set out in each of said itemized accounts is justly due and owing to the appellant.

"(8) That the said D. J. Phipps, after the said material was furnished and delivered to him, to wit, on August 28, 1913, was duly adjudged a bankrupt in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia, at Norfolk, and although the claim of appellant against him was duly presented and proved and allowed in the said bankruptcy proceeding, it is now developed and is a fact that appellant will be unable to procure anything upon its claim against said D. J. Phipps out of his assets, said assets not being sufficient to pay the costs of the bankruptcy proceedings and certain preferred claims, and so far as D. J. Phipps is concerned, the claim of appellant is a total loss, the said Phipps being totally insolvent, and any further liability against him barred by his discharge in bankruptcy.

"(9) That after Phipps became a contractor for a portion of said road work, consisting of two sections thereof, to be constructed of limestone macadam, one locally designated as the Coeburn section, and the other locally designated as the Wise section, as aforesaid, and prior to the time the limestone macadam included in this controversy was furnished, and, in pursuance of the understanding between appellant and the appellee, set forth in the correspondence herein above set forth, the appellant from time to time furnished to the said D. J. Phipps, contractor, as aforesaid, limestone material which was used by the said Phipps in the construction of said sections of road up until the month of November, 1912, at which time the said Phipps was indebted to appellant for said limestone material to the amount of $4,351.23; that at that time the appellant and the said Phipps became involved in a controversy in regard to the said account; that the appellant notified the board of supervisors of Wise county of the fact that the said Phipps was indebted to appellant in the amount above stated; that the said county was then indebted to the said Phipps on account of work done under his said contract to the amount of $4,239.95, which said amount the said board held pending the adjustment of the said controversy between appellant and the said Phipps; that appellant discontinued shipments of said limestone material to the said Phipps until after the 2d day of May, 1913, at which said date the appellant and the said Phipps agreed upon an adjustment and compromise of their differences, said adjustment being evidenced by a written contract between them, a copy of which is hereto attached marked 'Contract'; that thereafter, on the 9th day of May, 1913, when the said board of supervisors was in session, an attorney of said D. J. Phipps appeared before the said board and exhibited to the board the said contract, and informed the said board that the matters of difference between appellant and the said Phipps had been adjusted, and that the said board was at liberty to pay over to the said Phipps the amount owing to him by said county, and that thereafter the appellant resumed shipments of limestone material to the said Phipps, contractor as aforesaid, and furnished to the said Phipps from time to time for the construction of the said road, limestone material, as set forth in section six (6) thereof.

"(10) On or about the 10th day of September, 1913, after the development of the facts as above set forth as to the bankruptcy and insolvency of the said D. J. Phipps, appellant presented its said claim to the board of supervisors of Wise county for allowance, and the board then took time to consider of the same, and on the 21st day of September, 1913, at a special meeting, passed upon the said claim and disallowed it entirely, and from this decision of the board the appellant duly matured its appeal, which is now to be determined by the court.

"(11) That the appellants never gave to Wise county any notice of its account against the said Phipps, nor requested the said county to withhold payment to said Phipps of any amount due said Phipps by said county for the purpose of applying the same on appellant's said claim against said Phipps, until after the said Phipps had become insolvent and had been adjudged a bankrupt, except as appears from order of the board of supervisors, dated May 12, 1914, as follows:

"Virginia: At a regularly adjourned meeting of the board of supervisors begun and held for Wise county at the courthouse thereof on the 12th day of May, 1914, Present: Hon. E. J. Prescott, J. L. Addington, Wilburn Sparks, and Ira Mullins, gentlemen members of said board.

"The board hereby admits having received notice this day by Holston Corporation of the furnishing by said Holston Corporation to D. J. Phipps, subcontractor under T. Towles & Co., contractors for the macadam work at Coeburn and vicinity, the items of which claim for stone furnished are as follows:

July 21, 1913,	27 cars of stone.....	$ 675 00
July 21, 1913,	3 cars of stone.....	75 00

Aug. 8,	10 cars of stone.....	250 00
Aug. 14,	6 cars of stone.....	150 00

Total $1,550 00

"And the board also acknowledged having received notice by said Holston Corporation of the furnishing of crushed stone by the said Holston Corporation to D. J. Phipps, contractor of the county, for the construction of the macadam roads in and about Wise, the items as follows:

July 21, 1913,	19 cars of stone.....	$ 475 00
July 31, 1913,	17 cars of stone.....	425 00
Aug. 2, 1913,	1 car of stone.....	25 00

Aug. 14, 1913,	5 cars of stone.....	125 00
Aug. 25, 1913,	16 cars of stone.....	400 00

Total $1,575 00

"That of the said accounts for stone furnished D. J. Phipps, subcontractor as aforesaid, for macadam work at Coeburn and vicinity, there should be a deduction amounting to 5 cars, $125, and that of the said account for stone furnished D. J. Phipps, contractor as aforesaid, for macadam work at Wise and vicinity, there should be a reduction of 23 cars, amounting to $575, the said reduction being for cars that, for one reason or another, did not reach the said Phipps.

"A copy, Teste:

"W. B. Hamilton, Clerk."

"On which date there remained unpaid on account of said work more than $2,425, but this was claimed by and afterwards adjudged to belong to parties other than appellant, by the said bankruptcy court, but appellee, in answer filed October 27, 1914, made no mention of appellant's claim, nor did appellant file any petition or other pleading in said bankrupt court asserting any specific claim to said particular fund.

"(12) The foregoing are the facts and all the facts that are material to the determination of this controversy.

"(13) The parties hereto waive a jury, and upon the foregoing agreed statement of the facts submit the whole controversy upon the law, as well as the facts, to the court for its determination, each party reserving the right to except to the final judgment of the court, and, if so advised, to apply to the Supreme Court of Appeals for a writ of error to the judgment entered.

"This agreement, made and entered into this 2d day of May, 1913, by and between Holston Corporation, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of Virginia, hereinafter called the company, party of the first part, and D. J. Phipps, of Norfolk, Virginia, hereinafter called the contractor, party of the second part, witnesseth:

"Whereas, the parties hereto desire (a) to settle and compromise a controversy respecting claim for damages asserted by the contractor against the company arising from the alleged failure of the company to deliver to the contractor certain crushed stone, during the years 1911-12 and until this date, which stone was to be used in the construction of county highways in Wise county, and (b) to enter into a new contract for the sale of crushed stone by the company to the contractor to be used by the contractor in the construction of county highways in Wise county, Virginia, in lieu of said contract now existing:

"Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises and of the agreements hereinafter set forth, and of other valuable considerations it is agreed by and between the parties hereto as follows:

"(1) That the said claim for damages is hereby settled and compromised as follows: The contractor agrees to pay the sum of fifteen hundred dollars ($1,500), and the company agrees to accept that sum in full settlement of the amount now due by the contractor to the company, which amount is the sum of four thousand three hundred fifty-one and twenty-three hundredths dollars ($4,351.23), and the contractor hereby releases and discharges the company and its predecessors and affiliated persons and corporations from any and all claims for damages arising out of the said transaction respecting the said crushed stone.

"(2) The company agrees to furnish from its quarry crushed stone to the amount and of the character herein specified and to deliver the same to the contractor f. o. b. cars at its plant at Quarry, Russell county, Virginia, in such quantity and such times as are required under this agreement, unless prevented by strikes, lockouts, fires, floods, car famines, unforeseen breakdowns or other causes beyond its control.

"(3) Based upon its present plant facilities and equipment the company agreed: (a) That it will use all reasonable efforts to produce crushed stone that shall satisfy the specifications required for crushed stone in the contract between Wise county and the contractor; and (b) that it will use all reasonable effort to deliver the said crushed stone of the class and quality and in the proportions that may be reasonably necessary to enable the contractor to prosecute his construction work under his said contract economically. It is understood, however, that the classes and proportions of stone are governed by the character of the rock recovered from the quarry, and that, therefore, the class and proportion will vary within limits from day to day. Should the company fail to comply with the requirements of this clause, or if the contractor for any reason hereafter desires to do so, then he shall have the right to cancel this contract by giving the company forty-eight (48) hours' notice of his intention so to do without liability for damages hereunder.

"(4) The period through which said stone is to be furnished is from the 12th day of May, 1913, until December 1, 1913, unless the contractor desires to terminate the delivery of stone hereunder before that time and if he does so desire, then he can do so at any time he so desires by giving the company forty-eight hours' notice of his desire so to do.

"(5) The said crushed stone shall be delivered at the rate of four (4) cars per day, excluding Sundays, holidays and days on which weather conditions prevent the operation of said quarry. The company is willing, if it can do so with due regard to its obligations and commitments to the Carolina, Clinchfield & Ohio Railway, to ship more than said four cars per day, but shipment in excess of four cars per day shall be discretionary with the company.

"(6) For said crushed stone delivered at its quarry at Quarry, Virginia, in accordance with the terms and conditions of this contract, the contractor agrees to pay, and the company agrees to accept in full payment therefor, the sum of 50 cents per ton of two thousand (2,000) pounds. Railway weight to govern.

"(7) Payments for crushed stone shall be made to the company at Johnson City, Tennessee, on or before the 15th day of each month for all stone delivered during the preceding month, based upon invoices, and the contractor agrees that Wise county may, if the company so elects, retain from any amounts due or to become due him, and pay over to the company on said date each month an amount equal to said invoice price of said stone to be shipped during the preceding month. The circuit court, by the order under review, dismissed the appeal, which had the effect of sustaining the action of the board of supervisors in disallowing the claim.

E. M. Fulton, of Wise, for appellant.

C. R. McCorkle, of Wise, for appellee.

SIMS, J., after making the foregoing statement, delivered the following opinion of the court:

The questions presented to us for decision by the assignments of error will be disposed of in their order as stated below.

According to the agreed statement of facts the contract in question was made directly between the county and appellant before it had advertised for bids of contractors for the road work and the contract was that the appellant would furnish the crushed stone to any and all contractors to whom the road work was subsequently let, to be used for the road work for the county at the special price to the contractors of "50 cents per ton f. o. b. Quarry flag stop available to the contractors," and in consideration of such furnishing of the stone for such use at such price the county, on its part, guaranteed to the appellant payment for the same.

[1] 1. Does such contract fall within the inhibition of section 185 of the Constitution of Virginia?

This question must be answered in the negative.

Section 185 of the Constitution of Virginia, so far as material, reads as follows:

"Neither the credit of the state, nor of any county, * * * shall be directly or indirectly, under any device or pretence whatsoever, granted to or in aid of any person, association, or corporation. * * *

The contract in question did not directly or indirectly in any way whatsoever grant "the credit" of the county "to or in aid of any person, association or corporation." That would have been true if the object of the contract had been to benefit the contractors in any way, as, for example, to enable any of them to obtain the stone on the credit of the county, when upon their own credit they could not have obtained it, or to enable any of the contractors to make a greater profit by obtaining the stone at a reduced price because of the pledge of the credit of the county. But the contractors were not expected to, and could not in the nature of the case, derive any benefit from the contract, and it was not made for their benefit. It was made solely for the benefit to the county itself, and not for or in aid of any other.

The benefit to the county was that the bids of the contractors for the road work would embrace the item of the cost of the stone at the fixed price mentioned, so that nothing would be added thereto because of the possible fluctuation in price or of inability to obtain the stone at that price; and hence it was expected by the county that by reason of such contract with appellant it would receive a direct benefit in obtaining contracts with the contractors for the road work for a less total contract price than could have been otherwise secured. And doubtless this was the result. But, whether it was or not, this expected benefit to the county was the sole reason for its making the contract with appellant, and hence the credit of the county was used by itself and for its own benefit alone.

Lynchburg, etc., Ry. Co. v. Demeron, 95 Va. 545, 28 S. E. 951, is relied on by appellee as a holding contrary in principle to the conclusion which we have reached above. We do not so construe that case. The controlling principle upon which that case was decided is that a municipal corporation cannot, under legislative authority merely to make contracts of its own for its own benefit, become the surety for another corporation or individual for the benefit of the latter, although the municipality may indirectly be benefited thereby, for the reason that such benefit is indirect and uncertain; whereas, where the contract is authorized and made by the municipality directly for its own benefit, and not at all for the benefit of another, "the avails or consideration" for the contract cannot be diverted to any illegitimate purpose. The latter, precisely, is the situation with respect to the contract involved in the instant case, and hence it is apparent the case last cited has no application to the case now before us.

[2] 2. Is the contract aforesaid, made by its engineer and board of supervisors, binding upon Wise county?

This question must be answered in the affirmative.

The county under chapter 47, p. 62, Acts 1910, unquestionably had the authority to make such contract through its board of supervisors. According to the agreed statement of facts the county, through its board of supervisors, ratified and approved the action of the engineer in undertaking to act for the county in making the contract with the appellant; and the county subsequently through action authorized by the board of supervisors in advertising for bids of contractors and in securing the contracts for the road work at figures embracing those for the stone obtained by means of the contract with appellant, accepted the benefit of the latter contract. It is therefore immaterial whether originally the engineer did or did not exceed his authority. The county cannot at the same time approbate and reprobate. It cannot at the same time hold the benefit of and repudiate the contract.

[3] 3. Did the second contract entered into between D. J. Phipps and appellant (which alone appears in the record), subsequently to the contract aforesaid between the county and appellant, operate to release the county from the obligation of the contract with appellant?

This question must be answered in the negative.

The contract of the county with appellant was not limited in its operation to stone furnished to Phipps under any particular collateral contract of appellant with him, nor, indeed, to stone furnished to any particular contractor. The contract with appellant embraced all the stone which appellant might supply to any and all contractors for use in the road work in and for the county of Wise embraced in the road building—undertaking of the county mentioned in the agreed statement of facts, under any and all contracts of appellant with such contractors covering the furnishing by appellant to them of the stone at the price stipulated as aforesaid. Further, the second agreement aforesaid in no way operated to increase the liability of the county under its contract with appellant, and so was of no detriment to the county.

For these reasons we are of opinion that the second agreement with Phipps did not operate to release the county from the obligation of its contract with appellant.

But one other question remains for our consideration, and that is this:

[4] 4. Was the action of appellant in merely notifying the board of supervisors of the county on May 12, 1914, that the bill for stone it furnished Phipps in July and August 1913 (which amounted to $2,425, at the price stipulated in the contract between the county and appellant), was then (May 12, 1914) still unpaid, without expressly notifying the county that the appellant held it liable under the contract with him aforesaid, such action as released the county from the obligation of such contract, in view of the fact that Phipps had been adjudged a bankrupt on August 28, 1913, and the county did not file its answer in the Phipps bankruptcy proceeding until October 27, 1914, in which answer the county did not set up its liability to appellant under said contract with him, but might have done so, and (as is admitted in argument before us for the county) might have had it allowed against the balance then in the hands of the county due Phipps, which was in excess of said $2,425 claim, whereas, not having done so, the county was required to pay, and did pay, such balance over into the hands of the trustee in bankruptcy?

This question, too, must be answered in the negative.

We think that, in view of the fact that Phipps was adjudicated a bankrupt in August, 1913, the notice nine months thereafter, which was given by appellant to the board of supervisors of the county of the amount still due him and unpaid for the stone, which the board of supervisors knew appellant had furnished in accordance with his contract with the county, was sufficient notice to the county that the appellant claimed that the county was liable therefor under its contract with appellant. The notice could have had no other purpose or meaning, since Phipps was then and had been for nine months a bankrupt, with all of his assets under the control of the bankruptcy court. The notice to the county, under such circumstances could not have meant that appellant was looking to Phipps for payment independently of the money the county had in hand to the credit of Phipps. And it could not have meant that the appellant looked to the county to distribute the balance in its hands due Phipps, since the bankruptcy court alone had jurisdiction to do that. There was nothing in the conduct of the appellant, therefore, which justified the county in concluding that the appellants made no claim against the county under his contract with it. Hence we think there is no merit in the claim of the county that it was misled by such conduct, and for that reason failed to subsequently protect itself by the aforesaid course, which it might have taken when it filed its answer in bankruptcy. The county all along knew or should have known what was the obligation of its contract with appellant. On and after May 12, 1914, it knew that the $2,425 due appellant for stone furnished by appellant under the contract with the county had not been and would not be paid by Phipps, and it knew that the only course it could pursue in order to save itself harmless from liability upon its contract obligation to appellant was to obtain leave from the bankruptcy court in the Phipps bankruptcy proceedings to retain out of the fund in its hands the amount of its liability to appellant. This it neglected to do, through no fault of appellant, so far as we can see from the agreed statement of facts in the record.

The order under review must therefore be reversed, and this court will enter an order in favor of the appellant for the $2,425, amount of its claim, with interest thereon from May 12, 1914, and with costs.

Reversed, and final order entered.

RICE v. FREELAND.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Wills \Rightarrow 249—Soldier who married while in service, and who regarded wife's home as his home, had his "residence" where wife's home was situated.

Where a soldier while stationed in the state married a resident under an agreement to reside in the state as soon as discharged from the army, and where after the marriage he regarded his wife's home as his home, and repeatedly stated in letters written from France that he intended to make such home his permanent residence, the corporation court of corporation in which the wife lived had jurisdiction of the probate of his will, under Code 1919, § 5247, giving such jurisdiction to court of corporation wherein deceased had a known place of "residence."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Residence.]

2. Wills \Rightarrow 72—Soldier's letter to wife in anticipation of being killed in service held a will, though not so intended.

Letter written by husband in military service in France during war to wife, stating that he expected and desired his wife to get his property, written, as shown by contents thereof, in contemplation of possibility of his being killed in action, held a will, even though he did not intend it to constitute a formal will.

Error to Corporation Court of Roanoke.

Action between Lucy M. Rice and Mary B. Oakes Freeland. To review judgment admitting certain letter to probate as the last will and testament of John C. Freeland, deceased, the former brings error. Affirmed.

Hall, Wingfield & Apperson, of Roanoke, for plaintiff in error.

A. B. Hunt and Staples, Cocke & Hazlegrave, all of Roanoke, for defendant in error.

KELLY, P. This is a writ of error to a judgment of the corporation court of the city of Roanoke, admitting a certain letter to probate as the last will and testament of John C. Freeland, deceased. Two errors are assigned: First, that the letter in question shows on its face that it was not a will and was not intended as such; and, second, that the court did not have jurisdiction because Freeland had no residence or estate in Roanoke, and did not die there. We will dispose of these assignments in their inverse order.

1. John C. Freeland came to Roanoke as a private in the United States army in August or September, 1917. Prior thereto he had been in Fredericksburg, but for how long a time does not appear. The record dis-closes no other facts in respect to his previous residence. While stationed in Roanoke, on May 6, 1918, he was married to Mary B. Oakes. After the marriage, so long as he remained in Roanoke, he regarded the home of his mother-in-law, with whom his wife resided, as his home; and prior to the marriage he agreed with the latter that he would make his home in Roanoke after he was discharged from military service. Shortly after the marriage he went with his company to Chattanooga, where he was stationed for a short time, and then went to France. His wife remained with her mother, and received numerous letters from him, exhibiting great affection for her and an interest in the household. In one of these he wrote:

"My heart and prayers are with you and I hope my prayers will be answered and if they are I will be back to old Roanoke by Christmas or on the way."

In a letter to his wife's mother he said:

"I am always thinking about all of you and I hope that I will be back again soon for I long to see old Roanoke, Va., once more."

Again, in a letter to his sister, he said:

"The way the Allies are fighting the Germans they won't last very much longer and then I will return to Roanoke, Va., to live the rest of my days."

Freeland died in France from wounds received in action.

[1] Upon this evidence the corporation court held that it had jurisdiction in the matter of Freeland's will, and in this view we concur. The statute (Code 1919, § 5247), so far as material here, provides that the circuit and corporation courts "shall have jurisdiction of the probate of wills according to the following rules—that is to say: In the county or corporation wherein the decedent has a mansion house or known place of residence." Freeland was not originally a resident of Roanoke—he had formerly resided at some other place not disclosed by the record—but he of course had the right and power to adopt a new residence at will, by a union of intention and bodily presence—animus et factum. The evidence shows that before the marriage to Miss Oakes he agreed to reside at Roanoke as soon as discharged from the army; that after the marriage, and while still in Roanoke, he regarded that city as his home; and that he reiterated in his letters from France the purpose of returning to live there permanently. This, in our opinion, was sufficient to sustain the finding of the court in regard to his residence.

2. Under date of July 20, 1918, Freeland wrote to his wife a letter consisting of several sheets apparently written in different sections or installments. This letter was offered by her for probate as his will and admitted by the court as such. So far as immediately pertinent, that letter was as follows:

"Now, sweetheart, don't worry about the lotment or insurance for you will get everything that is coming to me. We are so we can hear the guns roar most of the time and soon will be on the firing line, but the sooner we get there the sooner the war will be over, and then I will return to the one I love best. Tell little Mamie to write to me too and all the rest of the folks. * * * I will write to the New York bank and have them send my liberty loan bond money to you and you can do whatever you think best with it. * * * I am not coming back until this war is over and then I will return to you. I have fixed the insurance and lotment so you will get it alright."

A number of other letters were introduced in evidence for the purpose of showing the alleged testator's situation and surroundings, and his regard for his wife. They clearly show, as does the one of July 20, 1918, that she was the principal object of his concern and affection; and, while many of them express the hope on his part of an early return to Roanoke, they leave no room to doubt that they were written in contemplation of the probable fate which soon overtook him. For example, in September, 1918, he wrote her a letter in which he said this:

"I will always be trueful to you and keep you in my mind for I am coming back to you just as I came away from you if I live to get back, and if nothing happens I will be back alright."

Again, he wrote:

"I don't think this war will last only to Xmas. Anyway, I hope not, for I want to come back to you and I want to come back alive too, and I may have some wounds but I hope I won't have many, anyway, but I can't tell anything about it for the shells you know is some hot over here sometimes."

The case is not free from difficulty if we adhere strictly and rigidly to a literal application of the rule as generally expressed, that a paper to operate as a will must have been intended as such at the time it was written. We are frankly, and we believe properly, relaxing in some measure the ordinary rules of construction in this case, and we are doing so in recognition of the general tendency of the Legislatures and the courts to treat soldiers in actual service as belonging to a class of persons entitled to public gratitude and to special consideration in respect to their private and property interests. It is said in Schouler on Wills and Administration, § 38, that—

"Seamen and soldiers are treated with peculiar indulgence in our law as a class of persons not only entitled to public gratitude but as requiring in a measure public protection against their own improvidence and the wiles to which they are exposed."

[2] While this is not a case in which there is any occasion to protect the estate of the soldier against "the wiles to which he was exposed," it is a case in which he appears to have been somewhat careless and improvident in the making of technically accurate and correct provision for the disposition of his estate. Upon a careful consideration of the letter which the court admitted to probate, and in the light of the circumstances above detailed, we have reached the conclusion that the corporation court was right in according testamentary effect thereto. We have no doubt whatever that the letter was written in direct contemplation of the fact that the writer might not survive the war, and was a definite expression of the disposition which in that event he desired to have made of whatever property he might leave behind. It is true, as argued for the plaintiff in error, that the allotment referred to was an allowance which Freeland was required by federal statute to make to his wife out of his pay; and it is also true that in referring to the insurance he said that he "had fixed" that as well as the allotment so that his wife would get it all right. This is not in itself testamentary language, but it is not in serious conflict with the general intention otherwise sufficiently expressed, as we think, in the same letter, that he expected and desired her to get all of his property.

In the case of McBride v. McBride, 26 Grat. (67 Va.) 476, relied upon for the plaintiff in error, the court through Judge Staples, in laying down the general principles applicable to cases involving questions of testamentary intent, said:

"It is not necessary to the validity of the will that it should have a testamentary form, or that the" testator "should know that he had performed a testamentary act, or that he should intend to perform such act."

And while there are expressions in that case which tend strongly to support the argument that the paper admitted here as Freeland's will ought not to be regarded as a testamentary document, we do not think, regarding the opinion as a whole, that there is any conflict therein with the decision of the lower court in this case. The testator, Freeland in all probability did not think he was writing a will, but he was expressing in writing what he desired to be done with his property, including his insurance, which is admitted to be practically the only estate of consequence involved here, in case of his death in action.

The English case of Gattwood v. Knee, 4 B. R. C. 910, 1 Law Rep. 1902, Probate Div. p. 99, is somewhat in point. In that case William Knee, a private in a branch of the British army, wrote a letter to William Gattwood which, after Knee's death, was admitted to probate as a will. The letter, like the one involved in this case, spoke of other things, but contained this language:

"I am sending a box of things to you which I want you to look after for me until I come home. * * * They are a lot of curios and there is some things for you there; but if you have a letter saying that I am killed then the lot is for you. * * * You will receive the lot if I am killed in action for I shall make out my will in your favor; so you can keep this letter in case you want it for anything, but let us hope that I arrive home safe again."

The probate of this letter was resisted, and it was contended that the document ought not to be treated as a will because it contained the words, "I shall make out my will in your favor," thus showing that the writer did not intend that particular document to be the will. This contention was overruled and the letter was given testamentary effect. We are unable to see any very substantial distinction between that case and the one at bar. It is true that Knee's letter expressly referred to a future will, but no other will was ever executed. In the instant case Freeland's letter said: "You will get everything that is coming to me," and later on added that he had fixed the insurance and allotment so his wife would get it all right. The record indicates that previous to his marriage he had named some other beneficiary in the insurance policy, and, so far as appears, he had not effectively "fixed" the insurance so his wife would get it. The point is, however, that neither in the Knee Case nor in this case did the writer of the letter in question believe that he was making a will, and yet the English court in the Knee Case and the corporation court of Roanoke in this case (properly, as we think) held that the writer had made a testamentary disposition of his property, because he had stated in writing what he intended and desired to be done with his property after his death.

In Virginia the policy of liberality and relaxation in favor of soldiers and seamen with respect to the making of wills of personal property finds legislative recognition in section 5231 of the Code. No real estate appears to have been owned by Freeland. Expressly limiting our decision to the facts of this particular case, we are of opinion that the judgment complained of was right, and the same will be affirmed.

Affirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Dickenson County.

Suit by William J. Branham and another against Wilson Bros. and another. Decree for complainants, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Sale & Harris, of Richmond, and Chase & McCoy, of Clintwood, for appellants.

A. A. Skeen, of Clintwood, Phipps & Phipps, of Clintwood, O. M. Vicars, of Wise, J. W. Flannagan, Jr., of Grundy, and Geo. C. Peery, of Tazewell, for appellees.

SAUNDERS, J. This is an appeal from a decree of the circuit court of Dickenson county, pronounced October 15, 1919. The main question presented for determination is the proper interpretation and true construction of a deed made by Felix Senter, M. L. Senter, and Winnie Senter, his wife, A. C. Senter and M. J. Senter, his wife, to Caroline Harris.

The pertinent facts necessary for an adequate understanding of the genesis and development of this controversy are as follows:

In the year 1904, M. L. Senter, A. C. Senter, and their wives, and Felix Senter, for value received, conveyed certain standing trees in the county of Dickenson to one Caroline H. Harris. This conveyance, so far as is needful, is herewith reproduced:

"The parties of the first part bargain, sell, grant, and convey unto the party of the second part, or assigns, with covenants of general warranty of title, freedom from all incumbrances, and peaceable and quiet possession, the following property, viz: Six hundred and forty-three (643) white oak trees 20 to 40 inches in diameter, six hundred and forty-three (643) white oak trees over 24 inches in diameter. All of said trees containing from 24 feet and over of straight trunk, or body, clear of limbs and visible defects, and are branded, or marked with letter H cut in the bark, and are standing and growing on the land of the said first parties, located on the waters of Cane creek of Pound river, and bounded and described as follows: * * *

"The parties of the first part grant unto said second party, his heirs and assigns, the right to enter on said land at any time free of charges or damages, for the purpose of cutting, manufacturing, and removing said trees or their products from the land, and for that purpose grant unto the party of the second part, or his assigns, the right to build and open all wagon roads, train roads, or station roads on, through or over said lands. The parties of the first part grant unto said second party, or assigns, free of cost, the right to erect mills on said land for the purpose of cutting said trees into lumber or into staves. The party of the second part, or assigns, has the right to use free of charge sufficient timber for necessary tramroads on said tract of land, so that no valuable, merchantable timbers shall be used for said tramroads. The party of the second part or his assigns are to have ten years from March 10, 1902, in which to cut and remove said trees from said lands, and if the party of the second part or his assigns shall fail to cut and remove said trees from said land within ten years from March 10, 1902, then the parties of the first part, or the owners of the land, shall have the right to deaden such of said trees as may be standing upon said land, which the owner may clear for cultivation. The said first parties covenant with the party of the second part that their title to said tract of land is perfect, and that they have a perfect right to sell and convey said trees, together with rights and privileges herein set forth."

The rights, titles, and interest derived by Caroline Harris under this deed passed by successive conveyances, until finally they were lodged in W. H. and F. G. Wilson. It will be noted that under the Senter deed relating to the white oak trees on the lands of the Senters, Caroline Harris, the vendee of the Senters, was given the right to enter at any time upon the lands described in her deed, and cut and remove the trees therein conveyed to her. Title to the lands on which these trees were growing remained in the grantors.

The bill in this case is filed by W. J. Branham and William McKinley Phipps. These parties are the grantees in a deed bearing date September 5, 1917, from Josephine H. Stanley and John W. Stanley, her husband. W. J. Branham was the grantee in a deed from the same parties, of date September 4, 1916. This latter deed conveyed to the said Branham, with general warranty, the standing trees on the lands of the said Josephine Stanley, the same "being originally a part of the tract of land of the aforesaid Felix Senter, and a part of the land recovered by Josephine Stanley in the chancery cause of Josephine Stanley v. M. L. Senter and others." Some of the trees comprehended in this conveyance, to wit, 341 white oak trees branded H, were a part of the trees embraced in the deed supra from the Senters to Caroline Harris, and are referred to as the Caroline H. Harris timber. The timber conveyed by Josephine Stanley to Branham stood upon land which the said Josephine owned in fee, but it is not necessary to trace in detail her title in this respect. Suffice it to say that it was duly derived. The deed of September 4, 1916, gave the grantee full right to cut and remove during a specified period the timber conveyed.

Subsequent to the deed ubi supra, Wm. McKinley Phipps purchased from Branham a one-half interest in the 341 white oak trees branded H—that is to say, the Caroline Harris timber. Thereafter, on September 5, 1917, the said Josephine Stanley and her husband, by a deed which recited the trees sold to Branham, and the terms of sale, and the purchase from Branham by Phipps of a one-half interest in the said 341 trees, enlarged the period within which the said trees could be removed from Mrs. Stanley's lands by said Branham and Phipps.

Some time in June, 1919, Branham and Phipps filed a bill in chancery in the circuit court of Dickinson county, claiming to be the owners of the 341 branded trees aforesaid, and alleging that W. H. Wilson and F. G. Wilson, doing business as Wilson Bros., and one G. H. Holmes, were cutting and removing said trees. The plaintiffs asked for an injunction restraining the activities of Wilson Bros. and Holmes, also an account of damages. About the time that Branham and Phipps applied for this injunction against Wilson Bros. and Holmes, as recited supra, the W. M. Ritter Lumber Company, a corporation, made application for like relief on the same grounds against the same parties. The lumber company claimed that it was seized and possessed of all of the trees and timber of every kind on a 100-acre tract, the former property of Josephine Stanley, and traced its title as follows: (1) By deed to said company from O. M. Vicars and wife, George C. Peery and wife, and Columbus Phipps and wife, dated May 29, 1917. This deed, conveys to the Ritter Lumber Company, with general warranty, all of the timber of every description on the 100-acre tract supra, with complete rights, etc., of cutting and removing same within a specified period.

Looking to the deeds from Josephine Stanley and husband to Vicars and associates, predecessors in title to the lumber company, it will be noted that the grantors convey to the said Vicars and associates the 100-acre tract in fee, making no reference to the timber on same. These deeds are three in number, bearing date, respectively, April 3, 1914, March 15, 1915, and October 14, 1915. The first deed in point of time was made when Josephine Stanley was an infant. The second deed ratifies the deed of April 3, 1914. The deed of October 14, 1915, makes a correction in the description and acreage of the land referred to in the prior deeds. But, as stated supra, there is no reference to timber in any one of the three deeds, all of which are prior in time to the deed of Josephine Stanley and her husband to William J. Branham. It is not needful to trace in full detail the title of the Ritter Company through Josephine Stanley to Felix Senter. Evidently Vicars, Peery, and Phipps, as the owners in fee of the 100-acre tract, claimed to own all the standing timber thereon. The bill of the lumber company alleged that Wilson Bros. and Holmes were cutting the standing timber on said 100-acre tract—that is, the Caroline Harris timber—and, like Branham and Phipps, it asked for an injunction restraining these acts and an account of damages.

In vacation of the circuit court of Dickinson county, on June 2, 1919, a preliminary injunction was awarded in the case of Ritter Lumber Company v. Wilson Bros. and Holmes. On June 12th a like order of injunction was entered in the case of Branham and Phipps against the same defendants.

The defendants later filed an answer in each of the foregoing cases.

In their answer in the case of Branham and Phipps v. Wilson Bros. and Holmes, Wilson Bros. claimed the 341 branded white oak trees standing and growing on the lands of Josephine Stanley. They denied that any right, title, or interest in these trees passed to the plaintiffs under the deeds from Stanley and wife. Further, the respondents set up their chain of title to said timber and trees, the same being the deed supra from the Senters to Caroline Harris, and successive conveyances thereafter; the last in the series being the deed of John Golding and Herbert A. Beard and their wives. By these deeds all the right, title, and interest of Caroline Harris in the timber aforesaid passed to and was finally lodged in respondents, the said W. H. and F. G. Wilson. The answer denied that respondents had done anything to lose or forfeit the estate and rights derived through conveyances in course from Caroline Harris, or that they, or their predecessors in title, "had ever abandoned said trees, or any of them." On the contrary, they asserted that they "had at all times claimed the same, and paid the taxes from year to year on the same, and have at all times asserted, and are now asserting, their ownership of said trees and timber, and the right to cut and remove the same." A like answer was filed in the suit of Ritter Lumber Company v. Wilson Bros. and Holmes. There are other allegations of the bills and answers, and facts developed by the testimony, that will be referred to in the discussion of the legal questions presented in this case.

After the pleadings were completed in the foregoing causes, voluminous depositions in behalf of the respective parties were taken and filed; the testimony in the one case being used in the other. Upon the final hearing of the foregoing causes, decrees were respectively entered sustaining the contention of the complainants, and perpetuating the injunctions originally awarded. From these decrees appeals were secured by the defendants, Wilson Bros. and G. H. Holmes, bringing the entire controversy before this court for review.

In the chain of title from Caroline Harris, grantee of the Senters, to the Wilsons is the deed of Beard and Golden, the immediate predecessors in title of Wilson Bros., to wit, W. H. and F. G. Wilson. This deed bears date September 10, 1912. Under its authority Wilson Bros. began to cut the Caroline Harris timber in that year, continuing their operations into the year 1913. Holmes was their active agent in the woods. Owing to scarcity of labor and difficulties in transporting the lumber, the work was finally discontinued after a portion of the timber had been cut and at considerable expense floated down Pound river. The trees in question were on Cane creek, an affluent of Pound river. There was no railroad within reach during the foregoing period of operations. Hence, in order to reach their market, the defendants were compelled to float their timber down Cane creek to Pound river, and thence through the Breaks of Cumberland to the Big Sandy river. This venture proved to be difficult, costly, and unsatisfactory. Some years after the discontinuance of the initial operations, Wilson Bros. resumed the cutting of the oak trees on the Stanley tract. This was in 1919. Timber having increased in value in the meantime, and labor become easier, defendants hoped to make their venture profitable. The interruption of these and other operations by the injunctions of the several plaintiffs has been recited.

Complainants allege in their bills respectively: (1) That, whatever the original rights of the defendants under the Harris deed, the timber under that deed had reverted to the owners of the land; (2) that, if there was no reverter, the defendants had lost title to this timber by abandonment. It is fundamental, therefore, to ascertain the rights of defendants—i. e., the Wilson Bros.—under the deed from the Senters to Caroline Harris. The inquiry into the charge of abandonment will follow in due course.

The contention of the appellants is: (a) That the Senter deed conveying the timber to Caroline Harris conveyed an absolute estate in the timber, unlimited as to time of removal, with the right to the grantors, or to the then owners of the land, at the expiration of a period of 10 years from March 10, 1902, to deaden such of said trees as might then be standing on land which the owners desired to clear for cultivation; (b) that, if this contention is not sound, then the grantee in said Senter deed had a reasonable time after the expiration of the 10-year period within which to cut and remove said trees, and that such reasonable time had not elapsed when the defendants were restrained by the orders of court supra.

The appellees specifically insist that under the Senter deed Caroline Harris had a period of 10 years from March 10, 1902, within which to cut and remove the trees from the land in question, and that any trees uncut and unremoved at the expiration of said period became the property of the grantors, their grantees and assigns; further, that if this contention is not well taken, and it is considered that after the expiration of the 10-year period the said Harris was entitled to a reasonable time thereafter within which to cut and remove said trees, such reasonable time had elapsed before Wilson Bros. began their operations in 1919.

There are two noteworthy clauses in the Senter deed:

(a) "The parties of the first part grant unto the second party, his heirs and assigns, the right to enter upon said land at any time * * * for the purpose of cutting, manufacturing, and removing said trees, or their products, from the land, and for that purpose grant unto the party of the second part, or his assigns, the right to build and open all wagon roads," etc.

(b) "The party of the second part, or his assigns, are to have ten years from March 10, 1902, in which to remove said trees from said lands, and if the party of the second part, or his assigns, shall fail to cut and remove said trees from said land within ten years from March 10, 1902, then the parties of the first part, or the owners of the land, shall have the right to deaden such of said trees as may be standing upon said land which the owner may clear for cultivation."

The primary inquires in this case are: (1) Whether it is possible for parties to make a contract whereby one would be entitled to a perpetual right to enter upon the lands of another, and remove timber therefrom; (2) if such a contract is possible, did Caroline Harris secure a right of that character under her deed from the Senters?

[1] There seems to be no sufficient reason why the owner in fee of lands producing standing timber should not be able to make an absolute conveyance of such timber, with unlimited time for entry and removal of same. "The right of an owner to carve out of his property as many estates, or interests (perpendicular or horizontal, perpetual or limited), as it may be able to sustain, cannot be open to doubt."

[2] It is incident to the rights of the owner of the fee, and in line with well-established policy which allows the free and untrammelled disposition of estates, that such owner may do what he will with his own, unless his intended disposition is contrary to public policy, or to some positive rule of law. We know of no public policy or rule of law, which forbids the owner of standing timber to convey an absolute estate in such timber, with an unlimited time for removal. The whole matter rests in the intention of the parties, and if it is clear that the owner intends to give such an estate, and the language used is adequate to that end, it is not for the courts to concern themselves with the wisdom or unwisdom of the owner's action. There are many cases supporting this power of disposition of the owner of lands over his standing timber, and, so far as we are aware there are none that deny it. A few authorities directly in point will be cited in this connection.

In Hicks v. Phillips, a Kentucky case, the grantor conveyed certain real property by deed containing the following clause:

"Said Phillips [the grantor] reserves the timber [on described land], * * * also all the rails made, and cut timber for rails, * * * lying on said land."

The heirs of the grantee brought a bill to quiet title, setting forth that more than 37 years had elapsed since the above reservation, during which time appellees had failed to take any steps to remove the timber, and that a forfeiture by reason of failure to remove had taken place. The court said:

"On the whole, * * * the correct rule is laid down in Patterson v. Graham, supra, where it was held that one may buy growing timber with no intention of manufacturing it, and may hold it just as he might buy and hold the land, if he so frame his contract; but that, where the parties intend that the timber shall be severed from the land, and no time is fixed therefor, the law implies that the grantee will remove it within a reasonable time. So, too, the vendor of land may wish to reserve the timber thereon, not with a view of cutting and removing it, but with a view of its ultimate enhancement in value when proper transportation facilities afford him a market. If so, he should be permitted to contract accordingly. But it is insisted that this will impose a heavy burden on the vendee of the land by defeating for an indefinite period of time the culture and improvement of the soil. If so, it will be a burden that he knowingly and voluntarily assumes. However, we apprehend that in the great majority of cases the burden will be more imaginary than real, for ordinarily the fact that the timber may be stolen, or may be destroyed by decay, by storm, or by fire, or may be lost in some other way, will be a sufficient incentive to the owner not to postpone indefinitely its severance from the soil." Hicks v. Phillips, 146 Ky. 305, 142 S. W. 394, 47 L. R. A. (N. S.) 878.

In Clap v. Draper, a Massachusetts case, the following state of facts is revealed: A tract of land was conveyed to grantee. Thereupon the grantee reconveyed to the grantor, "his heirs and assigns," all timber and trees growing and standing on said land forever, with full right "to cut and carry away said trees * * * at all times at their pleasure forever." The owner of the land cut and carried away some of these trees, and the owner of the trees thereupon brought trespass. The court held:

"The result of this joint construction is that the grantor conveyed the close to the grantee in fee, reserving to himself an inheritance in the trees and timber, not only then growing, but which might thereafter be growing in the close. This is the natural effect of the grantee's agreement that the grantor and his heirs should have all the trees and timber standing and growing on the close forever, and not merely those then standing, or which should be standing within a limited time, and of a perpetual license to cut and carry them away. The plaintiff having all the estate in the trees, timber, and close which the grantor had after the execution of these two deeds, he has an inheritance in the trees and timber, with an exclusive interest in the soil so far only as it may be necessary for the support and nourishment of the trees." Clap v. Draper, 4 Mass. 266, 267, 8 Am. Dec. 215, 216.

In France v. Deep River Logging Co., the court was asked to construe certain language giving to one Mooers and his assigns the right to enter upon a tract of land and remove certain timber and trees therefrom "at the pleasure of the grantee, his heirs, personal representatives and assigns, * * * forever." Held that—

This language pointed "conclusively to an intention on the part of the grantor to convey a continuing, perpetual right for all time, to enter upon the land and remove the timber. The grantee's assigns or descendants may do so a hundred years hence. Grants in substance the same as this were held by us to have such effect." France v. Deep River Logging Co., 79 Wash. 336, 140 Pac. 361, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 238.

In the case of Lodwick Co. v. Taylor, the grantor "bargained, sold, and released unto the" grantee, "heirs and assigns, forever, in fee simple, * * * all the timber" on certain lands, with general warranty. Held:

"The deed unmistakably expresses the intention to convey the timber as an interest in the land on which it stood, and to convey it in fee simple and forever. It is a well-settled proposition that trees may be so conveyed or reserved in a deed as to leave in one person a title in fee in the soil generally and in another a like title in the timber. * * * The very terms of the deed, when it says the title is conveyed in fee simple forever, answer any question that might otherwise arise as to the nature and duration of the right granted." Lodwick Co. v. Taylor, 100 Tex. 270, 272, 98 S. W. 238, 239, 123 Am. St. Rep. 805.

The following citation is taken from the opinion of the court in the case of R. M. Cobban Realty Co. v. Donlan:

"In its essentials, deed A, conveying the timber with the right of entry to cut and remove the same, differs not from a grant or reservation of coal or minerals, with a similar right of entry to mine and remove. [Italics supplied.] That such a grant or reservation, couched in the terms employed in deed A, would be absolute, no one would deny; and in fact McGrath did * * * for the consideration paid * * * grant such an estate in the timber with right of entry for cutting, skidding, and removing the same so long as any of it remained, we hazard the opinion that apter words to express that intention could not have been chosen than those which were actually employed." "Owners of property have the right to be foolish as well as wise, prodigal as well as provident; and, whichever they are, it is the business of the courts to enforce their contracts freely made and plainly expressed." R. M. Cobban Realty Co. v. Donlan, 51 Mont. 58, 67, 149 Pac. 484, 487.

In Magnetic Ore Co. v. Marbury Lumber Co., which was a controversy concerning the estate taken in standing timber, the court said:

"The title passed to the purchaser, and we see no reason for giving to words used in a deed of conveyance of trees a different meaning than that given when used in a deed of conveyance of minerals or any other portion of the realty; there being nothing in the instrument to control or vary their usual signification." Magnetic Ore Co. v. Marbury Lumber Co., 104 Ala. 465, 470, 16 South. 632, 633, 27 L. R. A. 434, 435, 53 Am. St. Rep. 73.

In Baker v. Kenney, the following language was construed:

"* * * Do grant and convey unto the said party of the second part, his executors, administrators, and assigns, all timber and growth of timber" on said land. "To have and to hold unto the said party of the second part, his executors, administrators, and assigns forever," with the privilege at all times to enter said lands for the purpose of cutting and hauling the timber therefrom.

Said the court:

"The language of the instrument before us indicates that the parties contemplated the right on the part of defendant and his administrator or assigns to take timber and growth of timber from the described land. There is not only a failure to fix a time limit, but the habendum clause expressly describes the right as one which was to exist forever. It is true in neither the granting clause nor the habendum are the heirs of the grantee mentioned, and at common law the grant would be construed to be for life only. But in this state 'the term "heirs," or other technical terms or words of inheritance, are not necessary to create and convey an estate in fee simple.' (This is also true in Virginia.) "If a grantor, desiring to prepare an instrument which would convey to the grantee a fee-simple title to the incorporeal hereditament described in the instrument as the right to take timber and growth of timber from designated land, should attempt to frame a deed for that purpose, he could not, having regard to the laws of this state, do so in apter words than those used in the instrument before us, and we reach the conclusion that such was his purpose." Baker v. Kenney, 145 Iowa, 638, 645, 124 N. W. 901, 904 (139 Am. St. Rep. 456).

In Butterfield Lumber Co. v. Guy, the following language was construed, the plaintiff claiming that the timber had reverted by reason of the failure to remove same within a reasonable time:

"We convey and warrant to" the grantee "all the green pine timber on" the lands designated. "We further convey the right to enter upon said land with log carts and log wagons to remove said timber off said land."

This deed was made in 1892, and the suit claiming a reverter of the standing timber was brought in 1906. The court held as follows:

"The deed is a simple conveyance by warranty in fee simple of the timber, without time limit or conditions. In every essential necessary to convey a fee interest in the trees, the deed conforms to the requirements of the statutes. * * * No question of public policy is involved in this deed, so as to avoid it. The owner of the land was the owner in fee, and he might carve it up into as many different sorts of estates as the land was susceptible of, and make a good and valid deed in fee simple to each. If he has done so, and finds it inconvenient or improvident, the courts will not destroy the property rights of his vendees in order to relieve him from his own improvidence. * * *

"The practical effect of the bill is to ask the court to write into the deed what is claimed was the intention of the parties as the legal sequence of the contract made, though the instrument itself is silent as to any such intention. If the conditions sought to be ingrafted on this contract by the complainant are to be put there, it must be done by the court writing into the deed for the benefit of one of the parties a clause which is at variance with his own contract and destructive of the property right of the other party, which property right was bought from, and consideration paid to, the party asking to have same canceled. The interest of the purchaser of this timber under his deed has no less claim to the protection of the law than the interest which the seller retains in the soil. The seller of this timber seeks to have the court do that which is in plain conflict with the rights which he has conveyed. By warranty deed he has sold this timber, received money for it, and now seeks to breach his own warranty by a proceeding in an equity court to cancel his deed, and declares that his vendee did not get what he warranted him he would convey. There is no justice nor equity in the contention. If he desired to limit the title which he conveyed, he should have placed it in the contract. If it had been his purpose to grant him a license merely to enter the land and cut the trees, his contract should have been drawn so as to express this intention. Not having done so, it is not for us, at his instance, to give to this contract an intention which deprives the vendee of his property and is contradictory of the terms of the deed made by the vendor." Butterfield Lumber Co. v. Guy, 92 Miss. 361, 46 South. 78, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1123, 131 Am. St. Rep. 540.

In the case of North Georgia Co. v. Bebee, the grant of certain standing, branded trees was in the following language:

"* * * Doth grant, bargain, sell, and convey [i. e., said trees] unto the party of the second part, his heirs and assigns forever, * * * with the full and unreserved right of way * * * for the manufacture, or removal at any time of any and all timber," etc.

The conveyance was with general warranty. A claim of reverter was asserted in this case on the ground of failure to cut and remove within a reasonable time. The court held:

"The paramount consideration in the construction of every instrument conveying growing trees, with the right to cut and remove them, is the intention of the parties as contained in the writing. If that intention be a sale and purchase of the trees, to be held as land, with a perpetual right of entry to remove them, the vendor is estopped by his own grant from compelling the vendee to cut and remove the trees at his own will, or even within a reasonable time."

"It will be observed from the reading of the deed appearing in the statement of facts that the grant of the estate in the trees is absolute and unconditional; it is to the 'party of the second part, his heirs and assigns forever.' * * * These various privileges granted to the vendee would seem rather to be a recognition of the grant of an unconditional estate in the trees than a limitation upon the estate. The grantee's right of entry for the purpose of manufacturing or removing the timber was not limited, but the privilege was indefinite, or, to use the words of the grantor, he could exercise this right 'at any time.'" (Italics supplied.)

"If it be possible to frame a conveyance creating an estate in trees with a perpetual right of entry to cut and remove them from the land, this deed has that effect. It may bear harshly upon the owner of the soil, but, as it was competent for him to make such a contract as this, he must abide the consequences of his own deed."

North Georgia Co. v. Bebee, 128 Ga. 563, 57 S. E. 873.

A case singularly in point is the case of Shepherd v. Bank of Montreal. The deed in question contained the following clause:

"* * * And the party of the second part is given the period of six years from and after this date in which to remove said trees from off said lands. But, if the party of the second part should desire to have said trees stand on said land for a longer period than six years, he shall have the right to let said trees stand on said land until he shall desire to remove them, except that the party of the first part shall, after the expiration of said period of six years, have the right to deaden such trees as stand on land where the said party of the first part desires to clear and cultivate, first giving the second party, or his assigns, twelve months' personal written notice to remove the said trees off said land where the party of the first part desires to clear or cultivate."

In this case, too, the question of reverter arose, but the contention to that effect was overruled. The following citation is from the opinion of the court:

"Defendant's position is that the title has reverted to him by reason of the failure on the part of the plaintiff, and those through whom it claims, to cut and remove the timber * * * within six years from the date of sale, or within a reasonable time thereafter. In our opinion neither one of these propositions can be maintained. By the very deed which defendant executed, the grantee is not only given six years within which to remove the trees, but the further right after that time to let the trees stand on the land until he desires to remove them, subject, however, to the right of the grantor to deaden the trees after first giving the grantee twelve months' personal notice to remove the trees off the land where the grantor desires to cultivate. True, we have held that where the contract for the sale of standing timber is silent on the question of removal, but the situation of the parties and the circumstances surrounding them at the time the contract is executed are such as to show that the severance of the timber from the soil was contemplated, the title thereto may be defeated by a failure to cut and remove the timber within a reasonable time. * * * But that rule has no application to a case where the time for removal is fixed by the parties. In other words, it does not prevent the parties from agreeing on the time for removal. There can be no doubt that a party can buy growing timber with no intention of manufacturing it, and may hold it just as he might buy or hold land, if he so frame his contract. * * * Here the trees were conveyed by deed to the grantee, his heirs and assigns [italics supplied], with covenant of general warranty. * * * The parties not only agreed that the trees should remain on the land for six years, but for so long thereafter as the vendee desired. Under these circumstances, the trees passed as realty, and the covenant of title would follow into the hands of any vendee." Shepherd v. Bank of Montreal, 156 Ky. 495, 497, 161 S. W. 214, 215.

It abundantly appears from the cases cited, and from many others that might be cited, and it is in full accord with fundamental principles, that it is competent for an owner of lands to create an absolute estate in standing timber, with a perpetual right of entry to cut and remove same. Confronted with a given deed alleged to create rights of this character, the question is merely one of construction and the ascertainment of the intention of the parties.

We have been cited to a number of cases in this state as authority for the contention: (a) That under the deed in question in the instant case the grantee "was to have only 10 years from the 10th of March, 1902, within which to cut and remove the trees sold"; (b) that, even if the "grantee should be considered to be entitled to a reasonable time after the expiration of the 10-year period to remove said trees, such reasonable time had elapsed at or prior to the institution of this suit."

Much reliance is placed by appellees upon the principle announced in the following citation from the case of Wright v. Camp Mfg. Co., 110 Va. 678, 687, 66 S. E. 843, 846:

"In McRae v. Stillwell, supra, the court says, among other things, that 'while it is possible * * * for parties to make a contract whereby one would be entitled to a perpetual right to enter upon the land of another and remove timber therefrom, as such an agreement is so unreasonable in its nature, no contract will be presumed to have this effect unless it is plainly manifest from the terms of the same that such was the intention of the parties.'

"In Hill v. Hill, 113 Mass. 103, 18 Am. Rep. 455, the court says: 'It is not reasonable to presume that it was the intention of the parties to subject the land to a permanent easement. The right claimed by the plaintiff would deprive the defendant of the full use and enjoyment of his land for an indefinite time, which might extend through his life, and would give the plaintiff for that time the principal, if not the sole, beneficial use of it. * * * The claim of the plaintiff that he had the right to have the trees remain, drawing nourishment from the soil, as long as he chose, is, we think, contrary to the intention of the parties.'

It may be freely conceded that, taking a "whole contract together," effect should not be given to any provision which is ascertained to be contrary to the intention of the parties; but, whenever the intent of the parties is ascertained from internal evidence, and by proper construction of the instrument under consideration, that intent should be made effective. The timber cases, so called, in Virginia, rest upon the language construed in those cases, and they announce no principle contrary to the authority of the cases cited supra. Indeed, in the citation from McRae v. Stillwell, 111 Ga. 65, 36 S. E. 604, 55 L. R. A. 513, it is said:

"It is possible * * * for parties to make a contract whereby one would be entitled to a perpetual right to enter upon the land of another and remove timber therefrom, yet," etc.

But the conclusion announced is that—

Such an agreement is so unreasonable in its nature that "no contract will be presumed to have this effect unless it is plainly manifest from the terms of the same that such was the intention of the parties."

In deciding the cases cited by appellees, this court assumed the foregoing attitude with respect to contracts alleged to afford an indefinite right of entry and removal. But that attitude and those decisions are not decisive of the instant case, for the manifest reason that the language to be construed in the instant case and in the cases cited is essentially different. For instance, in the case of Blackstone Mfg. Co. v. Allen, 117 Va. 452, 85 S. E. 568, this court held that—

"Under a contract allowing a person to cut and remove standing timber within a time specified, the absolute title to the timber never passes out of the grantor until the grantee cuts and removes the timber within the time specified in the contract."

This is obviously true. Further, the court held that there was no forfeiture of the timber remaining uncut or removed after the time limit, for the manifest reason that there was nothing to forfeit. But in this case the court was dealing with an express and limited right to enter and remove the timber, not an unlimited right. The contractee's rights of every character fell with the termination of the time specified for cutting and removing the standing timber in question.

In the case of Wright v. Camp Mfg. Co., supra, the deed conveyed all the pine timber standing on the land of a specific diameter, with the right to cut and remove same in five years, and, if not cut and removed within that time, then, upon specified terms, such further time of removal as the grantee might desire was provided for. The grantee claimed an indefinite time under the terms of the latter provision. But the court held, taking the whole contract together, that the grantors never intended to confer any such indefinite right upon the grantee, and that "it would be unreasonable to hold" that such an indefinite right was intended to be conferred. This case is more in point as authority for the construction placed by appellees upon the Senter deed to Caroline Harris than any other that is cited, but there are several features of the Senter deed hereinafter to be discussed, and certain attendant distinguishing circumstances which distinguish this case from the Camp Case. These features and distinguishing circumstances will presently be considered.

The case of Brown v. Surry Lumber Co., 113 Va. 509, 75 S. E. 84, rests upon the case of Wright v. Camp. The language to be construed was that the purchasers should have "five years in which to cut and remove" the timber conveyed, from the time at which they commenced "to manufacture said timber into wood or lumber, but they shall not be limited as to the time in which they shall commence to cut or remove the same." Construing this somewhat ambiguous language, the court held that the deed on the whole did not show an intention to convey a perpetual right to enter and remove the timber, but that such right must be exercised in a reasonable time.

In Quigley Furniture Co. v. Rhea, 114 Va. 271, 76 S. E. 333, the grantees were given six years in which to cut, fell, remove, etc., the timber conveyed. The court held, very properly, that no timber could be removed after the expiration of this period.

Smith v. Ramsey, 116 Va. 530, 82 S. E. 189, follows Quigley v. Rhea, supra. The same question was involved.

Hartley v. Neaves, 117 Va. 219, 84 S. E. 97, and Blackstone v. Allen, supra, are timber cases, but are no wise in point. Johnson v. Powhatan Mining Co., 127 Va. 352, 103 S. E. 703, a recent case, reaffirms the proposition that, where one owns the fee in land and another the standing timber thereon, with a right of removal, the owner of the timber should remove the same within a reasonable time, unless the contract clearly affords an indefinite and perpetual right to allow the timber to remain unsevered. But the same case affirms the companion proposition that it is possible to so draw a contract as to give such a perpetual right to the owner of the timber, though a contract should not be construed to "have such meaning unless the parties clearly so intended and definitely expressed such intention." With these pronouncements we fully concur.

[3] Reverting now to the Senter deed under consideration, it will be noted that the grantor "sells, grants, and conveys to the grantee, or his assigns, for a valuable consideration, and with general warranty, 1,286 standing and branded white oak trees, growing on certain lands, with the right to enter on said land at any time, to cut and remove said trees, or their products." Standing alone, these words are certainly technically sufficient to pass an estate in fee in the trees to the grantee, with an indefinite time to enter and remove same. Standing trees are realty under our law. The following citation from a well-known authority on real property is in point in this connection:

"But if the owner of lands grants the trees growing thereon to another and his heirs, with liberty to cut and carry them away at his pleasure forever, the grantee acquires an estate in fee in the trees, with an interest in the soil sufficient for their growth, while the fee in the soil itself remains in the grantor." 1 Washburn, Real Property, 17.

In Butterfield Lumber Co. v. Gray, supra, the grantor conveyed his pine timber on certain land with general warranty. The grantee was given the right to enter and remove said timber. Twenty-four years thereafter the owner of the land brought his suit, alleging that the failure to cut and remove the timber had operated a forfeiture of same. The court held that the language plainly afforded a fee-simple title in the timber, without a time limit for removal, and that, if the grantor desired to limit the rights of the vendee in any wise, he should have provided the limitation in the contract. This reasoning is essentially sound, and the conclusion derived from the language used is manifestly correct. But the words used in the deed in the instant case, to wit, "bargain, sell, grant, and convey, * * * with covenants of general warranty, the said trees," and the right given "to enter at any time on said land to remove the trees," etc., and to "build wagon and other roads to that end," even more plainly than the language construed in the Butterfield Case, supra, and in other cases cited, indicate the intent to give a fee-simple interest in the trees and the right to remove same without a time limit, or other conditions. Appellees, however, stress the language of a succeeding paragraph in support of their contention that a definite time limit for removal is fixed by the Senter deed. This language is the following:

"The party of the second part [i. e., Caroline Harris] or his assigns are to have ten years from March 10, 1902, in which to cut and remove said trees from said lands, and if the party of the second part or his assigns shall fail to cut and remove said trees from said land within ten years from March 10, 1902, then the parties of the first part, or the then owners of the land, shall have the right to deaden such of said trees as may be standing upon the said land, which the owner may clear for cultivation."

[4] Apparently there is a conflict between the preceding language giving the party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, the right "to enter at any time on said land, to cut and remove the trees," etc., and the language just cited, to wit, that "the party of the second part or his assigns are to have ten years from March 10, 1902, in which to cut and remove said trees," etc. But according to familiar principles we must take the whole contract together, and reconcile, if possible, apparent conflicts between different portions of same so as to make the instrument, and every part thereof, conform to, and be in harmony with, the manifest general intent.

[5] If this provision as to a 10-year period within which the timber is to be cut and removed was intended to reduce the unlimited right to enter and cut previously given, and to fix absolutely the time within which the standing timber was to be removed, then at the expiration of 10 years all trees then standing would be the property of the owner of the land. As this court said in Blackstone Mfg. Co. v. Allen, cited supra:

"Under a contract allowing a person to cut and remove standing timber within a time specified, the absolute title to the timber never passes out of the grantor until the grantee cuts and removes the timber within the time specified in the contract. There is no forfeiture of the timber remaining uncut or unremoved after the time limit, for there is nothing to forfeit."

That is to say, such uncut or unremoved timber has never become in any final sense the property of the grantee. Hence, if the 10-year provision cited is designed to fix a precise and definite period within which the timber must be removed, then at the expiration of that period, according to the authority ubi supra, though there is no forfeiture, all the uncut, standing timber becomes the property of the owner of the land. Thereafter the trees will be in all respects subject to his use, disposition, and control. He can sell them, and as a matter of course can deaden them, as the greater power inevitably includes the less. In short, he can do what he will with his own. This being so, if the 10-year provision is intended definitely to terminate the grantee's interest in, and his relation to, the trees standing at its termination, why was it necessary to give in such precise language to the parties of the first part, i. e., the grantors, or the then owners of the lands, "the right to deaden such of said trees as may be standing upon said land, which the owner may clear for cultivation"?

If, as contended, the rights of the grantees of every character, with respect to the standing trees, were to be terminated at the expiration of 10 years from March 10, 1902, then thereafter without any specific grant of authority the owner of the land would be entitled to deaden the standing white oak trees, not only on lands he might desire to clear for cultivation, but on any other lands. Hence, in this view of the words used with relation to the 10-year period, the provision with respect to deadening trees thereafter was a nullity, since it undertook to afford a right that the owner of the land would enjoy at that time by virtue of the termination of the grantee's rights. Evidently, however, this provision relating to deadening was not inserted in the deed as a piece of meaningless supererogation, for M. L. Senter, who undertakes to say in his deposition that the grantees were intended to be limited to a removal time of 10 years, states that after discussing the time for removal the "talk was that the owner of the land should have the right to deaden after 10 years for cultivation." But the query recurs, why should the rights of the owner of the land in respect to deadening be under discussion with the grantee, and be provided for by a specific provision in the deed intended to operate at the expiration of the 10-year period when, according to this witness and the contention of appellees, it was agreed that the rights of the grantee of all sorts were definitely limited to the 10-year period?

Thereafter the grantors were not concerned to make any agreement with the grantee concerning deadening trees or the exercise of any authority over the land in question incident to the ownership of the fee in same. Nor was it necessary for the owner of the land to undertake to derive the authority to deaden trees, or to exercise any other authority over his own property, from a contractee whose rights of every character definitely expired, as contended, at the expiration of 10 years from March 10, 1902. Effect and meaning should be given to the deadening provision. As this court said in Halsey v. Fulton, the President of the court, delivering the opinion:

"Words deliberately put into a deed, and put there for a purpose, are not to be lightly considered nor arbitrarily put aside. The words in the deed before us were deliberately written in the instrument, are there for a purpose, and are not without meaning." Halsey v. Fulton, 119 Va. 575, 89 S. E. 913.

The foregoing considerations very plainly indicate that the deadening right was afforded to the grantors, because it was considered that they would not otherwise enjoy it, thereby repelling the contention that the provision as to the 10-year period was intended to terminate the grantee's rights and privileges at the expiration of that period. As pointed out, if such a result was intended by the 10-year provision, then the explicit grant of the right thereafter to deaden the standing trees on the grantors' lands was foolish surplusage.

There is another view of the 10-year provision which will bring the entire deed in harmony, and give meaning and effect to the deadening clause. The objection usually offered to that construction of a standing timber contract which affords a perpetual right of removal is that such construction, with the incidental right to have the trees draw nourishment from the soil, creates a bar to agricultural development, since the lands occupied by standing growing trees will not be available for such development. A very common practice, however, in many mountain counties, is to girdle the larger trees, remove the underbrush and small growth, and then cultivate the land between the dead trees, which no longer either shade or draw nourishment from the soil. Evidently the provision as to the 10-year period meant to say that the grantee was given an indefinite and unlimited right to use the grantors' lands for the sustenance of his trees, unless the grantors should desire to clear and devote to agricultural uses any portion of their lands occupied by said timber. With the better possibility in contemplation, the provision was made that at the expiration of 10 years a new right, not hitherto enjoyed, would arise and be enjoyed by the grantors, namely, the right to "deaden such of said trees as may be standing upon said land which the owner may clear for cultivation."

Summarizing the distinguishing features of the deed construed in the instant case, as contrasted with the deed in the case of Wright v. Camp Mfg. Co., they are:

(1) The Senter deed conveys, for value, distinct branded trees, while under the deed in the Camp Case all the trees growing on the land in question during the deferred period would be the property of the grantee, provided that at the time of cutting they had attained the specified size.

(2) There is practically but little agricultural land embraced in the lands conveyed in the instant case.

(3) Provision was made for the prospective cultivation of this land, if desired, by the deadening clause of the Senter deed.

(4) Having in mind the provisions of the deed in question and the circumstances under which same was made, the purpose of this deed to afford a perpetual right to enter and remove the trees conveyed is distinctly manifested. The deed in question, considered as a whole, plainly means:

(a) That the standing timber was conveyed in fee to the grantee.

(b) That an indefinite right to remove this timber was afforded.

(c) That during the period of 10 years from March 10, 1902, the grantors were debarred from interfering in any wise with the standing trees, even though they might desire to devote the lands on which they stood to agricultural uses.

(d) That at the expiration of the 10-year period the rights of the grantors with respect to the standing trees and the use of the soil would be enlarged, and the rights of the grantee correspondingly diminished.

(e) That this enlargement of the grantor's rights was the specific authority afforded after said period to clear the land occupied by the standing trees for agricultural purposes, and to that end to girdle and thereby destroy the vitality of said trees.

(f) That the grantees were not affected in their right to remove their standing timber by the expiration of the 10-year period, but were subject thereafter to a new and superior right afforded the grantors to deaden all timber standing on land desired to be used for agricultural purposes, even though such action might be the cause of damage to the timber.

(g) That as to all lands occupied by standing timber, and not suitable for agricultural purposes, the rights of the grantee would not be affected by the 10-year provision. As to such lands the grantee would enjoy the right to have the trees remain untouched, and draw nourishment from the soil until such time as the grantee, in the exercise of her rights, might cut and remove the same.

This interpretation of the deed in question is supported by the situation of the parties and the circumstances surrounding them. It appears from the evidence that most of the land on Pound river, particularly that on the north side of the stream, is very rough and steep, and much of it rocky. On the whole very little of it is suitable for farming. The chief value of this land consisted in the standing timber for which there was no immediate market, owing to lack of transportation facilities. Various projected railroads were under discussion, but it was altogether problematical when and to what points they would be built, if at all. The watershed of Pound river and its affluents was a very rugged, remote, and inaccessible region. When the Senter deed was executed in 1904 the nearest railroad stations were Coeburn and Hellier, the former 25 miles away, and the other across the Cumberland Mountains. Heavy oak lumber could not be profitably hauled to either of these stations, nor was it commercially feasible to float such lumber down Pound creek, through the Breaks of Cumberland to the deeper and smoother waters of the Big Sandy. Wilson Bros. later essayed this experiment, with disastrous financial results. Hence, under the conditions depicted, standing timber would be purchased as an investment, and not for immediate severance and removal. It is permissible to buy and hold timber as an investment. In the words of one of the cases cited:

"There can be no doubt that a party can buy standing timber with no intention of manufacturing it, and may hold it just as he might buy, or hold, land, if he so frame his contract."

Harris looked over a field rich in timber, coal, and other minerals, all potential wealth, but of little present value, until markets were made available. Under such circumstances, operations in these potential values would necessarily be chiefly speculative. Owners who were either unable or indisposed to wait on the arrival of railroads or the development of water carriage were ready to sell for a moderate consideration, presently paid, and to pass a complete title. Speculators, with an eye to the future, were ready to buy provided the chances of profit were not too remote or the terms of sale too exacting. Harris was one of these speculative purchasers who believed that the large reserves of white oak timber in Dickenson county would be ultimately profitable, provided he could buy and hold until one or more projected railroads, then on paper, could be built into the timber area. As the time of construction and arrival of these railroads was purely conjectural, a speculative purchaser, exercising sound judgment, would be disposed to balk at limitations upon his right of removal. Naturally he would insist upon a fee simple in the timber, and an indefinite time for removal, unless the terms demanded by the seller were excessive and unreasonable. A seller owning trees on rough and rocky hillsides, unsuitable for agriculture, would not object to giving an indefinite time for removal, provided he could secure his price. With respect to trees standing on small areas suitable for cultivation, the right to deaden branded white oak trees, comparatively few in number to the acre, would sufficiently meet the situation. Hence the insertion of the deadening clause in the deeds taken by Harris from the Senters and others.

M. L. Senter, apparently the only grantor in the Senter deed who is disposed to challenge the right of Wilson Bros. to cut and remove the trees in controversy, undertakes to say that it was understood between him and his brothers and Harris that "only 10 years would be allowed to remove the timber." But he does not explain why, having made this definite agreement, "that talk was," citing his own language, "that the owner of the land should have the right to deaden after the 10 years for cultivation." But, if the testimony of this witness is competent, it is completely refuted by that of the witness Harris, who testifies in detail to the preparation of his deeds, the agreements embodied therein, and the underlying reasons therefor. The following citation is from Harris' deposition:

"There was a large amount of very fine white oak timber in Dickenson county. At that time there was no way to remove it to market, as the streams were small, and it was difficult to even float poplar or cucumber, especially from the head of Pound river and McClure; but, believing that the county would ultimately be developed by railroad on account of immense deposits of valuable coal, I decided to buy oak timber and hold it until the railroad was built, and, believing it would be a profitable investment, I prepared my contracts of purchase and deeds so as to give practically unlimited time in which to remove the timber. The only reservation set forth in the contracts of sale, and in the deed as well, was a reservation giving the seller of the timber the right to use his land for agricultural purposes, after a number of years set out in the deed, by deadening such trees as might be standing upon the land he cleared, or desired to clear, for agricultural purposes. This feature was decided on after a discussion with those familiar with the country and the conditions obtaining in reference to the land where the timber was sought to be purchased, it being generally agreed that, if the owner of the surface had the right to deaden the trees, and use his surface, he would suffer no loss by allowing the trees to remain on other portions of his land indefinitely, as these trees, each and every one of them, were definitely marked or branded, and the term of years during which they remained on the land would not increase or decrease the number of trees sold by the owner of the surface. * * *

"All the land along Pound river, and especially on the north side of the Pound river, is extremely rough, very steep, much of it rocky, in so much that the owners for years previous to the time I purchased the timber tried to sell the timber, and on several occasions the timber and sometimes the land was under option, but on account of the extreme roughness of the country no one had purchased much timber along the Pound river up to 1902. But very little of the land was suitable for farming, and on this account I did not think that any or but little of the land would ever be cleared."

Cross-examination:

"* * * Q. At the time you bought this timber, you bought it for the purpose of speculating on it, did you not?"

"A. I certainly did, and expected to make a profit on it, and contemplated having to hold it for many years."

It may be said in this connection that the suggested burden, even upon farming land, supposed to follow upon an indefinite right to remove mature standing timber, when submitted as a reason why a deed should not be construed to afford such a right, is greater in seeming than in reality. The conversion of mature oak timber into lumber cannot be indefinitely postponed in any literal sense. Oak timber does not indefinitely improve. After it becomes ripe, it deteriorates. Hence, as to oak timber, such as was purchased in the instant case, there is no likelihood that any great period of time would elapse before economic considerations would cause it to be cut and removed by the owner, thereby freeing the land for agriculture, and relieving the soil of burden. This fact eliminates one consideration relied upon to justify the construction that the deed in the case in judgment should be construed to limit the grantee's right to remove his timber to a definite period of 10 years.

Another contention of the complainants is that after their initial operations were discontinued Wilson Bros. abandoned their claim to the uncut trees, and as a result of this abandonment title to said trees has been transferred to said complainants.

On the subject of parol disclaimer of title, this court said in Southern R. Co. v. Gregg:

"Where the legal title is vested in one, no mere parol disclaimer can divest title. It has been long settled here that disclaimer of a freehold can only be by deed, or in a court of record." Southern R. Co. v. Gregg, 101 Va. 317, 43 S. E. 573.

See, also, cases cited therein.

[7] The evidence of abandonment is far from satisfactory, apart from the testimony of the defendant, F. G. Wilson, and corroborating witnesses. The credibility of the witness, M. L. Senter, who testifies that Wilson Bros. told him in 1912 and 1913 that they "did not intend to have anything more to do with the timber," is badly shaken by an exhibit in the record. This contention of abandonment is considered to be supported by the testimony of the treasurer of Dickenson county, Dr. Sutherland, who testifies in relation to the contents of a letter received from Wilson Bros. in 1917 or 1918. This letter is not produced. The gravamen of its contents, as stated by Dr. Sutherland, is that the defendants wrote that "they had cut all of their timber in Dickenson county." F. G. Wilson, testifying for the defendants, denies most positively that they ever had any intention of abandoning the timber owned by Wilson Bros. in Dickenson county. With respect to the letters of the firm of Wilson Bros., the witness stated that it was the rule of the firm to keep copies of the same. He denied that they had written any letter stating that the firm "had cut all of their timber in Dickenson county," and asserted that his letter files showed no copy of a letter to that effect. The witness filed a copy of a letter to Treasurer Sutherland, which might have been construed by the latter to bear the meaning which he imputed to it. This letter was part of a correspondence between the Wilson Bros. and Treasurer Sutherland on the subject of taxes. The direct testimony of the defendant F. G. Wilson on the subject of abandonment is corroborated by a number of witnesses. One witness for complainants testifies that, after Wilson Bros. suspended their operations they corresponded with him with reference to cutting the balance of the timber for them.

"Q. You knew that Wilson Bros. intended to cut the balance of the timber that they had on Pound river, and had some correspondence with them, didn't you?

"A. Yes, sir; I did a while after they quit.

"Q. You corresponded with them with reference to cutting it for them?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Then you knew that they still intended cutting this timber, didn't you?

"A. Yes, sir; I 'lowed that was their intention, or they wouldn't have been writing about it."

George Holmes, the agent of the defendant in their logging operations, makes the following answer to a question relating to this alleged abandonment:

"A. No, sir; they didn't talk that way; they talked the opposite way, the last time I talked with them, and Ferdie Wilson, here at Fremont in 1916, he told me then that they were going to abandon any efforts of taking anything down the river, but when conditions would permit they would make some use of this timber, and get it to the railway at Fremont, or any other point they might be able to reach; that is the way Mr. Wilson talked to me about it, and I know he meant it, and subsequent correspondence I have had with them indicates the same thing."

In a letter to the Ritter Lumber Company, of date September 11, 1918, the defendants, referring to their trees in Dickenson county, say:

"We have not abandoned the trees, and have paid taxes up to last year. * * * We, of course, consider these trees more valuable than at the time of purchase."

Apart from the direct testimony to the contrary, it is in the highest degree unlikely that the defendants ever entertained any intention of abandoning the uncut trees. From the evidence in the record it appears that, when the defendants suspended work on account of the difficulties of transportation, a considerable number of trees were still standing. The railroad was completed to Fremont in the fall of 1915, thereby affording the much-desired railroad transportation, as soon as the defendants were in a position to resume operations, after recovery from the losses sustained in the disastrous effort to float their timber down Pound river. According to the witness Holmes, the timber from the Senter tract can be successfully hauled to Fremont, and shipped from that point. Having these things in mind, there is no reason to believe that the defendants would abandon valuable property at a time when there was a reasonable hope that in the comparatively near future they could successfully market same, and recoup the losses which they had sustained. The evidence for the defendants positively disproves the charge of abandonment, and is entitled to far the greater weight.

Upon the whole we conclude that the de-defendants had a title in fee to the timber in controversy plainly afforded, with no time limit on their right of removal, and that there was no abandonment of the uncut trees. For the reasons heretofore given, the decree of the circuit court of Dickenson county, perpetuating the injunction complained of, must be reversed, and the proper final order will be entered in this court.

SAUNDERS, J. The substantial and controlling questions of law and fact presented in this case have been considered and disposed of in the case of Wilson Bros. v. Branham and Phipps, 109 S. The decision in the Branham Case is decisive of the merits of the instant case. For the reasons and principles set out in full in the opinion in said case of *Wilson Bros. v. PENDLETON v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Homicide \S 233, 245—Evidence held insufficient to establish motive claimed or to show shooting necessary to accomplish same.

In prosecution for murder, evidence held insufficient to show that defendant's motive was to put an end to decedent's lewd purpose toward and persistent attentions to defendant's sister-in-law or that the shooting was necessary to accomplish that end.

2. Homicide \S 244(1)—Evidence held insufficient to show self-defense.

In prosecution for murder, evidence held insufficient to establish self-defense.

3. Homicide \S 214(3), 221 — Dying declarations as to facts leading up to declarant's death admissible as res gestæ and entitled to same weight as if under oath.

Dying declarations to identify the prisoner or to show the facts leading up to, causing, or attending the act resulting in the declarant's death are admissible and have the same weight as if made under oath; such facts being the res gestæ within the doctrine of dying declarations.

4. Homicide \S 214(3)—Dying declaration admissible, if admissible under oath.

Any dying declaration which would be admissible had declarant been sworn as a witness is admissible if confined to the facts leading up to, causing, or attending the homicide.

5. Homicide \S 215(1, 4)—Dying declaration, if hearsay, opinion, or irrelevant, is inadmissible.

A dying declaration, if hearsay, matter of opinion, or irrelevant, is inadmissible, but, if it relates to relevant facts within declarant's knowledge, it is admissible.

6. Homicide \S 214(3)—Dying declaration that accused borrowed money from deceased shortly before shooting held admissible to show animus.

In a prosecution for murder, deceased's dying declaration that defendant borrowed money from him a few hours before was admissible as showing their conduct toward each other shortly before and leading up to the shooting and defendant's animus toward declarant at the time thereof.

7. Criminal law \S 338(3)—Admission of dying declaration held not error where accused testified as to subject thereof and commonwealth introduced rebuttal testimony.

In a prosecution for murder, admission of a dying declaration that defendant borrowed money from decedent shortly before the shooting was not reversible error where defendant himself testified on such subject, and the commonwealth without objection introduced rebuttal testimony.

8. Homicide \S 214(3) — Dying declaration merely as to state of feeling between declarant and accused inadmissible.

Statements in a dying declaration consisting merely of the state of feeling between declarant and accused are inadmissible, though material and relevant, since the accused must be tried for his deeds in the light of the situation as it reasonably appeared to him from the outward demeanor and conduct of the deceased, and not in the light of his secret state of feeling toward accused.

9. Homicide \S 214(3) — Dying declarations that decedent had done nothing to accused or any one held admissible.

In a prosecution for murder, dying declarations of deceased that he was doing nothing at the time and had done nothing to accused or anybody to give him any cause to shoot were admissible, being declarations, not of a mere state of feeling between the parties, but of outward conduct of declarant toward accused and others.

10. Homicide \S 214(8)—Dying declaration as to facts leading up to, as well as those occurring at time, held admissible.

Though a general statement in a dying declaration that there was no cause for accused's act is not admissible, dying declarations as to facts leading up to a homicide, as well as to those occurring at the very time, which have a natural bearing on the motives and probable conduct of accused at such time, are admissible.

11. Homicide \S 215(4)—Dying declarations of conclusions of fact admissible.

Though the opportunity for cross-examination furnishes a safeguard against untrue general statements of conclusions of fact which is absent in the case of dying declarations, the same consideration of necessity which excepts dying declarations from the rule against hearsay evidence operates in favor of admitting such declarations of conclusions of fact, as well as of specific facts.

12. Homicide \S 221 — Dying declarations admissible for what they are worth in light of other evidence.

Dying declarations are not admitted as evidence which is true, but only for what the jury may consider them worth in the light of all the other evidence and circumstances.

13. Homicide \S 214(3), 215(4)—Dying declaration as to conclusion of fact must refer to relevant facts so nearly antecedent to time of homicide as to show motive and probable conduct of accused at such time.

A dying declaration is not inadmissible merely because it states a conclusion of fact, but must refer to relevant facts which, if they do not attend the very time of the homicide or concern the cause of death, are so nearly antecedent in time as that it may be reasonably considered they tend to show motive and probable conduct of accused at such time.

14. Homicide \S 214(2) — "Circumstances of the transaction itself" not confined to occurrences at very time of homicide.

"Circumstances of the transaction itself," as used in the doctrine of dying declarations, are the circumstances or facts leading up to, causing, or attending the homicide, and are not confined to occurrences at the very time thereof.

15. Homicide \S 221—Absence of self-serving purpose not essential to trustworthiness of dying declarations.

The absence of any self-serving purpose is not an essential element of the circumstantial guarantee of the trustworthiness of dying declarations.

16. Homicide \S 214(3)—Dying declarations as to decedent's relations with accused's sister-in-law held admissible where such relations existed for only few weeks prior to homicide.

In a prosecution for murder, decedent's dying declarations as to his relations with defendant's sister-in-law, on account of which defendant claimed to have shot, were admissible where such relations had existed for only a few weeks prior to the homicide, and the commonwealth, without objection, introduced testimony concerning such relations during all of such time.

17. Witnesses \S 246(2), 282—No error in examining as court witness and permitting cross-examination by commonwealth of hostile witness summoned by it, though adverse interest not shown.

Under Code 1919, \S 6214, permitting cross-examination of a party's own witness who has an adverse interest, the court did not err in a criminal case in introducing and examining as a court witness one summoned by the commonwealth who had not been sent before the grand jury because she stated she did not know anything and "had refused to talk to any one before the trial," nor, "the witness showing great reluctance to testify," in permitting the commonwealth to cross-examine her as a hostile witness and ask leading questions; the statute being applicable, though it is not shown the witness had an adverse interest, if she is in fact adverse.

18. Witnesses \S 246(2)—Court in criminal case may call as court witness adverse witness summoned by commonwealth.

In a criminal case the court may, in the exercise of a sound discretion, call and examine as a court witness an adverse witness summoned by the commonwealth.

19. Witnesses \S 244—No error in permitting cross-examination of witness who proved hostile on direct examination.

In a criminal case the court did not err, in view of Code 1919, \S 6214, permitting cross-examination of a party's witness who has an adverse interest, in permitting such examination by the commonwealth of a witness who on direct examination by it proved hostile.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Buckingham County.

Wyatt Pendleton was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

The accused was indicted for the murder of the deceased, Frank Raymond Barker. The indictment is in the form of an indictment for murder at common law. There was a trial by jury. The verdict of the jury found the accused guilty of murder in the second degree, as charged in the indictment, and fixed his punishment at 10 years' confinement in the penitentiary. The trial court entered judgment and sentenced the accused accordingly.

The deceased was mortally wounded on the night of Sunday, August 29, 1920, a bright moonlight night, by being shot in the back with buckshot from the discharge of a shotgun in the hands of the accused. The accused admits that he shot the deceased and that he did so intentionally, but claims that he did it in self-defense thinking that he was in danger at the time of being killed by the deceased, who, as the accused testifies, "turned towards me and threw his hand to his hip pocket" just before the fatal shot was fired.

The circumstances and the material conflicts in the testimony as to the circumstances or facts leading up to the shooting were as follows: Daisy Moss, a girl of between 15 and 16 years of age, a sister of the wife of the accused, had been in the home of the accused for about five weeks prior to the shooting, the family consisting during that time of the accused, his wife, who was in delicate health, Daisy Moss, and the father of the accused. About four weeks before the shooting the deceased began to take his meals at the home of the accused as a boarder, and did so for about three weeks and up to about one week before the shooting. The accused testified that, while the deceased was taking his meals at the home of the accused, the attentions of the deceased to Daisy Moss became very marked and persistent; that several times while the deceased and the girl were sitting on the porch after supper the accused heard the girl say to the deceased that if he did not stop and behave himself she would go in the house; that on the Saturday night, which was a week and a day before the shooting, the accused looked through the window and saw the deceased and Daisy "sitting on the porch floor, with their feet on the ground; she was sitting close to one of the porch posts, and Raymond was sitting wedged up against her with his leg over both of her legs and his arm across her back;" that he (the accused) started to go out there, but his wife dissuaded him and went herself and told Daisy to come in. The accused further testified that—

"The next morning I talked it over with my father, and we decided for my father . . . to tell Barker that he must stop taking his meals there and must get some other place to take his meals as quick as he could, and that he must let Daisy alone and not visit her or go with her any more. And my father told Barker that on that day, which was Sunday morning. On the next morning, Monday, I told Barker the same thing, that he must get another place to take his meals at once, and that he must let Daisy alone and have nothing more to do with her."

The father testified that he did, on the Monday just mentioned, tell the deceased that he could not take his meals there any longer, but stated, in substance, that he did not tell the accused to let Daisy alone and not visit her or go with her any more, and did not know of his own knowledge that any one told the deceased not to go with the girl.

Daisy Moss testified, in substance, that there was nothing improper in the conduct of the deceased towards her; that she "thought he was a nice boy"; that he stopped taking his meals at the home of the accused "because I was cooking and it was too much for me."

The testimony of the accused and of other witnesses in his behalf before the jury was to the effect that the deceased was lewd in his conduct with women, having a bad general reputation in that respect, and that the accused was informed of this after the deceased began to board in his home. Whereas there was testimony for the commonwealth to the effect that the general reputation of the deceased in the particular just mentioned was good.

The accused further testified that he left home on the Monday last above mentioned and was absent for three or four days; that on his return his wife told him that in his absence the deceased had been to the home of the accused to see Daisy; that the deceased also met Daisy at the home of Ben Pendleton, a brother of the accused, on Saturday evening, the day before the shooting, as the accused heard; that on Sunday morning, the day of the shooting, the accused was told that on the day before the deceased, while somewhat under the influence of liquor, had made statements to a companion named Charlie Jones which were to the effect that he intended to seduce and have carnal intercourse with Daisy Moss the first chance he might have. This companion of the deceased repeated these statements to the accused on the Sunday morning just mentioned before the accused and the deceased went on the trip together now to be mentioned.

Without objection on the part of the accused, the commonwealth introduced testimony to the effect that on the Sunday of the shooting the accused and the deceased, along with a number of others (the party consisting of about 10 or 12 in all), hired seats in a truck and went on a trip from Dillwyn to see the bridge across James river at Brems, which had been damaged by high water, and this testimony tended to show that the accused and the deceased were apparently on friendly terms while on this trip. There is a reference in the dying declaration, more specifically mentioned below, which was introduced in evidence in chief for the commonwealth, to the effect that the deceased said on his deathbed that the accused had borrowed of the deceased all the money the deceased had on the day of the shooting, which the testimony of and for the accused, later introduced, developed had reference to the conduct of the accused towards the deceased on the trip just mentioned; but it was the testimony of the accused himself which made a specific issue of fact before the jury concerning whether the accused borrowed any money of the deceased on such trip, the accused testifying that he borrowed money from one Wirt Hill instead of from the deceased, and that the deceased borrowed money from one Tom Maxey. Whereupon the commonwealth in rebuttal, without objection from the accused, introduced a witness who testified that the deceased "loaned" the accused "a dollar on that trip when they were returning." Thereafter Wirt Hill, and Tom Maxey were called as witnesses for the defense, the former testifying that he "loaned" the accused $1 on that trip, and both testifying that they did not see the accused borrow any money from the deceased on the trip, and "would have seen it if he had borrowed any money from him."

There was testimony for the accused tending to show that the deceased habitually carried a pistol and was a rowdy, quarrelsome, and dangerous person, and that he bore that general reputation during that last years of his life, but that he was never heard to make any threat against the accused.

Coming now to the occurrences which followed the return of the accused and the deceased from the trip to Bremono, the following is the testimony of the accused as to what transpired up to and including the shooting and his motive therefor:

"We got back about 7 or 8 o'clock, and, as I wanted something to smoke, I went to Ellis' store, and Barker also went to the store to get something to smoke. I had nothing to say to him; he went without any invitation from me to get something for himself to smoke. On the way back from the store to El. D. Gregory's office I collared Raymond Barker and told him what Charlie Jones had told me, and he did not deny it, but hung his head. I told him, 'You have those rubbers in your pocket for her now, and you have your pistol in your pocket and you are carrying for me.' And I told him he must let Daisy alone and have nothing more to do with her while she was at my house, and he promised me that he would not go with her again. Then I stood on the corner of the street for a while with Charlie Jones, Ben Pendleton, Barker and others, and Daisy Moss, Frances Ranson, and Eliza Huddleston came by on their way to church. Barker spoke to them when they passed. We stayed there awhile, and Barker slipped off from us without saying anything to anybody, and, when I missed him, I believed he had gone to the church after Daisy Moss.

"I was unarmed and that he always carried a pistol and I had seen him have it in his pocket that day, and I had determined not to let him go with Daisy Moss while she was in my care. I then went home and got a single-barrel gun that I had borrowed some months before to keep the crows off the corn. I had bought four shells when I got the gun, and two of them were buckshot and two small shot; I got them that way because I just got the odd shells that Mr. Pearson had at his store so as not to break a box. I had shot three of the shells and had only one left, and that was a buckshot shell. I got this shell and the gun and started out, and my wife asked me what I was going to do with the gun, and I told her that I was not going to hurt anybody and that I would be back soon. I said I was going to keep Barker from going with Daisy to-night. I went back to my brother Ben Pendleton's house. I passed the front of the house, and Barker was sitting on the front porch. I went around to the side and looked into the window, and then went in the kitchen, where my brother was eating his supper. Barker saw me as I passed the front porch with the gun. It was only about 15 feet from the porch where he was sitting and the moon was shining. When I went into the kitchen Ben asked me what I was going to do with the gun, and I told him I was going to keep Barker from going home with Daisy that night, that I thought he was trying to seduce her, and Ben told me that Barker had walked by with Daisy from the church, holding her by the arm. I told Ben to go with Daisy home, and Ben said to leave it to him and he would fix it. I had seen Daisy in the room with Frances when I looked in the window (the house is a cottage). Ben had told me to go on home and go to bed, that he would fix it all right. I went out back of the house to see what they were going to do. The weeds were tall, but I could see over them. From where I was I could see the main road over which I had come from my house to Ben's and I could see if they came out the back way. I could see them no matter which way they went to my house. I wanted to see if Barker was going to go home with Daisy that night and I was going to try to stop him if he did.

"I laid the gun down in the weeds. After I had been there about 10 minutes Daisy Moss, Mrs. Ben Pendleton, and Frances Ranson came out of the back door, and Barker followed them out and took hold of Daisy's arm and started to walking with her, and she wanted to go home by the main road, the way I came there, but Barker said, 'No; we will go this way,' and pulled her up through the weeds toward me, and I heard Barker say, 'God damn,' and something else, but did not understand what else he said. They all passed by me, and after they had passed me a few steps Frances Ranson looked back and saw me. She said, 'Lord, yonder's Wyatt.' Then Mrs. Pendleton ran back past me, Frances ran the other way, and Barker pushed Daisy over in the weeds and told her to 'Run for your life; I will take care of Wyatt,' and he then turned toward me and threw his hand to his hip pocket. I grabbed the gun off of the ground and fired from my hip at Raymond Barker as I raised the gun. I did not get it to my shoulder. Just as I fired Daisy stumbled in the weeds, and Barker turned back toward her as I fired, with his right hand still on his hip pocket."

Cross-examination:

"By Attorneys for the Commonwealth:

"I shot Barker because I thought that, if I did not shoot him, he would shoot me; if I had not shot him, he would have shot me. I shot him in self-defense. I was going to him without anything in my hands. I did not need anything but my hands to handle Barker with if he did not use his gun, but, when I saw him put his hand to his hip pocket and about to draw his pistol, I knew that he would shoot me if I did not shoot him first, and that was why I shot him. * * *

"I wanted the gun to protect myself with, and that was why I went after it that night. * * * I did not intend to use the gun unless Barker tried to use his pistol. I did not try to get behind any building there. The nearest building was about 50 feet, and I could not get behind it, so that there was nothing I could get behind to keep Barker from shooting me. When I raised my gun and just as I shot, Barker turned to look at the girl (Daisy Moss)."

There was testimony before the jury in conflict with that of the accused on the following material points:

(a) Daisy Moss testified that the exclamation of Frances Ranson when she looked back and saw the accused was not merely, "Lord, yonder's Wyatt," as stated by the accused, but, "Lord, there is Wyatt back of us with a gun;" whereas the accused testified that his gun was then lying on the ground in the weeds.

(b) The testimony of Frances Ranson bears upon its face, as it appears in the record, evidence that it was reluctantly given where inculpatory of the accused and readily given where favorable to him. On the question of whether she saw the gun in the hands of the accused when she first discovered him and made the exclamation aforesaid she first says that she did then see the gun in his hands. She then states that she did not see the gun when she first saw the accused, but only after she ran and was looking back. Later in her testimony she testified to the effect that when she first saw the accused she saw him standing with the gun in his hands. Her testimony is also both ways on the question of whether the accused fired the shot "right away" following her first seeing him with the gun in his hands, or whether there was an interval after her first seeing him in which she was running, and, looking back as she ran, saw the deceased push Daisy Moss from him, turn towards the accused, and make the hip pocket movement before the shot was fired.

(c) There is no conflict in the evidence that the shot from the gun struck both sides of the back of the deceased, and, so far as the course of the shot is disclosed by the evidence, the evidence tended to show that the shot penetrated, not obliquely, but practically in a direct line from the back towards the front of the body, tending to establish as a physical fact that the accused shot the deceased when his back was practically directly towards the accused. Other buskshot struck the right hand of the deceased, one of them entering the palm of that hand, demonstrating that the palm of that hand was turned in the direction of the accused at the time of the shot, and the ends of the forefinger and thumb of that hand were struck by either one or two separate shot.

(d) The testimony of the accused that "just as I fired Daisy stumbled in the weeds and Barker turned back towards her as I fired" is unsupported by any other testimony. No other eyewitness of the occurrence testified to any stumbling of the girl, or any turning away of the deceased from the accused. On the contrary the direct testimony of the eyewitnesses of the shooting, other than the accused, in so far as it was favorable to the accused, was to the effect that, when Frances Ranson discovered the accused and made the exclamation aforesaid, the deceased turned and faced the accused, making the hip pocket movement as he turned, and that the shot followed while the deceased was in that attitude. But this was manifestly physically an impossibility, in view of the fact that the wounds were in the back of the deceased.

(e) There was testimony for the commonwealth in rebuttal which very conclusively established that the deceased had no pistol about his person when he was shot; and the rebuttal testimony for the commonwealth also tended to show that the deceased had no pistol that day; that he was not in the habit of carrying a pistol; and that his general reputation was that of a quiet, peaceable person, as boy and man.

The dying declarations of the deceased, admitted in evidence over the objection of the accused, were made to his mother, who testified as a witness for the commonwealth, and contained the following statements:

"He said that he was shot for nothing; that he had never done anything to him or to anybody on earth. * * * He said Wyatt Pendleton shot him, and he says, 'He shot me for nothing.' * * * He said he was right out there coming out from Mr. Ranson's, and he wasn't doing nothing, and he shot him. * * * He said he hadn't given him any cause to do it. He said he borrowed all the money he had that day. He said he loaned him all—two pennies in his pocket and he loaned him that."

Other specific testimony and pertinent matters are referred to in the opinion of the court.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., and J. D. Hank, Jr., and Leon M. Bazile, Asst. Attys. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

SIMS, J., after making the foregoing statement, delivered the following opinion of the court:

The following questions raised by the assignments of error will be disposed of in their order as stated below:

1. Does it appear from the evidence that the judgment under review is plainly wrong or without evidence to support it?

This question must be answered in the negative.

[1] It has been earnestly and ably argued before us in behalf of the accused that he was justified in shooting the deceased in order to put an end to his alleged lewd purpose toward, and persistent attentions to, Daisy Moss. But it affirmatively appears from the evidence that this was not the motive for the shooting, and that the shooting was not necessary to accomplish that end, even from the viewpoint of the accused. For, as appears from his testimony, quoted above, the accused stated before the jury:

"I was going to him without anything in my hands. I did not need anything but my hands to handle Barker with, if he did not use his gun."

[2] The plea of self-defense was the sole defense relied on by the accused on the trial to justify the shooting, and hence our consideration of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict and judgment must be confined to a consideration of the evidence as bearing upon that defense.

In so far as the question of the sufficiency of the evidence is concerned, the case turns upon the issues of fact of whether the gun of the accused was lying on the ground in the weeds as he arose, when Frances Ranson first saw him and made the exclamation shown in evidence, of whether the deceased turned towards the accused and threw his right hand to his right hip pocket, of whether the accused then for the first time "grabbed the gun off of the ground" and fired at the accused, and of whether, just as the accused fired, the girl stumbled in the weeds and the deceased turned back towards her, and thus received the wounds found upon his person, or whether the accused arose with the gun in his hands, and the deceased did not throw his hand to his hip pocket, but had his back practically directly towards the accused when the gun was fired. There was sufficient evidence to support the finding of the jury either way; hence their verdict was binding upon the court below and is binding upon us.

The direct testimony for the commonwealth, it is true, tended in part to sustain the version given by the accused of what occurred, but the credibility of such part of the testimony was solely for the determination of the jury; and the circumstantial evidence furnished by the absence of any pistol in the pocket of the deceased, by the mute wounds upon the back of the deceased, and the spontaneous exclamation of Frances Ranson, if it consisted of the words, "Lord, there is Wyatt back of us with a gun," as the testimony for the commonwealth tended to show was true, were sufficient to warrant the jury in disbelieving the testimony of and for the accused on the subject of the alleged hip pocket movement, and hence in discarding the self-defense theory.

While possible, it was in the highest degree improbable, if the deceased turned so far facing the accused as to make a demonstration against the latter of drawing a pistol from the hip pocket, that, even if the attention of the deceased was attracted elsewhere by the girl stumbling in the weeds, he would have then turned so far away from the accused as to have received the discharge from the gun practically directly in the back. If this movement had occurred, the strong probability is that the deceased would have been shot in the right or left side, dependent upon whether he had turned to the right or the left in the attempt to draw a pistol. Indeed, it is stated in the petition of the accused for the writ of error that just at the moment the shot was fired "Daisy Moss, who had started to run, stumbled in the weeds, and Barker, hearing her stumble, partly turned towards her with his hand still on his hip pocket, so that his right side and back were thus turned towards petitioner just as petitioner fired. The shot from petitioner's gun, therefore, penetrated Barker's right side and back. * * *" But, unfortunately for the accused, the uncontroverted testimony of the physician who examined the wounds was as follows:

"There were four shot in his left thigh; one came through here; there was one in his right, that is, below the hip joint in the pelvic bone; two here; and one in the palm of his hand. Then his right forefinger and his right thumb at the end were shot. I counted eight shot in his body; four in his left thigh and one in his right; that is five; two here (indicating); and one in the palm of his hand. * * *"

Cross-examination:

"Q. By Mr. Moon. I don't exactly catch how those shot were. How many shot struck him?

"A. Nine shot I know of.

"Q. Will you show me where they were?

"A. (indicating). There were four that went into his left thigh; two came through here, and one in his right thigh, and that came through just under the surface of the skin, and one struck him just below the hip bone, and there were two hit him in his buttock, just to the right of the middle line, just about there, and one struck him in the palm of his right hand, and his finger and thumb were shot. * * *

"Q. They went in sort of from the side and back, those shots did, didn't they?

"A. I think they were pretty much from the back.

"Q. How did they come out?

"A. They came out straight in front.

"Q. You pointed out where the shot entered. Now point just where they came out.

"A. They came out just to the center of the thigh.

"Q. About the center of the right side? And the left?"

"A. Right and left. I don't know which side of the leg bone they went. The one that went in the right thigh seemed to go right straight through the thigh."

This testimony was sufficient to warrant the jury in concluding that the deceased was shot when his back was practically directly towards the accused.

Again: It is contended for the accused that the fact that one shot penetrated the palm of the right hand of the deceased confirms the testimony of the accused that the right hand of the deceased was in his hip pocket at the time the gun was fired. This may have been so. But, in view of the character of the other wounds aforesaid, the jury may have reasonably regarded the fact to have been that the hand was in the natural position of one feeling from another, namely, at the side, when the gun was fired, in which position the shot would have penetrated the palm as it did.

[3] 2. Were the dying declarations of the deceased, admitted in evidence over the objection of the accused, of such character as to have been properly admissible in evidence as dying declarations?

It appears from the petition for the writ of error that the objections of the accused to the declarations in question which are insisted upon before us are those shown by the record to have been made and overruled in the trial court, and they are, in substance, as follows:

That the declarations do not come within the meaning of dying declarations. "His (the deceased's) treatment of other people and how he treated the accused and their previous relations cannot be the subject of a dying declaration. * * * A dying declaration ought to be one as to circumstances; as to what actually happened. I move to exclude the whole thing, but particularly that part which refers to their previous relations."

As stated in 2 Wigmore on Ev. § 1434:

"* * * The declaration may not concern any and all topics. It must concern the facts leading up to or causing or attending the injurious act which resulted in the declarant's death. * * *"

Such topics, on principle and according to the weight of authority, are the res gestæ, within the meaning of that phrase as used in the books in connection with the doctrine of dying declarations.

As said in O'Boyle's Case, 100 Va. 785, at page 795, 40 S. E. 121, at page 124:

"* * * Dying declarations to identify the prisoner, or to establish the circumstances of the res gestæ, or to show transactions from which death results, are always admissible, to have the same weight as if made under the sanction of an oath."

See to same effect Swisher's Case, 26 Grat. (67 Va.) 963, 21 Am. Dec. 330, and Richards' Case, 107 Va. 881, 59 S. E. 1104.

[4, 5] Within the limitation that the declaration must be confined to "the facts leading up to, or causing or attending the homicide," any dying declaration which would be admissible as testimony had the dying person been sworn as a witness is admissible in evidence as a dying declaration. Within such limitation, the test of the admissibility or nonadmissibility of the dying declaration is whether it is hearsay, or matter of opinion, or altogether irrelevant; in such cases it is inadmissible; or whether, within the said limitation, it relates to facts within the knowledge of the declarant which are relevant. In such case it is admissible. Clark's Crim. Proc. § 210; 10 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) pp. 376, 377.

In the authority last cited, at page 376, this is said:

"Dying declarations, being a substitute for sworn testimony, must be such narrative statements as would be admissible had the dying person been sworn as a witness. If they relate to facts to which the declarant could have thus testified, they are admissible."

[6, 7] What we have said above, and the quotations we have made from the authorities, is sufficient to dispose of that portion of the dying declarations in question which had reference to the borrowing by the accused of money from the deceased. This was a fact, consisting of conduct of the accused and the deceased towards each other a few hours before and leading up to the shooting, and was material in its bearing upon the animus of the accused at the time of the shooting. Since the accused was being tried upon the charge of murder, that animus was a material issue in any aspect of the case. Had the deceased lived and been sworn as a witness in the case, there can be no doubt that his testimony on this subject would have been admissible. And especially would there have been no error in its admission in view of the fact that the accused himself testified on this subject, and the commonwealth, without objection on the part of the accused, introduced rebuttal testimony, and subsequently the accused introduced further testimony on the same subject.

This being the situation, we have no hesitancy in holding that the portion of the dying declarations just mentioned was properly admitted in evidence.

[8] Concerning the remainder of the declarations, there is more difficulty. The declarations appear in detail in the statement preceding this opinion. While general and in the form of conclusions, they all concern conduct of the accused. They are, in substance, that the accused shot the deceased; that he (the deceased) was doing nothing at the time and had not previously done anything to the accused or to anybody to give the accused any cause to do the shooting. Considered in the light of the other evidence in the case, we have no doubt that these general statements had the specific meaning to the jury that the declarant stated that he did nothing at the time of the shooting, to the accused or to Daisy Moss, and had done nothing previously to either of them, to give the accused any cause for the shooting.

There are two objections which we find from the authorities have been sometimes urged to such declarations—one that they are conclusions of fact and hence embody matter of opinion, which goes to all of the declarations; the other, which goes only to the declaration as to conduct previous to the very time of the homicide, that such declarations concern circumstances too remote from the homicide to be admissible as dying declarations.

As we understand the objections of the accused to the declarations, they are not that they are inadmissible because they are conclusions of fact or opinions, but take the position that the declarations are inadmissible in evidence for the sole reason that they concern conduct of the deceased towards other people, and especially towards the accused, previous to the very time of the homicide. However, without considering whether the form of the objections aforesaid has at all narrowed the scope of the legal questions raised, we shall proceed to consider the whole subject.

[9] We will say at the outset that it is well settled that the statements in a dying declaration, consisting merely of the state of feeling between the declarant and the person who committed the homicide, is inadmissible in evidence. See 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) p. 384. But this is not because the state of feeling between such parties leading up to and at the time of the homicide is immaterial or irrelevant, for it is decidedly material and relevant. The reason for this rule is that the accused must be tried for his deeds in the light of the situation as it reasonably appeared to him from the outward conduct and demeanor of the deceased, and not in the light of the secret state of feeling existing on the part of the deceased. However, plainly, as we think, the declarations involved in the instant case are not of a mere state of feeling between the declarant and the accused, but of outward conduct of the former towards the latter and towards another person.

[10] Coming now to the further consideration of the subject in hand, the following should be said:

As we know, the ancient rule against the admission in evidence of statements of conclusions of fact has been much relaxed in modern times.

As said in 10 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) p. 383:

"A statement which tends to show whether there was any provocation for the defendant's act may be so worded as to be admissible. It has, however, been held that the general statement that there was no cause for the defendant's act is not admissible. [Citing Kentucky and Missouri cases.] But some courts have taken the contrary view. [Citing Ohio, Mississippi, Texas, Indiana, Georgia, California, Iowa, Alabama, and North Carolina cases.]"

[11, 12] An examination of the cases discloses that in Kentucky and Missouri it is held that the dying declarations which are admissible in evidence are those confined to the topic of the facts which occurred at the very time of the killing; and it is also held in these two states that statements of the declarant of conclusions of fact are inadmissible in evidence because violative of the rule against opinion evidence of nonexpert witnesses. Starr v. Com., 97 Ky. 193, 30 S. W. 397; Collins v. Com., 12 Bush (Ky.) 271; State v. Elkins, 101 Mo. 344, 14 S. W. 116; State v. Parker, 172 Mo. 191, 72 S. W. 850. (It may be noted that in the note to section 1434 of 2 Wigmore on Ev., supra, the holding of the last-cited case is severely criticized.) The Kentucky and Missouri holding is, as we think, contrary to principle and the greater weight of authority, certainly in so far as it confines the topic to the facts which occurred at the very time of the homicide. The "facts leading up to," and hence which precede, the homicide, which have a material bearing upon the motives and the probable conduct of the accused at the time of the homicide, are relevant, and dying declarations concerning such facts are plainly admissible upon principle and according to the greater weight of authority. There is force in the position taken in the Missouri case of State v. Elkins to the effect that the opportunity for cross-examination of a witness on the stand furnishes a safeguard against untrue general statements of conclusions of fact which is absent in the case of the admission in evidence of a dying declaration; but the same consideration of necessity (which is the foundation of the rule excepting dying declarations from the rule against hearsay evidence) operates in favor of admitting in evidence dying declarations of conclusions of fact as operates in favor of admitting such declarations of specific facts. The declarant most often, indeed, is in extremis, and so not in a physical condition to state occurrences in detail, but only conclusions of fact. And, so far as truth is concerned, the sanction afforded by the sense of impending death, without any expectation or hope of recovery, would seem to constitute an equal guaranty of the truth of both character of statements. With respect to unintentional errors in statements of fact, they may, it is believed, occur at least equally as often, if not more frequently, in statements of detailed occurrences than of conclusions of fact. The trial jury is charged with, and seldom fails to perform, the duty of making the proper allowance for such errors of statement. The dying declaration is not admitted as evidence which is true, but only for the consideration of the jury for what it may consider it worth in the light of all the other evidence and circumstances in the case.

[13] The true principle would seem to be that the dying declaration is not inadmissible in evidence merely because it states a conclusion of fact, but to be admissible it must refer to a fact or facts which are relevant and which, if they do not attend the very time of the homicide, or concern the cause of the death, are so nearly antecedent in time as that it may be reasonably considered that they tend to show the motive and probable conduct of the accused at the time of the homicide, which are in issue in the case.

[14] Patterson's Case, 114 Va. 807, 75 S. E. 737, is strongly relied on for the accused. And it must be admitted that there are expressions in the opinion in that case which might bear the construction that dying declarations to be admissible must be confined in their scope to the occurrences at the very time of the homicide, and that declarations concerning transactions prior in date to the homicide itself are inadmissible in evidence, although in a dying declaration, however relevant as leading up to and disclosing the animus or evidencing the probable conduct of the accused at the time of the homicide. We cannot think, however, that such a meaning was intended. The meaning contended for on the part of the accused is derived by giving to the phrase in the opinion "circumstances of the transaction itself" the meaning of res geste in its strictest sense, which indeed has been adopted in connection with the subject by the Kentucky and Missouri courts as aforesaid. Such a restricted meaning does not seem to us, as aforesaid, to be in accord with principle or the greater weight of authority. And, if the expressions in the opinion of this court in the Patterson Case can be construed to have the meaning contended for for the accused, they are hereby disapproved. What we are satisfied, however, is meant in that opinion by the phrase "circumstances of the transaction itself" are the circumstances or facts leading up to or causing or attending the homicide; any of such things being "circumstances of the transaction itself" in the correct meaning of that phrase as used in connection with the doctrine of dying declarations.

In the Patterson Case the declaration was held to be inadmissible as a dying declaration, for the reason that it was not made under a sense of impending death without any expectation or hope of recovery; hence what was said in the opinion with respect to the essential character of dying declarations to be admissible in evidence was not necessary for the decision of the case, and doubtless the court did not give the subject as mature consideration as it would have done had the case turned upon that issue. Moreover, the opinion does not designate what portions of the declaration there involved were considered as parts and what as not parts of "the circumstances of the transaction itself"—that is to say, of the circumstances relevant to the issues involved in the case. Patterson claimed that the deceased, Campbell, threw rocks at him, and was in the act of taking up a large rock to throw again when he, Campbell, the accused, shot the deceased in self-defense. The whole declaration of the deceased, as made shortly prior to his death, was testified to by a witness as follows:

"When I got back to Campbell's, * * * I told him what Patterson said about him throwing rocks, and Campbell said that there had been no trouble between him and Patterson, and he asked me whether Patterson said that he had thrown any rocks. Says he, 'Did he say that?' and Campbell then said * * * that he never had any trouble with Patterson, only at the spring on the mountain, and that Patterson said that he had eight feet of his land and must put the fence back, and that Patterson ripped out an oath and refused to speak to him. Campbell said there had been no trouble between them, and that Patterson shot and killed him for nothing; that Patterson said, 'God damn you, don't come through my gate or I will blow your brains out.' And Campbell said that he hoped he would die that minute if he threw a rock, that whether Patterson's nerve failed him or not he did not know, but that he dropped the gun from his head and shot him in the leg. When I went back after the arrest he * * * said * * * that he never had mistreated Patterson's daughters—respected them as his own." (Italics supplied.)

Those portions of the declaration which we have italicized seem to have had reference to distinct transactions, not leading up to or in any way connected with the conduct of the accused at the time of the homicide, so as to have any evidential value as to his motive or probable conduct on the occasion of the homicide. If these were the only portions of the declaration referred to in the holding in the opinion on the subject, we consider the holding sound, in view of the issues of fact in that case. And we do not understand that the court meant to hold that any of the other declarations, though some of them were in the form of general conclusions of fact, were inadmissible in evidence.

[15] Before we pass from the Patterson Case, this further, however, should be said: The following expression is relied on in argument for the accused in the case before us, which occurs in the opinion in the Patterson Case, at page 816 of 114 Va., at page 740 of 75 S. E. namely:

"The absence of any self-serving purpose to be furthered on the part of the declarant is an essential element of the circumstantial guaranty of the trustworthiness of dying declarations. 2 Wigmore on Ev. § 1443."

This is evidently an inadvertent expression in the opinion. It is not supported by 2 Wigmore on Ev. § 1443, cited, nor have we been able elsewhere to find any authority sustaining such position. Nor can it be correct on principle, since for the most part dying declarations of deceased persons put in evidence by the commonwealth, and universally held to be admissible, in accordance with the established doctrine on that subject, are exculpatory of the deceased and inculpatory of the accused, and so must be said to have a self-serving purpose. This expression in the opinion in the Patterson Case, and what is said on the same subject in the next following paragraph therein, is hereby disapproved.

The following decisions in other jurisdictions show the trend of the great weight of authority on the subject under consideration:

In Wroe v. State, 20 Ohio St. 460, the declaration of the deceased held admissible was that the shooting "was done without any provocation on his part." The court said:

"Whether there was provocation or not is a fact, not stated, it is true, in the most elementary form of which it is susceptible, but sufficiently so to be admissible as evidence."

In Payne v. State, 61 Miss. 161, the declaration of the deceased was that the defendant "shot him without any cause." In the opinion, referring to dying declarations, this is said:

"Such declarations are * * * restricted to a statement of facts and opinions, and opinions and inferences are to be excluded, but the dying declaration admitted in this case was of a fact, and not an opinion or inference of the declarant."

In Pierson v. State, 21 Tex. App. 14, 17 S. W. 468, the declaration was:

"They had no occasion to shoot me. I had not spoken to them a word, nor had I done anything to either of them."

The court, at page 59 of 21 Tex. App., at page 470 of 17 S. W., said:

"The statement that 'they had no occasion to shoot me' was not a mere inference or opinion of the wounded man, and inadmissible on that account."

The opinion then cites with approval the cases from Ohio and Mississippi next above cited.

In Roberts v. State, 5 Tex. App. 141, the declaration admitted was that "Steve Roberts had killed him for nothing." Held: This "states a fact, beyond opinion, and is admissible."

In Boyle v. State, 97 Ind. 322, the declaration was in the form of the following question and answer:

"Q. What reason, if any, had the man you have so identified for shooting you? A. Not any that I know of."

Held:

"Admissible in evidence, being the statement of a fact, and not an opinion"—citing Wroe v. State and Roberts v. State, supra, and other authorities to the same effect, with approval.

In Darby v. State, 79 Ga. 63, 3 S. E. 663, the declaration of the deceased was that the defendant "had cut him and that he had done nothing to cause it." The court said:

"It was objected that this was a conclusion. It seems to us that it was a question of fact whether he did anything or not. It is an everyday occurrence to ask witnesses in court what the parties did, and for the reply to be made that one of the parties did a certain thing and the other did nothing. We do not think there is anything in that ground."

The declaration was held to have been properly admitted in evidence.

In State v. Mace, 118 N. O. 1244, 24 S. E. 798, the declaration held admissible in evidence was "Oh, Lord! They have murdered me for nothing in the world."

In Sullivan v. State, 102 Ala. 135, 15 South. 264, 48 Am. St. Rep. 22, the court laid down the general rule confining dying declarations, which are admissible in evidence, to the topic of the facts which occurred at the very time of the killing, with all the strictness of the Kentucky and Missouri rule, and yet held that the dying declaration involved in that case, which was, "Jim Sullivan cut me; he cut me for nothing; I never did anything to him," was admissible in evidence. The court said:

"The objections made to this testimony were that it was the conclusion of the declarant—the opinion of the deceased—and that it did not relate to the circumstances or transaction of the killing. There is nothing in this objection. The statement certainly did relate to the act or transaction of the killing. * * * He * * * said Sullivan cut him for nothing, and that he, the declarant, did nothing to Sullivan. True, this statement was very general, but it was admissible as a collective fact."

In Bull's Case, 14 Grat. (55 Va.) 613, the declaration was that the prisoner—

"struck and kicked the deceased without provocation, and for no cause except that the prisoner and those who joined him in the affray said the deceased had talked about a young lady in Haley's house, which the deceased said he had never done."

It is true that no objection was made in that case to the character of this statement, so far as appears from the report of the case; the question raised and decided by the court therein concerning only whether the declaration was made when the declarant was under a sense of impending death and without any expectation or hope of recovery. The declaration was held to be admissible in evidence, however, without any question being even raised by counsel against its admissibility because of its statements of general conclusions of fact or because those facts were not expressly confined to the occurrences at the very time of the homicide.

Coming now to a more specific consideration of the dying declarations remaining to be disposed of in the case before us, our conclusions are as follows:

[16] Since the relations of the deceased with the accused and Daisy Moss, which were in question, consisting of their conduct toward each other, had existed only for a few weeks prior to the homicide, we think that the conduct of the deceased towards the accused and Daisy Moss during the whole of that time may be fairly said to have been relevant and hence admissible in evidence as a part of the circumstances leading up to the homicide, certainly at the time the dying declaration was introduced, when the accused was being tried on the charge of murder, and his testimony had not come in limiting his defense to the narrow one of self-defense only. In fact, both the commonwealth, without objection on the part of the accused, and the accused, introduced the testimony of a number of witnesses concerning such relations during the whole of this time. We perceive no good reason why the dying declarations of the deceased on the same subject were not as properly admissible in evidence as the other testimony just referred to. If the deceased had lived and been testifying as a witness in the case, his testimony to the same effect as the declarations now under consideration would have been unquestionably properly admissible in evidence. Therefore, while, abstractly speaking, portions of these declarations were too unlimited as to time antecedent to the homicide to be admissible in evidence as dying declarations under the correct rule on the subject, practically, as applied to the facts of the instant case, they could have had no reference to any longer time than the few weeks of the association of the deceased with the aforesaid parties. Hence, upon principle, and under the holding of the weight of authority above referred to, we are of opinion that such declarations were properly admitted in evidence.

[17] 3. It appears from the record that Daisy Moss was not sent before the grand jury who indicted the accused, because "she stated that she did not know anything"; that she was summoned as a witness for the commonwealth to attend the trial of the case, and upon the entering upon the trial of the case the commonwealth moved the court to introduce Daisy Moss as a court witness on behalf of the commonwealth, she being the first witness, no other witness having been introduced, and the attorney for the commonwealth further moved the court to be permitted to cross-examine the said Daisy Moss, stating to the court as the ground for such action that the attorney assisting the attorney for the commonwealth in the prosecution had not had an opportunity to talk with this witness, although he had been at her home for that purpose, and "she had refused to talk to any one before the trial." Thereupon the court, over the objections of the accused, granted the motions of the attorneys for the commonwealth, and accordingly introduced Daisy Moss as a court witness, and the court proceeded to examine and did examine her as a witness. After she had been so examined by the court, "the witness showing great reluctance to testify," as is certified in the record, the attorneys for the commonwealth were permitted by the court, over the objection of the accused, to cross-examine the witness as a hostile witness and to ask her many leading questions. And the question is presented for our decision as to whether said action of the trial court was error.

This question must be answered in the negative.

Section 6214 of the Code of 1919 provides as follows:

"A party called to testify for another, having an adverse interest, may be examined by such other party according to the rules applicable to cross-examination."

As held in Gordon v. Funkhouser, 100 Va. 675, 42 S. E. 677, although it be not shown that a witness has an adverse interest, if it appears that the witness is in fact adverse, the statute is applicable.

Under the circumstances above narrated, we think that there was no error in the action of the trial court stated. That action amounted in substance to no more than to allow the witness, who was in fact adverse, to be examined as an adverse witness under the statute.

[18] It is urged for the accused that for a witness to be introduced as a court witness is not in accordance with the practice in Virginia; and Blackwood Coal Co. v. James, 107 Va. 656, 60 S. E. 90, is cited in support of that position. That was a civil case, in which the court, 107 Va. at page 659, 60 S. E. at page 93, said this:

"So far as we are advised, it has not been the practice in this state for the court, of its own motion, to call a witness in a civil case; but it is not necessary, in this case, to consider or decide upon the right of the court to call the witness in question."

We are of opinion that in a criminal case, under the circumstances above stated, the court has the right, in the exercise of a sound discretion, to call the witness, as was done in the instant case, and that there was no error in the action of the trial court under consideration.

[19] But one other question remains for our decision and that is this:

4. Did the court err in permitting the attorneys for the commonwealth to cross-examine the witness Frances Ranson, after introducing such witness as a commonwealth's witness and examining her in chief as such a witness?

The trial court certifies as a fact that this "witness had shown on her examination in chief by her demeanor and her answers that she was a hostile witness," and on that ground permitted the attorneys for the commonwealth to cross-examine her.

We are of opinion that the statute next above cited is applicable and fully authorized such action of the court. Hence, we find no error in such action.

The judgment under review will be affirmed.

DEITZ v. WHYTE.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Attachment \S 103—Affidavit held not to show decree on which execution could issue.

Statements in an affidavit for attachment under Code 1904, \S 2961, referring to a decree as showing the amount due, held not to warrant a presumption that plaintiff had a personal decree against defendant on which execution could issue, and that therefore attachment would not lie.

2. Appeal and error \S 1002—Verdict for claimant in attachment on conflicting evidence conclusive.

Verdict for a claimant in attachment rendered on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed.

3. Fraudulent conveyances \S 149(2)—Recording statute inapplicable where possession passes to third party before plaintiff's rights attach.

Where defendant sold the property to a third party, who obtained possession before plaintiff's rights attached it was immaterial that the bill of sale was never recorded.

4. Appeal and error \S 1058(1)—Erroneous exclusion of evidence harmless where subsequently admitted.

Where evidence is erroneously excluded, but subsequently admitted, the error is harmless, no prejudice having resulted.

5. Evidence \S 243(1, 7)—Agent's declarations not during agency inadmissible against principal.

The declarations of an agent made before the agency began or after its termination cannot be given in evidence against his principal.

6. Evidence \S 121(3)—Claimant's letter of instruction to agent admissible as part of res gestæ on issue of ownership.

Where certain mules and a horse were attached, on an issue of ownership set up by a claimant, the claimant's letter of instructions to his agent sent when the property was delivered to him for pasturage, stating that it belonged to claimant, held admissible as part of the res gestæ.

7. Trial \S 191(4)—Instruction not erroneous as assuming facts.

In attachment, where a third party made claim to the property through a sale, an instruction on that subject held not erroneous, as assuming the fact of a sale, or that the person to whom claimant delivered the property was his agent.

8. Appeal and error \S 362(2) — Petition for writ of error must specifically point out errors.

A petition for a writ of error is a pleading, and must specifically point out the errors complained of, a reference generally to "various other errors" being insufficient.

Error to Circuit Court, Tazewell County.

Action in attachment by William F. Deitz, against Samuel G. Walker, wherein W. W. Whyte filed a petition claiming ownership of the property levied on. Judgment for the intervening claimant and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Sexton & Roberts, of Bluefield, W. Va., for plaintiff in error.

R. O. Crockett, of Tazewell, for defendant in error.

BURKS, J. In June, 1918, Deitz sued out an attachment against Samuel G. Walker, and had the same levied on certain mules and a horse which the plaintiff claimed was the property of the defendant Walker. The defendant in error, W. W. Whyte, filed a petition in the cause claiming the ownership of the property levied on, and an issue was made up upon this petition and tried by a jury. After a full hearing of the evidence the jury rendered a verdict in favor of Whyte. The trial court refused to set aside this verdict, and to the judgment entered thereon the writ of error in this case was awarded.

The mules and horse had been purchased by Samuel G. Walker & Co. in St. Louis in April, 1917, for work on the county roads in West Virginia, where the firm of Samuel G. Walker & Co. had a large contract. In May, 1917, Samuel G. Walker came to Mr. Whyte and requested a loan of $3,000, which Mr. Whyte refused to make, but on the contrary told Walker that, while he would not make him the loan, he would purchase the mules and horse from the firm at $3,000. The sale was consummated on May 9, 1917, when a bill of sale for ten mules and one horse was executed and delivered to Whyte. Whyte did not at that time take possession of the mules and horse, but left them in the possession of Samuel G. Walker & Co. until they could complete the contract on which this stock was then being used. This contract was not completed until about April 1, 1918, when the mules and horse were delivered to H. F. Harman, agent for Mr. Whyte. Whyte had previously sent H. F. Harman to Virginia to engage pasture for this stock in Russell county, and when the contract of Samuel G. Walker & Co. aforesaid was completed about April, 1918, Harman, as the agent for Whyte, carried the mules and the horse to Tazewell county and put them to pasture in accordance with the contract previously made therefor. The bill of sale aforesaid was never recorded in either West Virginia or Virginia.

It was earnestly contended by counsel for Deitz that there never was any sale of this property by Walker & Co. to Whyte, and that Whyte had simply loaned to Samuel G. Walker & Co. the sum of $3,000, and that the bill of sale was nothing more than a mortgage to secure this loan. It is further contended for Deitz that if there was any sale the possession was allowed to remain with the sellers, and that the bill of sale was void as to Deitz because never recorded. It was also contended on behalf of Deitz that the transaction between Samuel G. Walker & Co. and Whyte was fraudulent as to Deitz, and the property was liable to the attachment. All of these contentions of Deitz were earnestly denied by Whyte, and there was a full hearing on the merits in the trial court.

[1] The defendant in error, Whyte, moves this court to dismiss the writ of error on the ground that the trial court had no jurisdiction of the attachment. The attachment was sued out under section 2961 of the Code of 1904, and it is insisted by the defendant in error that at the time the attachment was sued out the plaintiff in error had a decree for the amount of his debt against Samuel G. Walker & Co. upon which he could issue an execution at any time, and that therefore an attachment under section 2961 did not lie. Upon the record as it stands the trial court appears to have had jurisdiction of the attachment under section 2961, and if there was a lack of jurisdiction it was because of the existence of facts not made to appear in the present record. The defendant in error relies upon the statement in the affidavit for the attachment as showing that there had been a decree upon which an execution could issue, but the affidavit to the attachment does not show this. It states the amount of affiant's debt, the time from which it bears interest, and also claims the costs of a certain chancery suit pending in the circuit court of Tazewell county, Va., in the name of Deitz v. Samuel G. Walker, and refers to the whole "as shown by a decree of said court entered at the May, 1918, term thereof." It is not stated that any decree had been entered therefor, or that any execution could have been issued thereon. The decree is simply referred to as showing the amount due. No copy of the decree is filed, and no evidence was offered to show that Deitz could subject the property in any way save by the attachment. We cannot presume from this mere reference that Deitz had a personal decree against Walker for the amount aforesaid. There may or may not have been such a decree, or a decree may have been rendered and execution thereon suspended, or there may have been other reasons showing that Deitz had no right to sue out an execution. At all events, the affidavit and attachment conform to the statute, and the record does not show anything to defeat the jurisdiction. For these reasons the motion to dismiss the writ of error is overruled.

[2] The first assignment of error is to the action of the court in refusing to set aside the verdict of the jury as contrary to the evidence, or without evidence to support it. The main argument presented in the petition is under this assignment of error. It is earnestly insisted that the transaction was fraudulent, and that the bill of sale was void because not recorded. There are undoubtedly many badges of fraud set forth in the petition and earnestly insisted on. The evidence for the plaintiff and defendant, respectively, is directly in conflict on a number of the most material questions involved. There can be no doubt that if the case had been submitted to the jury on the testimony in behalf of Whyte alone, a verdict in his favor must have been found. Whether the transaction was a sale or a mortgage, or whether or not it was fraudulent, were questions properly submitted to the jury with whose verdict we cannot interfere.

[3] The bill of sale was executed in West Virginia, and the property remained with the seller only in West Virginia, so that the Virginia statute has no application thereto. Before the property was removed to Virginia, according to the testimony for Whyte, it was turned over to him as purchaser. This occurred before Deitz had acquired any right whatever to subject the property to the payment of his debt. When the property was brought into Virginia it was brought as the property of Whyte. The jury was fully instructed on this subject at the instance of Deitz, and the finding of the jury settled the question that the property was in the possession of Whyte when brought into Virginia. In Sydnor v. Gee, 4 Leigh (31 Va.) 535, it was held:

"If an absolute sale of chattels, fair in itself, be not accompanied and followed by immediate possession, but possession is taken by the vendee before the rights of any creditor of the vendor attach, the sale is good against the vendor's creditors."

In the course of his opinion in that case, Judge Tucker said, at page 549:

"It is strongly my impression that the failure to deliver possession, where there is no real fraud intended, does not attach fraud to the transaction forever; and that a subsequent delivery will make it valid and effectual against all creditors whose debts are contracted, and all purchasers whose bargains are made, after such subsequent delivery."

See, also, Clark v. Ward, 12 Grat. (53 Va.) 440.

In Poling v. Flanagan, 41 W. Va. 192, 23 S. E. 635, it was held that—

"Under a bona fide sale of chattels, though there is no delivery of possession at the time of sale, yet, if the purchaser gets possession of them before an attachment is levied, his title is good against the attachment."

The next assignment of error is the action of the trial court in excluding from the jury the testimony of H. S. Lefler regarding statements made to him by H. F. Harman, agent for Whyte, at the time he made the contract for rent of pasture and at the time the mules and horse were delivered at the pasture. H. S. Lefler was the manager of the farm on which the mules and horse were to be pastured. It is true that the trial court did at one time exclude the testimony as to this statement. This exclusion was made at an early stage of the examination of the witness Lefler. The record shows, however, that Lefler was afterwards recalled by defendant's counsel and in the first question propounded to him defendant's counsel said:

"Mr. Lefler, the court has ruled that you can give your testimony as to what occurred at the time the contract was made for the pasture of the mules and at the time the mules were delivered there between you and Mr. Harman."

Counsel then proceeded to examine him on this subject, and was allowed to examine him fully and to bring out everything that had been excluded at the earlier stage of the examination. While he was being examined the court broke into the examination and propounded to him the following question:

"What all did Howard Harman say the day he brought the mules there; that is what we want to know—and the day he arranged for the pasture?"

[4] The witness testified fully on the subject, so that the defendant could not have been prejudiced by the exclusion of the testimony at the earlier stage of his examination.

[5] Exception was also taken to the ruling of the trial court excluding certain declarations which had been made by Harman, the agent of Whyte, a week before the horses were brought to Virginia, and several months after they had been there; the first conversation having taken place in West Virginia. Harman had not been appointed the agent of Whyte at the time of the first conversation, and his agency had terminated long before the second conversation. It is well settled that the declaration of an agent, made before the agency began or after its termination, cannot be given in evidence against his principal. The agent is a competent witness, and may be put on the stand and allowed to testify as any other witness, but his declarations are not admissible. Huffcut on Agency, § 137; Lake v. Tyree, 90 Va. 719, 721, 19 S. E. 787; Fisher v. White, 94 Va. 236, 26 S. E. 573; Hoge v. Turner, 96 Va. 624, 32 S. E. 291. It may be observed in this connection that Harman was put on the stand by the defendant during the progress of the trial, but the defendant never asked him a question on the subject of these various conversations. There was no error, therefore, in excluding the declarations alleged to have been made by this witness.

The next error assigned is the refusal of the trial court to strike out the testimony of Whyte relating to the contents of certain letters he claimed to have written to Lefler, the superintendent of the farm, regarding the ownership of the mules and horse. Whyte testifies that he wrote one letter by mail the day before the mules were sent, and wrote another which he sent by Harman, who carried the mules. The letter sent by mail contained nothing of great importance. In the letter sent by Harman, Whyte testifies that he wrote "these were my mules and to take good care of them, and that I would pay whatever the cost was." Lefler denied that Harman delivered any letter to him at the time the mules were delivered, but did admit that he had received two or three letters from Harman on the subject, but he states that in one of these letters he referred to the mules not as "my mules," but as "our mules," and says that this letter was received some time after the attachment was levied.

[6] Whyte testifies that the letter sent by Harman was a letter of instructions. If it was delivered at the time he delivered the mules it constituted part of the res gestæ. The contract for the pasturage for the mules had been made, but the name of the owner had not been given. Now, the mules are delivered for pasturage, and the owner writes: "These are my mules, take good care of them, and I will pay you the cost. This was explanatory of the act of delivery of the mules,

Whether the letter was delivered at the same time that the mules were delivered, or sent at a later period was a question for the jury. No objection was made to the testimony, on the ground that no such letter had been delivered, nor that it was parol evidence of the contents of a writing, the original of which was not produced or accounted for, or that no notice had been given to produce the original, nor was any other objection made to the introduction of the testimony. On the contrary, Whyte was examined at length, as to these letters, and the addressee was examined to show that no such letter was delivered by Harman at the time the mules were delivered. The bill of exceptions states that—

"After all the evidence offered by both the plaintiff and defendant had been heard by the jury, the defendant moved the court to strike from the record and from the consideration of the jury the evidence with reference to any letters claimed to have been written by W. W. Whyte to H. S. Lefler with reference to said mules and horse, for the reason that such letters, if produced, would have been improper testimony in this case if offered by said Whyte, because merely self-serving declarations."

The trial court refused to strike out the testimony as requested, and in this there was no error. Whyte had been cross-examined at length as to these letters, Lefler had been examined to contradict him, and no objection had been offered to the testimony until all the evidence on both sides had been heard by the jury, and the objection, when it did come, was merely because the letters, if produced, would be improper because self-serving. If, as seems probable, the letter was delivered at the same time that the mules were delivered, the contents of the letter were not merely self-serving, but were explanatory of the act of delivery of the mules, and as such were properly receivable. Cluverius v. Commonwealth, 81 Va. 805, 806; Scott & Boyd v. Shelor, 28 Grat. (69 Va.) 897; Crite v. Commonwealth, 1 Va. Dec. 431.

The next assignment of error is to the ruling of the trial court in granting an instruction in behalf of the petitioner. This instruction was as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that W. W. Whyte, by a written contract of sale, purchased the mules in controversy, for a valuable consideration, from Sam G. Walker & Co., such purchase being made in McDowell county, W. Va., and while the said mules were in said McDowell county, that the laws of the state of Virginia relative to the recordation of contracts for sale of personal property (as comprised in section 2405 of the Code of Virginia) did not apply to such contract of sale so long as the property remained in the state of West Virginia; that if they further believe from the evidence that the said W. W. Whyte took possession of the said mules in McDowell county, W. Va., and sent them by his agent, H. F. Harman, to the Sanders farm in Tazewell county, Va., and said mules so remained on said farm in Tazewell county, Va., until levied on under the attachment in this case, then the jury shall find for the plaintiff, W. W. Whyte, even though they shall further believe that the said contract of sale was never recorded in Tazewell county, Va."

[7] The objection to this instruction is that it assumes that Howard Harman was the agent of W. W. Whyte, and also that the contract in question was "a sale out and out of the mules and horse." We do not think the instruction is amenable to either of the objections mentioned, and read in connection with other instructions given in the case it fairly presented the case to the jury. It may be observed further in this connection that the defendant himself had excepted to the ruling of the court refusing to allow witnesses to testify to certain conversation had with Harman which could only have affected Whyte in the event that Harman was his agent.

The fifth and last assignment of error is:

"Fifth: Various other errors, in the rulings and judgment of the court, occurring during the trial of the case and which are covered by the various exceptions of the petitioner, taken at the time, all of which clearly appear in the record of this case."

[8] This amounts to no assignment at all, and will not be considered. A petition for a writ of error is a pleading, and must specifically point out the errors complained of. It is always incumbent on the plaintiff in error to point out in what respect the trial court has committed error to his prejudice. Lorillard Co. v. Clay, 127 Va. 734, 104 S. E. 384, and cases cited.

We find no error in the judgment of the trial court, and it is accordingly affirmed.

Affirmed.

DEITZ v. HIGH.

(131 Va. 7)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 1067—Error, if any, in striking part of instruction, leaving substance intact, harmless.

Where plaintiff in error admitted that the act of the court in striking part of an instruction left the substance practically intact, the error, if any, was harmless.

2. Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 730(1) — Assignment failing to specify error in instructions held insufficient.

An assignment of error based on the giving of certain instructions admittedly correct as abstract propositions, but claimed to be improper in the particular case, held insufficient as not pointing out the reasons why the instructions were not proper.

3. Fraudulent conveyances ⇨295(1)—Finding that sale of property levied on was not fraudulent sustained.

In interpleader proceedings by a claimant of property levied on, evidence held to support a finding that the sale to claimant by the defendant in execution was not fraudulent in fact.

4. Fraudulent conveyances ⇨299(9)—Finding that possession of property sold by debtor was transferred sustained.

Where property levied on was by an interpleading claimant alleged to have been purchased by him under an unrecorded contract, evidence held to support a finding that possession was not allowed to remain in the debtor after the sale.

Error to Circuit Court, Tazewell County.

Interpleader proceedings by O. G. High against William F. Deitz, asserting a claim to property levied on by the latter as belonging to Samuel G. Walker. Judgment for plaintiff in the interpleader, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Sexton & Roberts, of Bluefield, W. Va., for plaintiff in error.

R. O. Crockett, of Tazewell, for defendant in error.

BURKS, J. This is a contest over certain personal property alleged to have been the property of Samuel G. Walker. An execution in favor of Deitz against Walker was levied on the property, and it was claimed by the defendant in error, C. G. High. In an interpleader proceeding instituted by High, the title to the property was tried before a jury, who found in favor of High. Judgment was entered in his favor, and to that judgment a writ of error was awarded.

The property was levied on in the Pocahontas Inn, at Pocahontas, Va., in October and November, 1918. Prior to coming to Pocahontas, Walker and High had been engaged together in the retail liquor business at various points in West Virginia for about 12 years. When prohibition went into effect in that state, they came to Pocahontas together, and Walker purchased the Pocahontas Inn building. The defendant in error, High, testified as to what took place thereafter as follows:

"That a corporation was organized under the name of Pocahontas Inn Company, Incorporated, and it conducted both a hotel and retail liquor business, the retail liquor business being first conducted in the hotel or Pocahontas Inn building, and later in a new brick building erected by Sam G. Walker, adjoining the said Inn building, and on the same lot; that he was interested as a stockholder in the Pocahontas Inn Company, Incorporated; that Sam G. Walker was also interested as a stockholder in said Pocahontas Inn Company, Incorporated; that he and Sam G. Walker had charge of the retail liquor business conducted by Pocahontas

Inn Company, Incorporated, and that he, a part of the time, prior to the fire of February, 1915, partly destroying the Pocahontas Inn, had charge of the hotel conducted by Pocahontas Inn Company, Incorporated; that some time thereafter a new corporation was organized and chartered under the name of Sam G. Walker & Co., Incorporated, of which he was a stockholder and Sam G. Walker was a stockholder, and of which he and the said Sam G. Walker were in charge; that thereafter the retail liquor business which had been formerly conducted by Pocahontas Inn Company, Incorporated, was conducted by Sam G. Walker & Co., Incorporated; that during the early part of the year 1915 the Pocahontas Inn building was partly destroyed by fire, and that Sam G. Walker & Co., Incorporated, suffered considerable loss therefrom by reason of the fact that it had large quantities of liquor stored therein; that the said Sam G. Walker, by reason of the said loss and the failure to have his insurance adjusted promptly, became hard up for money; that the said firm of Sam G. Walker & Co., Incorporated, became involved by reason of its loss by said fire and the failure to have its insurance promptly adjusted, and it became necessary for some one to advance to said Sam G. Walker & Co., Incorporated, funds to carry on its business; that witness at that time loaned to said corporation the sum of $1,000, which was never repaid to him; that after said loan Sam G. Walker & Co., Incorporated, carried on its retail liquor business until May 1, 1916, and made a profit of about $6,000; that Sam G. Walker, who was president of said company, drew out the said entire profits from the business, and made use of them for his own personal uses, thereby using the dividends which belonged to the witness, and the said Sam G. Walker, recognizing his personal indebtedness to the witness, executed to the witness the written contract of date May 1, 1916, introduced in evidence in this case; that for some months prior to May 1, 1916, being the date of such written contract, the property in controversy in this case had been in the brick building or saloon, and possession of Sam G. Walker & Co., Incorporated, and had been used by such corporation in the conduct of its business; that on May 1, 1916, the said property was still in the said brick building or saloon and possession, and remained there until removed as hereinafter stated; that the said property and the furniture and fixtures of Sam G. Walker & Co., Incorporated, which had been used by said corporation in the conduct of its said business, remained in said building and possession of Sam G. Walker & Co., Incorporated, for some time after May 1, 1916; that shortly after May 1, 1916, witness was called to the bedside of his father, who was very ill, and while away from Pocahontas some one, whom he understands was Sam G. Walker, removed the property in controversy in this case from the said brick building or saloon building into the building of Pocahontas Inn or hotel building, in which Pocahontas Inn Company, Incorporated, was conducting a hotel business, which hotel building had been repaired after said fire, such removal being made without the knowledge or consent of the witness; that he understands that said properties were removed from said brick building or saloon building in order to change or remodel the interior of same preparatory to its use as a motion picture theater; that the large mirror, mentioned in said written contract, after its removal from said saloon building, was attached to the partition between the dining room of said Pocahontas Inn Building and sample room that had been constructed from a large porch along the side of same; that the iron safe was placed in a room adjoining the washroom, and that the office counter or cigar case and cash register were placed in the lobby of the Inn, and used in connection with the business of said Inn; that the said Sam G. Walker explained to witness that the reason he placed said mirror there was in order to prevent its being broken; that prohibition went into effect in the town of Pocahontas at midnight on April 30, 1916, after which time said Sam G. Walker & Co., Incorporated, ceased its business of retailing ardent spirits; that at the time said contract was executed he showed same to his attorney, and asked his attorney if said contract would protect him, and he replied that it would; that witness soon thereafter went to the city of Roanoke, Va., where he entered into a liquor business with Virginia Wine & Liquor Company, of which he was a stockholder, and continued in said business there until prohibition went into effect in Virginia November 1, 1916; that witness knew that Sam G. Walker was indebted at the time he executed the said writing; that he did not know what the contract was between the defendant, Deitz, and Sam G. Walker; that he knew that defendant had not been paid for work of installing the heat and plumbing in the Pocahontas Inn building after the fire, which work had been completed, or was about complete, at the time said written contract was executed; that he had never told any one except John Roberts, an attorney, of his said purchase; that on November 22, 1918, said property was advertised for sale under decree of the circuit court of Taxewell county, Va., in the case of William F. Deitz v. Sam G. Walker et al., and when he heard of such advertisement he appeared at Pocahontas and made claim to the said property; that such advertisement of sale was pursuant of a decree entered in the case of William F. Deitz v. Sam G. Walker et al.; that said property was not sold as the property of Sam G. Walker, but the sale continued at his request; that prior to the execution of said written contract, and while the safe was in the possession and use of Sam G. Walker & Co., Incorporated, witness had possession of the keys to said safe mentioned in said contract, and that after said sale he retained possession of said keys and used said safe in which to store some of his property while the same was in the Pocahontas Inn building, and that no one else ever used said safe because the inside doors of same were locked and the keys held by him; that he had never paid any taxes on said property nor had he ever been charged with any taxes on said property."

The witness also testified that he purchased the property of Samuel G. Walker on May 1, 1916, at which time Walker executed and delivered to him a bill of sale in the following words and figures:

"Know all men by these presents: That I, Sam G. Walker, of Welch, W. Va., in consideration of one thousand dollars ($1,000.00) the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, do hereby grant, sell, transfer and deliver unto Chas. G. High the following property, to wit: All office and bar fixtures as used in Stag Bar in brick annex of Pocahontas Inn, Pocahontas, Va., including front and back bar fixtures with mirror, racks and cases, one double drawer National cash register, one standing desk, one flat top office table, one Mosler iron safe, one high stool, two office chairs, one check protector.

"To have and to hold the said goods and chattels unto the said Chas. G. High, his executors, administrators and assigns, to his proper use and benefit forever. And I, the said Sam G. Walker, do avow myself to be the true and lawful owner of said goods and chattels; that I have full power and good right and lawful authority to dispose of said goods and chattels in manner aforesaid; and that I will warrant and defend the same against the lawful claims and demands of all persons whomsoever.

"In witness whereof, I the said Sam G. Walker, have hereunto set my hand this first day of May, 1916. Sam G. Walker.

"M. C. Smith, Witness."

We have given the testimony of this witness practically in full, because it is mainly upon his testimony that the plaintiff in error relies for reversal. The execution of the contract was also proved by M. C. Smith, the subscribing witness thereto.

On behalf of the defendant, Deitz, it was shown that the property levied on was pointed out as the property of Walker by Mrs. Dupuy, who was in charge of the Pocahontas Inn at the time of the levy; that the claim of High as owner of the property was not made or heard of, so far as the witness knew, until the day first appointed for the sale thereof; that the property was never listed for taxes by High, but that the "personal property in the Pocahontas Inn building for those years (1917 and 1918) was assessed * * * in the name of Samuel G. Walker, the owner of the building."

It is assigned as error that the trial court struck out the words italicized in the following instruction offered by the defendant Deitz:

"The court instructs the jury that if you believe from the evidence that Sam G. Walker was, prior to the 1st day of May, 1916, the owner of the property mentioned in the plaintiff's petition, and was in possession thereof as owner, and that he on the said 1st day of May, 1916, entered into a written contract by which he sold said property to the plaintiff, which contract was signed by him, and if you further believe from the evidence that the possession of said property was left with the said Sam G. Walker by the said purchaser, the plaintiff, then you are further instructed that said contract of sale was void, as to creditors, until and except from the time that it is duly admitted to record in the county or corporation wherein the property embraced in said contract may be, and if you believe from the evidence that the contract offered in evidence is not now, or was not of record in Tazewell county at the time the defendant had execution issue and placed in the hands of the sheriff, that then you must find against the plaintiff on the issue joined."

[1] Plaintiff in error admits in his petition that the "action of the trial court perhaps left the substance of the instruction practically intact," but insists that he was "clearly entitled to have his entire instruction given to the jury." The admission is a demonstration that the error, if any, was harmless, and not a ground for reversal.

It may be observed in passing that the words used in the instruction, "that the possession of said property was left with" the grantor, are not the words of the statute. The language of the statute is "When the possession is allowed to remain with the grantor." It is always safer to use the language of the statute where it can be done. "Left," as used in the instruction, may mean temporary leaving which could not be cured by a subsequent transfer of possession, even though possession was thereafter taken before the rights of others attached. In Deltz v. Whyte, 109 S. E. 212, decided to-day, we had occasion to quote the language of Judge Tucker in Sydnor v. Gee, 4 Leigh (31 Va.) 535, 549, as follows:

"It is strongly my impression that the failure to deliver possession, where there is no real fraud intended, does not attach fraud to the transaction forever; and that a subsequent delivery will make it valid and effectual against all creditors whose debts are contracted, and all purchasers whose bargains are made, after such subsequent delivery."

The next assignment of error is:

"The trial court erred in giving the two instructions to the jury on behalf of the plaintiff, O. G. High, over petitioner's objection. * * *"

"While said instructions may be correct as abstract propositions of law, petitioner submits that they were improperly allowed and given to the jury in this case."

[2] This is not such an assignment of error as this court will consider. If there were any reasons why the instructions were not proper, it was the duty of the party complaining to point them out. It would be unreasonable to expect this court to search the record to ascertain why instructions which are admitted to be "correct as abstract propositions of law * * * were improperly allowed." P. Lorillard & Co. v. Clay, 127 Va. 784, 104 S. E. 384, and cases cited.

[3] It is earnestly insisted that the transaction was actually fraudulent, and that the dealings of Walker and High were mere devices to screen the property of Walker from the payment of his honest debts. Undoubtedly the evidence presents strong suspicions of fraud, and counsel for the plaintiff in error in their able review of the evidence point out various indicia of fraud, but the question of fraud or no fraud was fairly and fully presented to the jury, and was one which it was peculiarly their province to decide. It is immaterial what we think of the weight of the testimony as it appears in the printed record. The jury have found that the transaction was not fraudulent in fact, and we are unable to say that their verdict on this question is without evidence to support it, or is so plainly contrary to the evidence that it is our duty to set it aside. The law relating to fraud and the presumptions and burden of proof in cases of fraud has been so often stated by this court that it is not necessary to enter upon any detailed discussion thereof. See Hutcheson v. Savings Bank, 129 Va. —, 105 S. E. 677; Hickman v. Trout, 83 Va. 478, 3 S. E. 181; Engleby v. Harvey, 93 Va. 445, 25 S. E. 225; American Net & Twine Co. v. Mayo, 97 Va. 182, 33 S. E. 523; Flook v. Armentrout, 100 Va. 638, 42 S. E. 686; Johnson v. Lucas, 103 Va. 86, 48 S. E. 497; Redwood v. Rogers, 105 Va. 155, 53 S. E. 6; Shoemaker v. Chapman Drug Co., 112 Va. 612, 72 S. E. 121.

[4] Finally, it is said that the trial court erred in not setting aside the verdict because, even if not fraudulent in fact, the failure to record the bill of sale rendered it fraudulent as to the plaintiff in error, under the provisions of section 2465 of the Code of 1904, now section 5194 Code 1919. It is conceded that the property in controversy was, prior to the sale, the individual property of Samuel G. Walker, and that if possession was allowed to remain with him after the sale, and until the rights of Deltz had attached thereto, the verdict of the jury is wrong, and must be set aside. Whether or not the property was allowed to remain with Walker after the sale was a question of fact which was fairly submitted to the jury under a proper instruction granted at the request of Deltz, and the finding of the jury on that question was that it was not. The testimony of High is that the Pocahontas Inn and Samuel G. Walker & Co. were each corporations in which both Walker and High were stockholders, and that Walker was president of the latter company, but the extent of their holdings of stock, or how far they had control of these corporations does not appear; that the Samuel G. Walker & Co. "ceased its business of retailing ardent spirits" on April 30, 1916, but not that it ceased to exist or to do any other business; and that the property in controversy was from time to time, at and after the sale, in the possession of one or the other of the two corporations aforesaid. There is no direct evidence that Walker, individually, at any time, either at or after the sale, had possession of said property. There are circumstances from which the jury might have inferred possession or control by Walker, but the jury did not take that view, and in the face of the testimony hereinbefore recited, we are unable to say that the verdict of the jury on this question is either without evidence to support it, or is plainly contrary to the evidence.

We find no reversible error in the judgment of the circuit court, and the same is therefore affirmed.

Affirmed.

HINES, Director General of Railroads, v. BUCHANAN.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 28, 1921.)

1. Carriers ⇨121 — Not liable for injuries traceable solely to improper loading and packing undertaken by shipper himself.

Generally a common carrier has the duty of loading and unloading the goods and is responsible for loss or injury incident thereto, but where a shipper for purposes of his own convenience undertakes to load and unload the goods, the carrier is not responsible for injuries received in transportation traceable solely to improper loading and packing.

2. Carriers ⇨134 — Evidence held to prove carrier did not make practice of inspecting carloads loaded by shippers.

In action for damage to household goods loaded and packed by third party employed to so do by shipper, in car furnished by carrier, evidence held to prove that carrier did not make a practice of inspecting carloads loaded by shippers.

3. Carriers ⇨111—Carrier not required to inspect cars loaded by shippers to see if goods are properly packed.

A carrier is not required to inspect carloads loaded by shippers to ascertain whether goods have been properly packed before proceeding to transport them.

4. Carriers ⇨134—Evidence held to prove goods were improperly loaded and packed in car by shipper's agents.

In shipper's action for damage to a carload of household goods, evidence held to prove the goods were not properly loaded and packed in the car by third parties employed by shipper.

5. Carriers ⇨132—Negligence presumed from arrival of goods in damaged condition.

Negligence in transportation will be presumed from arrival of goods at destination in damaged condition.

6. Carriers ⇨134—Evidence held to overcome presumption of negligent transportation arising from arrival of goods in damaged condition.

In shipper's action for damage to carload of household goods, evidence held to overcome presumption of negligent transportation arising from arrival of goods in damaged condition and to prove that damage would not have occurred if the car had been properly loaded and the goods properly packed.

Error to Law and Equity Court of City of Richmond.

Action by Elizabeth Buchanan against W. D. Hines, Director General of Railroads. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Munford, Hunton, Williams & Anderson, of Richmond, for plaintiff in error.

T. Justin Moore, of Richmond, for defendant in error.

SAUNDERS, J. This is a writ of error awarded on the application of the Director General of Railroads, United States Railroad Administration, operating the system of the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad Company, to a judgment of the law and equity court of the city of Richmond in the sum of $740, entered in January, 1920, on a motion for judgment on the part of Elizabeth Buchanan against the said Director General. There is a companion suit to this proceeding, in which the said Elizabeth Buchanan is plaintiff and Smith & Hicks, Inc., is defendant. In the first case the plaintiff in error is the Director General; in the second Elizabeth Buchanan. Originally Mrs. Buchanan sued the Director General and Smith & Hicks, jointly, but the court held that the liability alleged was several, and should be determined in a separate action against each defendant. Thereupon the plaintiff instituted several actions, and both cases were heard and decided by the law and equity court on the same evidence, a jury being waived, and all matters of law and evidence submitted to the court. The judgment of the court was favorable to the plaintiff in the action against the Director General, and adverse in the action against Smith & Hicks. In the first case a writ of error was awarded the Director General, and in the second case one was secured by the plaintiff, the said Elizabeth Buchanan.

These actions arose out of a shipment by the plaintiff of certain articles of valuable furniture and household effects from her home in Richmond to a new home in Atlantic City, N. J. The Smith & Hicks corporation was employed to remove, crate, and ship this furniture to Atlantic City. Certain features of this contract of employment will be adverted to later. About September 10, 1918, Mrs. Buchanan notified Smith & Hicks that she wished the shipment of her effects to be made. Thereupon representatives of the said corporation went to the plaintiff's house in Richmond, and took charge of the crating, hauling, packing, loading, and shipping of said effects. These goods were to be loaded in a car which Mrs. Buchanan had ordered, and had had placed for convenience of loading at the old baseball park in Richmond. This car was a suitable box car, in good condition, the property of the Atlantic Coast Line, but in charge of and operated at the time by the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad Company. After Smith & Hicks loaded the car, they turned the same over to the railroad company on the evening of September 10, 1918, taking therefor an order notify bill of lading, with the following notation on its face:

"S. L. and O., R., F. & P. R. R. Co. and connections not responsible for number or condition of packages" —that is to say, shipper's load and count, R., F. & P. Railroad Company and connections not responsible for number or condition of packages. Another notation on the bill of lading was to the following effect:

"Unusual conditions prevail on the lines of the carriers which will handle this shipment, and it is subject to delay."

About a week after the bill of lading was issued—to be exact, eight days—that car reached Atlantic City. The concern of William Heald Company of that city was employed to unload the car, and transport its contents to Mrs. Buchanan's house. William Graham, an employee of said company, broke the seal and entered the car. He immediately noted that its contents were in the utmost confusion. He took a couple of pieces of furniture to plaintiff's home, and reported the condition of the shipment. Thereupon Mrs. Buchanan, and, at her request, Ellis H. Evans, the manager of the Heald Company, proceeded to the car to make an examination of the contents. This examination confirmed the report of Graham. The contents of the car were in a state of wild disorder. The floor was littered with broken bits of furniture, books, and shattered graphophone records. In the language of one witness:

"Pieces were broken off of almost everything. It was chipped, and it was strewn over the floor of the car." "There was no indication of bracing," and "nothing at all in place to indicate that there was any packing done in the car."

Citing this witness further:

"There was no semblance of a packing job in the car to my idea of the way furniture of that description should have been packed. It appeared to be thrown in there in any sort of fashion." "There was not enough lumber to crate any one piece that I recognized, unless possibly a light chair."

The furniture in the car was badly scarred, and practically it was all damaged. Several of the mirrors were left on the pieces to which they belonged. A witness acquainted with the values of secondhand furniture said that the "damage inflicted had depreciated the value of the furniture as of the time of shipment at least one-half." The car was about two-thirds full, the actual weight of the contents being about 7,400 pounds, but said contents were shipped as 12,000 pounds, the minimum for a carload lot. This shortage of contents emphasized the necessity for proper bracing to prevent oscillation of said contents under the shocks and jars incident to the ordinary handling and movement of freight trains.

Having ascertained the extent and character of the mischief done, Mrs. Buchanan made demand upon Smith & Hicks and the railway company for the damages sustained. Each defendant denied responsibility, and insisted that the other was responsible. Ultimately, as noted supra, both defendants were sued in several actions. We are now concerned with the case against the railway company.

In her declaration in this action the plaintiff alleged that she employed Smith & Hicks, Inc., to "pack, crate, transfer, haul, load, and ship" the furniture and other articles in question; that these parties were to "exercise ordinary care generally in the manner of handling, hauling, packing, and shipping said furniture," etc., and particularly to wrap and pack securely in the car said household goods and effects; that in violation of their undertakings in this regard said Smith & Hicks negligently hauled, carried, transferred, loaded and shipped said goods and effects, with an utter disregard of consequences; that they wholly failed to crate, wrap, load, brace, and pack securely, or to crate, wrap, or pack in any manner, said furniture and effects; that as the proximate result of the negligence of said Smith & Hicks, its agents, etc., together with the concurring negligence of the carriers concerned in the transportation, the goods of the plaintiff were greatly damaged.

It will be noted that with respect to Smith & Hicks the plaintiff charges specific failure in the first instance to crate and wrap her goods in proper fashion, and in the second instance to load and brace these goods in like fashion in the car. With respect to the railroad company, she alleges that this negligence of Smith & Hicks in the matter of packing, crating, and shipping her effects was, or should have been, perfectly obvious to said company; that it was the duty of said company to inspect the car to determine whether its contents were loaded with reasonable care and in such manner that they could be carried safely, and to carry same safely, without accident or mishap, and without unnecessary jarring, jostling, and shaking of the same; that in violation of its duties in these regards the defendant company, its agents and employees, wholly failed to exercise ordinary and reasonable care, or any degree of care to inspect said car at Richmond, or elsewhere, to determine whether its contents were loaded in such manner that they could be safely carried in the ordinary course of transit, though such inspection would have disclosed that the car was not properly packed, and that transportation of same in the condition existing would be likely to cause damage; that the defendant did jar, jostle, and shake the car in question negligently, unnecessarily, and improperly, and carry the same in such a negligent manner, other than in the usual course, that the contents were damaged, said negligence concurring with the negligence of Smith & Hicks in the matter of loading and packing.

It will be noted from the foregoing abridgment of the allegations of the statement of the plaintiff's case that she rests her claim against the defendant, the Director General, upon the ground that he was aware, or would have been aware if he had discharged his alleged duty of inspection, that the contents of the car in question were imperfectly prepared in the first instance, and insufficiently packed in the second; (2) that with this knowledge, actual or imputed, he handled the car in so negligent and improper a fashion, and with such a multiplicity of unnecessary bumps, shocks, jars, and jolts, that the contents of the car were churned up to the extent established by the witnesses who inspected said contents in Atlantic City upon the termination of the trip.

In this connection it will be necessary to consider certain questions of law:

First: Did the plaintiff assume responsibility for loading the car, and for damages resulting from improper loading?

It has been noted that under the original bill of lading the plaintiff (i. e., the shipper) was to load the car and count the contents; the R., F. & P. R. R. Company disclaiming any responsibility for the number or condition of the packages constituting the shipment. The goods were neither delivered at the depot of the defendant nor handled by his employees. The plaintiff secured a car, and had it placed at a point, presumably of convenience, for the agents who had the contract for crating, packing, and loading her furniture and other effects.

[1] The general rule with respect to loading and unloading goods transported by a common carrier is that these duties attach to the carrier, and it is responsible for loss or injury incident thereto. But the shipper, for purposes of his own convenience, may assume these duties. In such case, by the plainest principles of justice, the carrier is absolved from responsibility for injuries received in transportation that are traceable solely to improper loading and packing.

"A shipper who to save charges, or for his own convenience, or for any other reason, loads the property himself, is not the agent of the carrier in so doing, and the latter is not responsible for his negligence in loading the car." Moore on Carriers (2d Ed.) p. 193.

"The owner of goods cannot hold a carrier liable where the loss or injury is the result of his own fault, or that of the consignor, in loading or packing the goods. There can be no doubt that the doctrine stated is solidly founded on principle, but there is sometimes difficulty in determining whether the fault of the owner or consignor was the cause of the loss of the goods, or of the injury to them." 5 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. p. 368.

"So, where the owner of goods has unskillfully packed or loaded, * * * the carrier will be exonerated from all liability for losses which result from such carelessness of the owner." Hutchinson on Carriers, § 218.

"If the shipper assumes the responsibility of loading and unloading, the carrier is thereby relieved from liability for loss in that connection." 6 Cyc. p. 381.

"The carrier is not responsible for loss of, or injury to, goods occasioned by their being improperly loaded on the cars of the shipper." Moore on Carriers, supra, p. 560.

In Ross v. Troy & Boston R. Co., 49 Vt. 364, 24 Am. Rep. 144, certain machinery was damaged due to insufficient fastenings employed by the plaintiff in loading. This loading had been done by the plaintiff. The court said on page 368 of 49 Vt., on page 145 of 24 Am. Rep., supra:

"Is the defendant chargeable with the consequences of that insufficiency? We think not, in the sense in which the county court seems to have regarded it. The undertaking and duty of the defendant was to transport and deliver safely against all contingencies except the act of God, public enemies, and acts of the parties shipping the property. It was the insurer against everything but those. But, as against them, it was bound only to the exercise of reasonable care and diligence."

The circumstances of the accident are described by the court:

"In the case before us the testimony is that the blocking under the large wheel that finally gave way and caused the injury was in its place, and did not appear to have been started or stirred at all, and the only defect in it was that it was insufficient in the first place.

"It seems incongruous for the plaintiff to claim that the defendant should overjudge him in a matter in which he assumed to judge and to do all that he required or supposed necessary to be done in the premises, and that the defendant should be responsible for the inadequacy of what the plaintiff adjudged and did." (Italics supplied.)

49 Vt. 370, 24 Am. Rep. 148.

In Milwaukee v. Chicago & Northwestern Ry. Co., 37 Wis. 190, 195, 196, cited in Hutchinson on Carriers, supra, we find the following in the opinion of the court:

"The company received the property for transportation, loaded and secured as the plaintiffs saw fit to load and secure it; and why should negligence be imputed to it for not taking precautions to guard against the plaintiffs' want of care? It is said the company was exceedingly careless and negligent in attempting to carry this covered wagon at the time and in the manner it did, without making any effort to attach the same more firmly to the car. But the obvious answer to this argument is that the plaintiffs themselves assumed the risk and responsibility of loading and securing the wagon, and the company was not called upon to see that they had properly performed their duty in that regard."

The cases cited ubi supra clearly rest upon the broad proposition that shippers may assume the risk of responsibility of loading and securing their property in the car of the common carrier, and that, when such is the case, the defendant carrier is not called upon to "see that they had properly performed their duty in that respect," or "held responsible for the inadequacy of that which the plaintiff adjudged, or did." Some authorities go so far as to hold that the carrier is not liable for loss or injury due to improper loading, even when such defective loading is open and obvious, or when it knows, or in the exercise of ordinary care could have known, of the shipper's negligence in this respect. On the other hand, other authorities hold that—

"The carrier being entitled to reject defectively packed goods tendered for shipment, if it accepts for transportation goods which it knows are defectively packed, or which by the exercise of reasonable care it could have observed were defectively packed, it assumes to carry the goods as they are, and its common-law liability as a carrier attaches, and it is subject to all of the liabilities usually attaching to an ordinary shipment of the same character."

To this effect, see, also, 4 R. C. L. § 203.

It is the contention of the defendant in error (plaintiff below) that it was the legal duty of the defendant to inspect the car which was delivered to him by Smith & Hicks with the door unlocked; that "she had no knowledge whether the defendant was accustomed to make inspection in such cases, and it was immaterial whether she had such knowledge or not"; "that, even if she had been aware that it was not the custom of the defendant to inspect cars when loaded by the shipper, such knowledge would not relieve the carrier of the duty of inspection, if that duty was imposed by law."

We have been cited to two cases expressly relied upon to support the contention that, under the circumstances appearing in the instant case, the defendant was bound to inspect, and therefore was charged with the knowledge that such inspection, properly made, would have afforded. The first case is that of Hannibal Railroad v. Swift, 12 Wall. 262, 20 L. Ed. 423, and the other that of McCarthy v. L. & N. R. Co., 102 Ala. 193, 14 South. 370, 48 Am. St. Rep. 29. These cases are readily distinguished, in respect of the facts appearing in same, from the case in judgment.

In the Hannibal Railroad Case, the car containing the goods of the plaintiff took fire from an unknown cause in the course of transportation, and was totally consumed with its contents. This occurred during the Civil War. When the plaintiff applied to the railway company for transportation for himself, family, troops, and luggage, he was advised that hazardous conditions prevailed in the communities through which the railroad operated. He insisted, however, upon his demand, and the company furnished the transportation including a car for the luggage, equipment, munitions, etc. This car was loaded by the commanding officer, locked, and turned over to the railway company. Later, as stated supra, it caught fire and was destroyed. There was no question of negligent loading involved. In the argument for the defendants in error it is said:

"No question of negligence, in the matter of loading the car, can arise here, as the agreed case expressly finds that the car took fire 'from some cause unknown.'" 12 Wall. 268, 20 L. Ed. 423.

The company undertook the carriage of the men and property without compulsion, and the precise question presented was whether, under the circumstances, it was liable under common-law principles as an insurer. The court propounded that very query in its statement of the issues to be decided, as follows:

"Upon the facts stated in the agreed case, was the railroad company liable as a common carrier for the safe conveyance of the baggage and other property of the plaintiff?"

The court held that the liability of the company attached when it took possession as follows:

"In all such cases the liability of the common carrier attaches when the property passes, with his assent, into his possession, and is not affected by the car in which it is transported, or the manner in which the car is loaded."

The court maintained in the Hannibal Case the broad proposition that, having accepted the goods for transportation, the carrier was responsible as an insurer for supervening accidents occurring during transportation. The question of loading in that case was immaterial, since it was not contended that the fire was due to, or in any wise related to, the loading. Hence this case did not fall within the exception that a carrier is not liable for losses caused by the act of the owner of the goods, and does not present or turn upon the question in issue in the instant case. It is true that the court in the case supra uses this language:

"The common carrier is regarded as an insurer of the property carried, and upon him the duty rests to see that the packing and conveyance are such as to secure its safety."

This statement is relied upon to support the contention that in the instant case it was the duty of the defendant to inspect the car which it received from Smith & Hicks, and to ascertain by such inspection whether it was properly loaded. But, as the question of loading in relation to the accident—that is, the destruction of the car by fire—was not before the court, and it was not contended that the manner of loading and the persons doing the loading had any casual relation to the fire the language with respect to the duty of a carrier "to see that the packing and conveyance are such as to secure the safety of the property carried," if relied upon to support the general proposition that, even when the owner loads a car, the carrier must inspect that loading and ascertain that it has been properly done, is obiter dictum.

In the McCarthy Case the plaintiffs loaded four cars with terra cotta tile, and delivered same to the railroad company. The tile reached Birmingham in a very damaged condition. A suit for damages was brought against the company. The defense relied upon was that the shipper had insufficiently and inadequately loaded the cars. In reply the plaintiff insisted that the carrier had failed to show affirmatively that it was free from fault, and that in any event the insufficient loading was discernible on an ordinary examination, and that, under the circumstances, the carrier was bound to inspect, and that, failing in this and having accepted the shipment it was charged with the usual liability of an insurer. In this case the goods were undoubtedly delivered to the carrier in good condition. The court, in part, said:

"It is manifest that the case made by the averment of these facts tendered no issue of negligence vel non on the part of the defendant. The contract averred is an unconditional common-law contract of carriage without reservations or exceptions. By its terms the defendant insured the safe delivery of the goods to the consignee, and assumed liability for any loss or injury resulting from any cause except such as afforded the carrier a defense at common law. The strictest proof of all possible care on the part of the carrier in the transportation and delivery of the goods would have been no defense, and, of course, proof of the carrier's negligence was in no wise essential to a recovery. The defenses which a carrier under such a contract may interpose to an action for failure to deliver in good condition are commonly mentioned as two only, namely, that the loss or injury was due either to the act of God, or to the act of a public enemy. But there is in reality a third resting on the fault of the owner of the goods or his agent. * * * A carrier is liable * * * for any loss or injury which is due to the concurring and contributory negligence of himself and the shipper; so, when he relies upon the * * * exception to that rule of liability * * * which rests upon the fault of the shipper, he must bring himself entirely and perfectly within it by negating all contributing fault of his own." 102 Ala. 199, 200, 201, and 202, 14 South. 371, 372, 48 Am. St. Rep. 29, and authorities cited.

This extract embodies sound principles of law generally stated. But, looking to the opinion of the court for the disposition of the case under the situation presented by the pleadings, it will be seen that the court concluded that the defendant had failed in respect both of "averment and proof to bring itself within the exception under which it attempted to shield itself from liability." While some of the evidence tended to show that the goods had been improperly and negligently loaded by the shipper, the court construed the pleas setting up the defense to mean, in effect, that, though the defendant carrier was guilty of negligence in the matter of transportation, it was absolved from liability for such negligence by reason of the fact that "its negligence was aided to the damaging result, was contributed to, by the concurring negligence of the plaintiffs." Says the court:

"These averments, in short, were admissions of negligence on the part of the pleader, coupled with charges of negligence on the part of the plaintiffs. The further averments of these pleas that the cars were closed when they were received by the defendant from the first carrier, so that the condition of their contents was not visible, and that defendant and its agents did not then know that said cars were improperly loaded, if intended to negative all negligence on the part of the defendant, are repugnant to and inconsistent with the admissions of defendant's negligence implied in the allegation that plaintiff's negligence contributed to the injury. On the other hand, if these further averments are not to be taken as negating all negligence imputable to defendant, and that is probably the true construction of them, the pleas are yet bad, for, as a carrier is liable for loss or injury resulting from the act of God aided by his own negligence, or from the act of a public enemy to which his own fault contributed, so he is liable for any loss or injury which is due to the concurring and contributory negligence of himself and the shipper. * * * McCarthy v. Louisville, etc., R. R. Co., 102 Ala. 199, 14 South. 370, 48 Am. St. Rep. 29.

It is easy to extract from this citation the foundations of the court's finding. In one view, the pleas undertook to negative negligence on the part of the carrier, but, if so intended, they were inconsistent with the implications of negligence on its part carried by the allegation that the plaintiffs' negligence contributed to the injury. If an injury is due to negligence, and the negligence of one party contributes to the injury, of necessity the remaining portion or residuum of negligence is the negligence of the other party, in the case cited the defendant carrier. In the other view, the pleas did not negative all negligence imputable to the defendant. This would carry an admission of negligence on the part of the defendant. In either view, under the interpretation placed by the court upon the pleas, the defendant would be liable.

But the defense in the instant case is that the unaided and uncontributed-to negligence of the shipper, in the matter of shipping and packing, was the efficient cause of the injury, the defendant claiming to have used due care in handling the shipment. The court admits in the case supra that, conceding such a state of facts, the defendant would not be liable. For instance, in 102 Ala. on page 202, 14 South. on page 372, 48 Am. St. Rep. on page 34, we find the following:

"The unaided, uncontributed-to negligence of the plaintiff producing the injury is a defense, but where there is negligence also on the part of the defendant, without which, notwithstanding plaintiff's fault, the injury would not have happened, this fault of the defendant neutralizes and eviscerates the negligence of the plaintiff as a ground of defense." (Italics supplied.)

Plainly in that case the defendant did not state a case in his pleas which brought it within the exception upon which it sought to rely, nor did the bill of lading provide that, the shipper having undertaken to load and count his packages, the carrier disclaimed responsibility for the number and condition of same.

The conclusion of the court in the case ubi supra was:

That the evidence "afforded an inference, or rather room for an inference," "that the goods were negligently packed," and "that but for this fault * * * the injury would not have occurred. But, though the jury had found in line with this tendency of the evidence, and deduced the conclusion * * * that plaintiffs * * * were at fault, and that such fault had a causal connection with the injury, it was yet their duty to indulge the presumption that the defendant was also negligent in and about the transportation * * * of the goods, and that this negligence aided plaintiff's negligence to the result complained of, there being no evidence * * * on the part of the defendant, upon whom the burden in this regard rested, nor indeed any averment, to the contrary." (Italics supplied.)

We do not consider that this case establishes the contention that the defendant, as a matter of law, was bound to inspect the contents of the car in question upon delivery of same.

This case does hold, however, and very properly, that even when there is evidence tending to show that the goods were not properly packed by the shipper, and they arrive at their destination in a damaged condition, but the defendant neither avers nor furnishes evidence that it was free of negligence, there is a presumption that there was sufficient negligence in the course of transportation to justify a verdict for the plaintiff. The facts with respect to the delivery of the car in the instant case are that when Otto, acting for Smith & Hicks, had completed the operation of loading, he turned it over to the yardman and told him to receive it. The following questions and answers are taken from Otto's testimony:

"Q. Did he inspect it after you packed it?

"A. We left the door open so that he could look in.

"Q. Did he look in?

"A. I suppose he did. We turned it over to him.

"Q. And he accepted it with the door open?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And then sealed it?

"A. Yes, sir; the door was partly open."

Cross-examination:

"Q. Did you see him seal it up?

"A. Saw him going towards that car. He was sealing other cars, going right along sealing cars up.

"Q. You realized, though, that you were shipping a car as a carload shipment, the shipper being responsible for the proper loading of the car, didn't you?

"A. Yes, sir."

The car was described as a "clean, closed car; no defect in the car."

In the matter of loading it appears that the ends of the car were loaded. As the shipment was not sufficient to fill the car, the middle space, where the doors are placed, was vacant.

"By Mr. Scott:

"Q. Leaving the middle vacant, so that you can get at it?

"A. Yes, sir."

This witness does not state that the defendant inspected this car, or that he ever saw a car inspected that he had packed, or that it was the practice of the company to make inspection of cars packed by shippers. The nearest approach to a positive statement in this respect is the following answer of the witness:

"I knew it would not be sealed if it was not properly packed."

The other parties engaged in the operation of packing do not testify in regard to inspection, but the plaintiff undertook to prove by one Louis Werner, Jr., a foreman of the C. & O. Ry. Co., the general usage, in the matter of inspection, common to railroads in the city of Richmond.

Testimony of Louis Werner:

"By Mr. Scott:

"Q. When you accept shipments, are you supposed to inspect the cars?

"A. Yes, sir; to see whether they are properly loaded.

"Q. If you find it not properly loaded, do you make objection?

"A. Yes, sir; you refuse to sign the bill, if it is not properly loaded."

On cross-examination this witness made the following statements:

"Q. All in the world that you know about this thing is just what you observed there in working for the C. & O.?

"A. That is all.

"Q. You know nothing about the practice of the R., F. & P.?

"A. I don't know about their practice, but that is the way we are all supposed to do. I never worked with them. [Italics supplied.]

"Q. You never worked for the Seaboard?

"A. No, sir.

"Q. You don't know what they do?

"A. No, sir.

"Q. You haven't worked with the Coast Line?

"A. No, sir.

"Q. You don't know what they do, of your own knowledge?

"A. No, sir.

"Q. Your experience is entirely limited to the C. & O. and what you are supposed to do?

"A. Yes, sir."

It is manifest from the testimony of this witness that he was not qualified to testify as to the practice of the R., F. & P. in the matter of inspection, and his evidence in that regard has no probative value.

Leslie Ellis, freight agent for the R., F. & P. in the city of Richmond, was a witness for the defendant. He states that on application he placed a car for Smith & Hicks to load; that, having loaded it, they brought the bill of lading to him to sign; that he thereupon had the car sealed and weighed. Further, in respect of inspection, he testified as follows:

"Q. What is the practice in regard to sealing a car, or any possible inspection, where the shipment is carload shipment?

"A. As soon as this car was reported loaded by Smith & Hicks, we had it sealed; but we don't inspect carloads. They are loaded on private sidings, in various yards miles away from us, and we have nothing to do with what he puts in there. * * *

"Q. Had Smith & Hicks been in the custom or in the habit of loading cars at your yards?

"A. Yes, sir; they loaded quite a number.

"Q. In any other cases have there been inspections?

"A. No, sir; never has been any inspections at all.

"Q. Did they know that?

"A. They knew it. I suppose so. We have never given them any reason to think that we inspected them. We put a car, and they load it, and we seal and forward it. * * * All that is done with carloads, we give a man a car, and he loads to suit himself. We receipt for it: 'Shipper's loading and accounting, and railroad company not responsible for the number or condition of packages.'"

[2] It is very clear from the testimony in this record that it was not the practice of the R., F. & P. R. R. Co. to make inspections of carloads loaded by shippers, nor was there any reason why they should do so, having in mind that the cars are placed for the convenience of the shipper, and he undertakes the task of loading. If he is negligent in that respect, he should be responsible for the consequences of his own acts. Quite a different question would be raised if the improper loading was manifest to ordinary observation when the car was received. But such is not the situation in the case in judgment.

[3] The car was an ordinary box car, with the furniture and other goods in the ends. It is stated that the door was open, but the extent of the opening is not given. It is not stated that the door was pushed back, so that the sealer, as he walked by the car, could see into the interior. It is true that if the door was not locked, the sealer could have pushed it back, climbed into the car, and inspected the contents. But it was not incumbent upon him to do this, and there is certainly no evidence to show, or even tending to show, that as the yardman discharged his task of sealing the car the insufficiency of the packing was manifest to him, in the exercise of ordinary observation.

Coming now to the question of packing, loading, and transportation, the plaintiff alleges, as stated supra, that Smith & Hicks agreed to pack, crate, transfer, haul, load, and ship all of her effects, but that, so far from doing so, said Smith & Hicks did not properly load, pack, crate and ship said effects and the defendant negligently transported same; the concurring negligence resulting in grievous damage to plaintiff's property. Such are the averments of her declaration. But the evidence submitted by the plaintiff is highly conflicting on the questions of crating, packing, and loading. She testifies in person, and submits letters tending to show, that Smith & Hicks were to crate the mirrors, pictures, and china press, pack four barrels of china and silverware, and wrap and pack the furniture securely in the car, but her other witnesses who testify as to the contract, said witnesses being the agents of Smith & Hicks, are in sharp conflict with the plaintiff. These witnesses—at least some of them—deny that it was agreed on the part of said Smith & Hicks to wrap the furniture. It is admitted that no wrapping was done. Further, they do not sustain the plaintiff's averments or agree with the plaintiff's statements that the furniture was insufficiently and inadequately loaded. On the contrary, they positively state that the loading was properly and efficiently done. It will be necessary to go somewhat into detail in respect of this matter of loading and packing.

The evidence relied upon to sustain the plaintiff's averment of negligence in this respect is the state of the contents when the car arrived at its destination and the lack of packing material in the car. The witnesses who testify in this regard are the plaintiff, Ellis Evans, an expressman in Atlantic City, engaged to unload the car, and William Graham, an employee of Evans. The testimony of these witnesses is clear, specific, coherent, and consistent. Evans and Graham are entirely without interest in the premises, since, whatever the result of this litigation, no liability can attach to Graham or his employer, Evans. Both Evans and Graham have had years of experience in the moving and transfer business and were qualified to speak as to the proper method of loading furniture for shipment by railway car. As soon as the car was opened, and the condition of its contents revealed, Graham took two pieces to the plaintiff's house, and asked her to come down to look over the state of her effects. This she did at once, meeting Mr. Evans at the car. She states:

That she found "an old mahogany framed mirror lying face up on the floor, and handsome books scattered all over the car; a handsome mahogany chest of drawers with the cloth (?) broken off; victrola records scattered around and broken up; lamps and kitchen utensils in general confusion; a lamp shade with the leg of a chair sticking through it; two dressers had been overturned, and neither one had had even the mirror taken off; the small Persian rugs had evidently been used for packing."

The witness picked up a man's hat full of little pieces that had been broken off the furniture, "such as knobs, and the toes of claw feet, and little pieces like that." This witness testified as follows as to the material suitable for bracing that was found in the car when the seal was broken in Atlantic City:

"Q. Did you see any bracing whatever in that car?

"A. No; I saw two boards I should say as wide as my hand that were lying loose in the car. Now whether or not they were meant for bracing I do not know, but absolutely that was the only thing that could have been bracing in the car.

"Q. They were about the width of your hand?

"A. Yes.

"Q. About how thick?

"A. I should say half an inch.

"Q. There were just two of those?

"A. Yes.

"Q. How long were they?

"A. Maybe six feet."

Speaking of a velvet upholstered mahogany claw-foot davenport the witness states that evidently a heavy piece of furniture had been on the davenport, and the upholstery was practically ruined, and the frame badly scratched, so that it had to be entirely done over. A chest of drawers had three legs off, and most of the knobs, with the top badly scratched. The only packing that she saw was a little loose excelsior in the car, a small market basket full, and her small Persian rugs. Great pieces were split off the top of a cedar chest, and the kitchen table was split in half. The kitchen utensils were mashed and battered.

The testimony of Evans and Graham fully confirms that of Mrs. Buchanan as to the condition of the contents of the car, and describes in full and convincing detail the utter inadequacy of the material found in said car for properly bracing and packing the furniture.

Examination of Ellis H. Evans:

"Q. When you got to the car, what was the condition you found?

"A. Well, the furniture was in very bad shape for a carload movement. Of course, to describe in detail, there were pieces broken off of almost everything. It was chipped, and it was strewn over the floor of the car.

"Q. Did you find any bracing at all in the car?

"A. No, there was no indication. The only indication of packing was a small quantity of excelsior and a few pieces of board which in my opinion wouldn't be sufficient to brace or pack a carload at all of that quantity of goods. * * *

"Q. How should that furniture have been packed or prepared for shipment properly?

"A. Well, the furniture should have been wrapped with heavy paper or newspaper in the first place. It should then have been placed in the ends of the car and the heavy furniture on the bottom and the lighter furniture piled on top with excelsior between them. After an end of the car was filled, it should have been braced with heavy enough lumber to guarantee it arriving with ordinary care in the freight movement.

"Q. Did you find a single piece of bracing intact and in proper place when you opened the car?

"A. Nothing at all in place to indicate that there was any packing done in the car.

"Q. How many pieces of lumber did you find in the car?

"A. Well, I can't tell you offhand now, Mr. Moore, but my recollection is that there were about four pieces of lumber that I kicked out into the yard.

"Q. Did you have to unfasten these pieces?

"A. No; they were on the floor of the car.

"Q. About what size were they?

"A. Well, I should judge it was about seven-eighths lumber, what we call roofers here.

"Q. You mean about seven-eighths of an inch thick?

"A. Yes.

"Q. About how wide?

"A. Six inches, I think, that lumber runs.

"Q. How long?

"A. Well, they were not over five feet in length, I think, any of them. * * *

"Q. Did there appear to be any orderly arrangement of the furniture?"

"A. None whatever. There was no semblance of a packing job in the car to my idea of the way furniture of that description should have been packed.

"Q. If all of the excelsior and all of the lumber that is those four pieces to which you refer had been used to properly pack or crate some of the furniture, how much could have been properly prepared or crated for shipment with the amount of excelsior and the pieces of lumber that were in the car?"

"A. Well, there couldn't be any more than one piece. In fact, there was not enough lumber to crate any one piece that I recognized, unless possibly a light chair.

"Q. Was a single piece of furniture crated at all?"

"A. No; I don't recall any one crated in the car. * * * I would say that the way it was put in there none of it could arrive safely.

"Q. How were the mirrors arranged?"

"A. I recollect two or three of them attached to the pieces of furniture on which they belonged. * * * The books were strewn over the floor of the car, with no pretense at packing at all."

Cross-examination:

"* * * Q. Haven't you seen cars of furniture, which have been properly packed, smashed and broken by rough handling?"

"A. Not to the extent that this car was; never.

"Q. Have you not seen carloads of furniture badly damaged by rough handling by the railroads?"

"A. Well, I have seen pieces badly damaged, but not carloads. Of course, I don't know what—I naturally know that you are interested in another side of it. It was a mighty bad-looking car when I got into it for anybody to pretend to say they had packed. I am saying that without feeling in the matter at all."

William Graham:

"Q. What did you find, William, when you broke the seal of the car?"

"A. The first thing I found was furniture piled; I guess it was the first thing I found; furniture scattered all over the car and propped against one another.

"Q. When you opened the door, did you see any mirrors?"

"A. Yes, sir; laying all over the floor. * * *

"Q. Did you ever see a car packed like that one?"

"A. No, sir; I never did. Never seen a car packed like that before.

"Q. How was that furniture packed?"

"A. It weren't packed at all, in my estimation, like I have seen cars packed that I have unloaded.

"Q. How is a car usually packed when it is packed right?"

"A. Packed right, the heavy stuff is generally put at the bottom and the light stuff on top, and then braced with the chairs on top; of course, it has got to be well packed with excelsior, or something, or burlap.

"Q. How ought it to be braced?"

"A. After you have stacked the furniture, you have naturally got to brace it with lumber to keep it from shaking.

"Q. Ought that to be light or heavy lumber?"

"A. Heavy lumber always.

"Q. Was there any such heavy lumber in that car?"

"A. I didn't notice any at all.

"Q. Would you have seen it, if it was there?"

"A. Sure. We would have had to break it loose. [Italics supplied.]

"Q. Did you have to break loose any piece of lumber at all?"

"A. No, sir.

"Q. Was there any piece of lumber fastened to the car at all?"

"A. I didn't notice any at all. * * * I don't think the car had been in any accident. I think it was the packing that caused the damage to the furniture, the way it was packed."

The testimony of the witnesses for the plaintiff who did the actual loading and packing of her furniture is to the effect that it was properly done. These witnesses are Alfred Otto, Arthur Otto, London Chandler, and Garland Evans, all employees of Smith & Hicks.

The testimony of Alfred Otto is in part that "the furniture was braced in the car as securely as any car here ever packed"; that he used a sufficient amount of excelsior, "a bale and a half"; that he used a sufficient amount of lumber to properly brace the furniture as packed; that he crated and packed everything as per agreement; that Chandler Evans and his son Arthur helped him; that he had the stuff placed as he wanted it.

Cross-examination:

"Q. How many pieces of lumber did you use?"

"A. Well, I will not say positively how many pieces I used, but I used enough lumber to brace the car as far as I saw it was necessary.

"Q. You have some idea of how many pieces you used?"

"A. I may have used—

"Q. Two or three?"

"A. Two doesn't start. It may be for half of one side of the car.

"Q. You think two would be enough for one side of the car?"

"A. No, sir; two wouldn't have started it.

"Q. How many did you use?"

"A. About eight or nine 16-foot strips. * * *

"Q. You testified a moment ago that you did not recall as to the number of strips used. When you say that there were probably eight or nine, you simply mean that was about the number that should have been used?"

"A. I didn't say it should have been used. If it should have been used, I used it. I mean to say, if I thought it was right to use ten pieces, I would use ten, and wouldn't use eight or nine. If I thought twelve ought to be used, I would use twelve pieces.

"Q. But you have no distinct recollection as to what you did on this occasion?"

"A. No, sir; with the exception of that excelsior. I do know what I had of the excelsior.

"Q. But you have no distinct recollection as to the amount of lumber?"

"A. No, sir.

"Q. How much was the amount of the excelsior?

"A. About 165 or 170 pounds. * * * I used half a bale out of the car, and a bale and a half on the car. * * *

"Q. Did you say the mirrors on all bureaus were taken off?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You remember each one?

"A. I remember distinctly. I have been in the business 10 years and never yet handled a bureau or washstand I didn't have the mirrors taken off."

Examination of Arthur Otto:

This witness states that in his opinion the car was packed "the same as they generally packed a car, and braced the same way, with particular care," and there was enough excelsior used and enough lumber used to properly pack and brace the car.

The following extracts are from the cross-examination of this witness:

"Q. You don't recall anything particularly what you did?

"A. I couldn't tell you anything particular that I did.

"Q. You just remember that was one job you worked on?

"A. Just one job I worked on.

"Q. I reckon you have worked on hundreds since then?

"A. I have worked on a plenty of jobs since that time."

London Chandler states that the car in question was packed and braced to go anywhere except in a wreck. (Italics supplied.) On cross-examination witness stated that he saw the lumber used; could not say how much, but enough to brace a car. He did not participate in the actual packing, but "stood on the truck and handed the stuff off." On direct examination witness stated that the car was braced like all other cars are braced that he had seen. He had seen a great number of cars packed and braced.

Garland Evans who had also loaded a great many cars, helped load this one. He stated that "it was packed properly so far as he could see, unless it was in a wreck; that it was well braced and well packed;" that in the time since he had helped load this car (about 12 months prior) he had loaded a great many others, too many to remember.

The testimony of the witnesses who speak as to the loading of the car and that of the witnesses who speak as to the condition of the contents of the car at the place of destination cannot possibly both be true, and the statements of the former are wholly irreconcilable with the averments of plaintiff's declaration. The physical facts refute the testimony of Otto and his associates, who are put on the stand as the witnesses of the plaintiff, but who are in fact the employees of another party, to wit, Smith & Hicks. It is to the interest of the latter to discredit plaintiff's allegation that the goods were improperly packed and insufficiently braced. In the judgment of the foregoing employees of Smith & Hicks, the packing was of the highest order of excellence, one of them testifying that the car "was packed and braced to go anywhere, except in a wreck." But, as there was no wreck, the internal condition of the car on arrival refutes this confident statement.

Otto, Sr., repudiates, almost with indignation, the suggestion that he used only two or three strips of roofers to brace the furniture in the car. He states that "two wouldn't start," and that he used eight or nine 16-foot strips, also 165 or 170 pounds of excelsior. If this bracing and packing material had been found in the car when the seals were broken in Atlantic City, the witness' statements would have been corroborated, and the inference would have been strong that the battered condition of the furniture was due to extraordinary jolts and jars received in the course of the trip, which loosened the bracing, and allowed the furniture to move forward and backward—that is to say, longitudinally—in the car. Having in mind the number and variety of pieces of furniture in the car, and that same was only about two-thirds full, it requires no expert knowledge to reach the conclusion that four pieces of narrow roofers, as described by the witness, Evans, were totally insufficient for adequate bracing. If sufficient bracing and packing material—that is to say, if eight or nine 16-foot strips and 165 or 170 pounds of excelsior—had been really used, as claimed, how is it to be explained that they disappeared in the course of a comparatively short trip in a closed and sealed car? The circumstances were such as to impress indelibly upon the minds of the only disinterested witnesses, Evans and Graham, that there was an almost total lack of packing material in the car when the doors were opened. A witness who loads many cars in the course of a year may well be at fault when, looking backwards, he seeks to call to mind in self-justification precisely what he did in one of many jobs.

Confronted with such a scene of confusion and disorder as was revealed when the seals of the car in question were broken in Atlantic City, the experts who had been employed to unload a presumably well-packed car would naturally be on the lookout for the efficient cause of this pitiful wreckage of costly furniture. If that cause, upon inspection, was ascertained to be insufficient bracing and packing, as evidenced by an almost entire absence of appropriate material for such bracing and packing, that lack of material would be a fact forcibly implanted in the memories of the witnesses. The witness Evans noted about "four pieces of lumber seven-eighths of an inch thick six inches wide and about five feet long" on the floor of the car and "a small quantity of excelsior." One hundred and sixty-five pounds of the latter material, relieved from pressure, would make a very large pile, and if used as alleged, would have been instantly noticeable upon the most casual inspection of the car. Otto, Sr., states as a positive fact that the mirrors on all the bureaus were taken off. On this point his associate workers do not testify. Evans, Mrs. Buchanan, and Graham all concur in stating that when the car arrived several of the mirrors were "attached to the places to which they belonged." This piece of negligence would make an ineffaceable impression on Evans, for the reason stated by him, namely, that "they should not have been moved out of the house in that fashion, let alone shipped." Otto's statement that the mirrors were all removed is most overwhelmingly refuted.

[4] The testimony of the witnesses in this case, fairly scrutinized with reference to the apparent probabilities and improbabilities of their respective stories, plainly shows that Smith & Hicks were guilty of gross negligence in loading the car. The physical facts establish plaintiff's contention that the furniture was not properly packed when it left Richmond. It is plain to us upon the evidence that the furniture was not properly loaded and braced, and that, if the railway company subsequently handled the shipment with the care appropriate to a properly loaded car, then the injury to its contents is traceable exclusively to the negligence of the plaintiff's agents in the discharge of the task of packing and loading.

Hence one question only remains for disposition, and that is whether the railway company exercised proper care in transportation. It is clear that the car was delivered to the plaintiff in good condition, and, while no special inspection of same was made in Atlantic City, it is reasonably apparent that, if the car had shown any external signs of injuries received in transit, they would have been manifest to Evans and Graham when they set about the task of unloading. So far from noticing anything of the sort, Graham testifies, as recited supra, that "he didn't think the car had been in an accident." "I think," he said, "that it was the packing that caused the damage to the furniture, the way it was packed." A certain amount of shocks and bumps are necessarily incident to and attendant upon the movement of freight trains, and the purpose in view in packing and bracing the contents of a freight car is to make said contents capable of withstanding these inevitable shocks. Furniture packed as the furniture in question was packed was not prepared for the ordeal of an ordinary freight movement, involving many starts, stops, and shiftings.

The query in the instant case at this point is whether the defendant, in view of the damaged condition of the contents of the car on arrival, has negated the presumption that the car was handled in the course of transit under conditions of needless and excessive jolts and jars. On this point the defendant submits the testimony of six witnesses concerned with the movement of the car from the beginning to the termination of the trip. The time taken for the trip is immaterial, since the shipper was advised that, owing to unusual conditions prevailing over the lines of the carriers concerned, the shipment was subject to delay. Heavy movements of troops destined for transshipment were in progress. The car was moved in accordance with regularly arranged freight service, and, having in mind the intervals when it was at rest, about eight days elapsed before Atlantic City was reached. The actual running time required was much less.

The first witness in this connection was Yowell, yard conductor for the R., F. & P. in Richmond. He moved the car from the ball park to Acca as conductor in charge of the movement. He reached Acca about 6 a. m. September 11, 1918. Nothing unusual happened on the trip. He left the car on what is known as the "no-bill" track. He is specific that no "rough handling" took place while the car was under his control. From the time that the car was picked up at the park until it was left on the "no-bill" track at Acca there was no other conductor in charge. During most of this period the car was at rest. The next witness in order is W. R. Utley, a yard conductor for the R., F. & P. He weighed the car at Acca.

"Q. Was there any accident, or anything unusual, in connection with this car on that occasion?"

"A. Not while in my charge."

It would have been the witness' duty to report any rough handling, breaking, or accident while the car was in his charge.

M. T. Cummins, a yard conductor of the R., F. & P., follows Utley on the stand. He "lined the car up on September 14th to go north," finding it on the no-bill track.

"Q. Was there any accident or anything unusual in handling the car?"

"A. No, sir; if there had been, I couldn't have lined it up."

Cross-examination:

"* * * By Mr. Moore: If there had been any accident or anything out of the ordinary, would you have been required to make a report?"

"A. I would."

"Q. Did you have to make a report?"

"A. I did not."

The next witness called in order was the yardmaster of the freight yards of the R., F. & P. in Richmond, J. W. Hall. He had charge of all freight movements on the yard. The witness states that his records do not show that there was anything wrong with the car in question, and the movement of troop trains held the car in Richmond. He "ordered the crew to take the car to Potomac Yards," and his records show that there was no accident or unusual occurrence on that trip.

L. W. Gills, the conductor who took the car to Potomac Yards, was next called. This witness was a conductor of long experience in the service of the railway company. He stated that the car containing the furniture was in a favorable place on his train "from the standpoint of jarring." This car was the third car from the engine. Conductor Gills took out the train containing the car in question on the morning of September 14th, reaching the Potomac Yards about 2:51 p. m. of the same day. He testifies that the time of movement was "about normal," and that the car did not get any rough handling while in his charge, that it was not in any accident, and that it was left in Washington "in the track that we turn our freight trains on over to the Potomac in good condition without exception."

W. H. Charles, the witness next in order, was the "assistant yardmaster of north-bound Potomac Yards." He gave the record of the car in question as follows:

"Arrived in Potomac Yards 2:51 p. m. September 14, 1918, in charge of Conductor Gills, delivered to Pennsylvania Railroad 4:20 p. m., and leaving on the Pennsylvania train 9:55 a. m. September 15th. * * *

"Q. Was there any accident or rough handling, as far as your records show, of that car during that time?

"A. Before I came here I examined our records, and could find no record of that car being in any accident. Our records do not show it, and the records of the mechanical department do not show anything the matter with it.

"Q. If there had been, would the records show it?

"A. Yes, sir; and it would even show if they made any slight repairs. There is no record of any slight repairs even."

The foregoing witness testified orally. In addition the defendant submitted the depositions of W. W. Thrift and others.

Thrift deposed that he was in 1918 in the service of the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Company, and that it was his duty to take charge of trains from Potomac Yards between Alexandria and Washington, and have charge of such trains until delivered to the next connecting conductor at Edgemoore Yard, Del.; that he made a record from personal observation of the cars in the trains that he moved on September 15, 1918; that the fourth car in his train from the engine was the car in question; that he left it at 6:06 p. m. of September 15th; that the movement was a good one; and that there was no rough handling of that train in the course of said movement.

Knotts, the next witness, deposes that he was a freight conductor of the P., B. & W. R. R. Co., and moved trains from Edgemoore to Pavonia Yards, N. J.; that he moved a train containing the car in question on September 15th (evidently 16th) from Edgemoore to Pavonia Yards; that the movement was an "ordinary, good movement"; and that there was no rough handling of the train while same was in his charge.

W. G. Long deposes that he was an extra freight conductor of the West Jersey & Seashore Railroad, and moved trains from Pavonia Yards to City Line Sidings, outside of Camden, N. J.; that on September 17th he moved the car in question and delivered it at City Lines; that there was no rough handling of the train while in his hands.

Benjamin H. Campbell deposed that he was an extra freight conductor on September 18, 1918, on West Jersey & Seashore Railroad; that it was his duty to take trains from City Lines to Atlantic City; that he moved the car in question on the 18th; that he had a passenger engine, and a very easy handling of the train; that he had a good movement, and delivered the car at Atlantic City at 9:31 p. m. on the above day.

W. R. Brown, supervisor of arranged freight service on the Pennsylvania System east of Pittsburg, testifies that the record of the movement of the car in question from Potomac Yards to Atlantic City was the "regular, arranged freight movement for a shipment of merchandise such as furniture."

[5, 6] The testimony of the foregoing witnesses, giving in detail the movement and location of the car containing Mrs. Buchanan's furniture from the time of reception of same in Richmond to date of delivery in Atlantic City, shows very clearly that nothing happened en route to cause injury to a properly packed car. It negatives satisfactorily the presumption of negligence of handling in the course of transportation. We are fully satisfied after a careful consideration of the evidence in this record that it was error in the trial court to hold that the damage to the goods in question was caused by the negligence of the defendant. It was evidently due to the negligence of Smith & Hicks in the matter of loading and packing.

For the reasons heretofore given, we are satisfied that the judgment complained of was plainly against the evidence, and the same should be reversed. The proper order will be entered in this court.

Reversed.

BUCHANAN v. SMITH & HICKS, Inc.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
Sept. 28, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error \Rightarrow 1008(1)—Judgment reversed if plainly wrong or not supported by evidence.

The judgment will be reversed on writ of error if the court is of the opinion that it is plainly wrong or without evidence to support it.

2. Contracts \Rightarrow 322(3) — Evidence held to prove negligence in packing goods and loading car causing damage to carload during transportation.

In action for damage to carload of household goods, injured during transportation, against defendant, who had been employed by plaintiff to pack goods and load car, evidence held to prove that defendant was negligent in packing goods and loading car, and that such negligence was the cause of the damage.

Error to Law and Equity Court of City of Richmond.

Action by Elizabeth Buchanan against Smith & Hicks, Inc. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed, and judgment rendered for plaintiff.

T. Justin Moore, of Richmond, for plaintiff in error.

Scott & Buchanan and A. G. Robertson, all of Richmond, for defendant in error.

SAUNDERS, J. This case and the case of Walker D. Hines Director General, etc., v. Elizabeth Buchanan, 109 S. E. 218, decided at this term of this court, were heard together in Richmond. The plaintiff is the same in both cases, and the claim asserted against the respective defendants concerns the same goods. In the motion for judgment in this case of Buchanan v. Hines, Director General, etc., Smith and Hicks were charged with negligent failure to properly load, pack, crate, and brace the furniture and other goods of the plaintiff in the car in which the same were shipped, while the railroad company was charged with negligence in the matter of transporting these goods. In the instant case the defendants, who had undertaken the task of loading plaintiff's goods, are charged with having "negligently and improperly loaded the same on the car in an unsafe and insecure condition," so that said car, "having been carried to its place of destination in the ordinary course of transit and without accident, and without knowledge of the unsafe and insecure condition of said contents, reached said destination with its entire contents in a ruined, destroyed, and damaged condition," all resulting directly from the failure to properly load, brace, pack, and crate same.

After hearing the evidence in the instant case, the trial court entered judgment for the defendant. A writ of error was awarded to this judgment by one of the judges of this court.

It appears from the record that a jury was waived on the trial of this case, and all matters of law and fact were submitted by consent of counsel to the court for determination.

The following stipulation was made:

"Stipulation.

"It is hereby stipulated by and between the parties in this case, by their respective counsel, that the transcript of the evidence taken during the trial of the case of Elizabeth Buchanan v. Walker D. Hines, Director General, etc., which has been certified from this court to the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia, is to be read as a part of the true transcript in this case. * * * The parties hereby stipulate that the transcript of the evidence in the case of Elizabeth Buchanan v. Director General of Railroads, etc., shall be treated as the transcript of the evidence in the present case of Elizabeth Buchanan v. Smith and Hicks, Inc., and that the clerk of this court shall not make the evidence a part of the record in this case, but shall insert in lieu thereof this stipulation in order to avoid unnecessary costs."

Here follow the signatures of counsel.

The fourth assignment of error in plaintiff's petition in the instant case is as follows:

"(4) That the defendant did not 'pack said furniture securely in car,' in violation of said agreement and in violation of the common-law duties owing to the plaintiff by the defendant, as a bailee for hire for this purpose, irrespective of the agreement, and defendant wholly failed to brace securely and substantially load said furniture and effects on the car."

This assignment presents an issue of fact; the plaintiff contending that defendant's negligent failure in the foregoing respect occasioned the consequent damage to the contents of the car. The plaintiff also charges that the defendant undertook to wrap and crate her furniture. These charges the defendant denies.

In view of the conclusion reached on the first issue of fact, it will not be necessary to determine the second contention.

It is insisted by the defendant in error:

(a) That the goods in question were properly loaded and packed, and delivered to the railway company in good order, and that thereafter they were injured while they were in the exclusive care and control of said carrier who had accepted them without objection; (b) that, while the evidence on these allegations of fact is conflicting, this conflict must be resolved in favor of the finding of the trial court, because it cannot be said that such finding was either plainly wrong or without evidence to support it.

We are cited to many familiar authorities supporting this rule of decision. Notably among the precedents cited are the recent cases of Standard Accident Insurance Co. v. Walker, 127 Va. 140, 102 S. E. 585, and Graham v. Commonwealth, 127 Va. 808, 810, 103 S. E. 565, 566.

In the latter case the court said:

After careful consideration of "all of the evidence in the case, and upon giving the weight to the decision of the jury upon the matters of fact dependent upon the evidence which is conflicting and which involves the credibility of the witnesses, * * * and, along with this, also upon giving due weight to the action of the trial judge in refusing to set aside the verdict, * * * we are of opinion that it does not appear from the evidence that the judgment under review is plainly wrong, or without evidence to support it, and hence such judgment will be affirmed."

[1] This citation very plainly carries the implication, and such indeed is the law, that if in the situation supra the court has been of the opinion that the judgment under review was plainly wrong, or without evidence to support it, said judgment would have been reversed.

[2] In the instant case we have very carefully considered and reviewed, in the case of Elizabeth Buchanan v. Walker D. Hines, Director General, etc., the evidence relating to the packing and loading of the goods in question, and the subsequent handling of the car on which these goods were loaded, by the different railway companies concerned in the course of the movement of said car from Richmond to Atlantic City, the place of destination. We are satisfied that this evidence plainly shows that the defendant, Smith & Hicks, Inc., was negligent in the matter of loading and packing, and that the defendant in the case ubi supra successfully negated the presumption of negligence in transportation. Further, it is considered that the evidence plainly shows that the injuries to the contents of the car were due to the negligence of the defendant, Smith & Hicks, Inc., in the said matter of loading and packing.

In the opinion of this court the judgment of the trial court in the instant case, ascertaining, in substance, that the defendant, the said Smith & Hicks, Inc., was not negligent in the matter of loading and packing, and in consequence not liable to the plaintiff for the subsequent injuries to her furniture and other goods, was plainly wrong. Hence that judgment will be reversed, and the plaintiff having established by uncontroverted evidence the amount of her damages consequent upon defendant's negligence, the same appearing to be the sum of $1,341.50, a judgment for that amount, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum from September 18, 1918, in favor of the plaintiff, Elizabeth Buchanan, against the defendant, Smith & Hicks, Inc., will be entered in this court.

Reversed.

DEL SIGNORE v. PAYNE, Director General of Railroads. (No. 4319.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Oct. 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Commerce \Leftrightarrow 8(12)—Provisions of uniform bill of lading held binding as to interstate shipments.

The provisions of the "Uniform Bill of Lading—Adopted by Carriers in Official Classification Territory, Effective January 1st, 1916," when employed, constitutes the contract between the parties to an interstate shipment and is binding upon them in determining their respective rights growing out of such interstate shipment.

2. Carriers \Leftrightarrow 140—Uniform bill of lading gives 48 hours after notice to owner of arrival before liability as carrier ceases and that of warehouseman begins.

Section 5 of the conditions contained in such Uniform Bill of Lading, properly construed, gives the owner 48 hours after notice by the carrier of the arrival of the goods, within which to remove the goods before the liability of the carrier as such ceases and its liability as warehouseman begins.

3. Cases held inapplicable to interstate shipments.

Our cases of Berry et al. v. W. Va. & P. R. R. Co., 44 W. Va. 538, 30 S. E. 143, 67 Am. St. Rep. 781, Hurley & Son v. N. & W. Ry. Co., 68 W. Va. 471, 69 S. E. 904, and Hutchinson v. U. S. Express Co., 63 W. Va. 128, 59 S. E. 949, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 393, are inapplicable to interstate shipments made pursuant to the contract contained in such Uniform Bill of Lading.

Error to Circuit Court, Tucker County.

Action by Sante Del Signore against John Barton Payne, Director General of Railroads, begun in the justice court. The circuit court directed verdict and judgment for defendant. Plaintiff's motions to set aside the verdict and for new trial were denied, and he brings error. Reversed, verdict set aside, and new trial granted.

J. W. Harman, of Parsons, for plaintiff in error.

E. A. Bowers, of Elkins, for defendant in error.

MILLER, J. The controversy is over the alleged liability of the defendant to plaintiff for the total loss of one hundred cases of beverage shipped by the Cumberland Brewing Company, December 19, 1918, from Cumberland, Maryland, over the Western Maryland Railway, and consigned to plaintiff at Thomas, West Virginia.

On the trial of the action below, upon appeal from the judgment of a justice, at the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence, the court sustained defendant's motion to strike out the evidence and directed a verdict for him, and the judgment of nll capiat now complained of followed the verdict so directed. And the circuit court also denied plaintiff's motion to set aside the verdict as contrary to law and the evidence and to grant him a new trial.

[1] The contract of shipment was contained in the bill of lading issued to the shipper, and purporting on its face to be "Uniform Bill of Lading—Adopted by Carriers in Official Classification Territory, Effective January 1st, 1916." Section 5 of the "Conditions" contained in this bill of lading, a part of plaintiff's evidence, among other things provides:

"Sec. 5. Property not removed by the party entitled to receive it within forty-eight hours (exclusive of legal holidays) after notice of its arrival has been duly sent or given may be kept in a car, depot, or place of delivery of the carrier or warehouse, subject to a reasonable charge for storage and to carrier's responsibility as warehouseman only, or may be, at the option of the carrier, removed to and stored in a public or licensed warehouse at the cost of the owner and there held at the owner's risk and without liability on the part of the carrier, and subject to a lien for all freight and other lawful charges, including a reasonable charge for storage."

[2] The other evidence of the plaintiff, oral and documentary, shows that the goods sued for were valued at $240.00; that having been shipped December 19, 1918, they did not arrive at their destination until January 2d, and were not unloaded until January 3, 1919; and the plaintiff was not given notice of the arrival until the morning of January 4, 1919, after they had been frozen and rendered absolutely worthless; and for this reason he refused to receive them. It does appear that some workmen at the railroad station had told plaintiff's driver on the afternoon of January 2d, that the goods were in the car on the sidetrack, with other cars, but not unloaded; but plaintiff was not advised of the unloading of the car until the morning of January 4th, after the goods had been destroyed. At that time the forty-eight hours given by the bill of lading for removal of the goods, considering the notice to the drayman on the afternoon of January 2d as notice to the plaintiff, had not yet elapsed, and of course this time had not elapsed after the agent's notice to plaintiff on January 4th, and the question presented by the evidence was whether the liability of defendant as carrier continued for the forty-eight hours, or was at the time the goods were destroyed only that of warehouseman. We find that the proper construction of said Section 5 of the Uniform Bill of Lading was before the Supreme Court of the United States in the recent case of Michigan Cent. R. R. Co. v. Mark Owen & Co., 256 U. S. —, 41 Sup. Ct.

554, 65 L. Ed. —, where it was held that the liability of the carrier as such continued during the whole of the forty-eight hours. And in that case it was held that the fact that the owner had had notice of the arrival of the goods and that they were in the car on the sidetrack, and that he had broken the seals on the car and had commenced the unloading of the goods made no difference, and that the goods having been destroyed by fire in the meantime, the carrier continued liable as such for their loss. In the case at bar it is conceded that the forty-eight hours had not elapsed from January 4th, when the plaintiff had his first notice from defendant's agent of the arrival of the goods, and the jury would have been justified in finding from the evidence that the period had not elapsed from the time plaintiff's drayman learned of the arrival of the goods from the employees of defendant at the railway station on January 2d.

[3] To support the finding and judgment of the circuit court defendant's counsel rely on our cases of Berry et al. v. W. Va. & P. R. R. Co., 44 W. Va. 538, 30 S. E. 143, 67 Am. St. Rep. 781, Hurley & Son v. N. & W. Ry. Co., 68 W. Va. 471, 69 S. E. 904, and Hutchinson v. U. S. Express Co., 63 W. Va. 128, 59 S. E. 949, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 393. These cases are not pertinent to the case presented here. Neither of them involved the proper construction of the Uniform Bill of Lading constituting the special contract between the shipper and the carrier here relied on. The shipment in question was an interstate shipment, and the federal not the state law applies. United Metals Selling Co. v. Pryor, 243 Fed. 91, 155 C. C. A. 621; Dodge & Dent Mfg. Co. v. Penn. R. R. Co., 175 App. Div. 823, 162 N. Y. Supp. 549.

Moreover, if the liability of the defendant as carrier had ceased and that of warehouseman had begun when the goods were destroyed, it is an open question whether a proper construction of Section 1 of the bill of lading does not cast the burden of proving freedom from negligence on the carrier in possession of the goods. One of the provisions of that section is:

"When in accordance with general custom, on account of the nature of the property, or when at the request of the shipper the property is transported in open cars, the carrier or party in possession (except in case of loss or damage by fire in which case the liability shall be the same as though the property had been carried in closed cars) shall be liable only for negligence, and the burden to prove freedom from such negligence shall be on the carrier or party in possession."

The history of the adoption of this Uniform Bill of Lading will be found in 14 Interst. Com. Comn. R. (1908) p. 346.

For these reasons we conclude that the court below erred in excluding plaintiff's evidence and directing a verdict for defendant, and that the judgment ought to be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the plaintiff awarded a new trial, and such will be the judgment entered here.

VICKERS v. VICKERS. (No. 4257.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Oct. 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Husband and wife \S 283(2) — Husband must support wife unless guilty of offense entitling him to divorce a mensa.

While the marital relation exists, a husband must maintain and support the wife, and he cannot abandon her and escape that obligation, unless she has been guilty of some marital offense which would entitle him to a divorce a mensa et thoro.

2. Husband and wife \S 300—Trial court will not be reversed on conflicting evidence as to abandonment.

Where the husband abandons the wife, and she institutes suit for maintenance and support, and to justify his abandonment and non-support he charges adultery and cruel and inhuman treatment on the part of the wife, and the evidence is conflicting, contradictory, and unsatisfactory, and the lower court on such evidence has found that the charges have not been sustained, the appellate court will refuse to reverse, although it might have rendered a different decree if it had acted thereon in the first instance.

3. Husband and wife \S 300—Amount decreed for support not disturbed unless clearly erroneous, especially where lower court retains jurisdiction to change.

In such case the amount decreed for support and maintenance of the wife will not be disturbed, unless clearly erroneous, and especially so where the lower court retains jurisdiction to change the amount to meet changing conditions.

4. Husband and wife \S 298(1)—Wife held entitled in maintenance suit to reasonable counsel fees for former divorce suit.

In such suit, reasonable counsel fees expended by the wife in defense of a suit for divorce instituted against her since the abandonment, charging her with a grave marital offense, will be allowed, where it appears that in the divorce suit the right of the wife to recover the same in any other suit or proceeding has been expressly reserved and saved to her. The amount of such counsel fees is within the sound discretion of the lower court, and will not be disturbed unless the discretion has been abused.

5. Husband and wife \S 288—Wife may recover amount necessarily expended for her support after husband's abandonment although she has separate estate.

Where the husband abandons the wife, without sufficient cause, she may recover from him, according to his ability, the amount necessarily and economically expended by her for support, according to her station in life, from the time of the abandonment, although she may have a separate estate of her own.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Cabell County.

Suit by Victoria T. Vickers against R. E. Vickers, for maintenance. From a decree allowing a monthly maintenance, and a further order allowing counsel fees in a divorce suit formerly pending, the defendant appeals. Affirmed, with modification, and remanded.

Harry S. Irons, George I. Neal, and F. M. Livezey, all of Huntington, for appellant.

J. W. Perry, Geo. J. McComas, Thomas R. Shepherd, and Williams, Scott & Lovett, all of Huntington, for appellee.

LIVELY, J. From a decree of October 15, 1920, allowing plaintiff $250 per month for maintenance from the date of the institution of the suit, and until the further order of the court, together with an allowance of $500 for counsel fees in a divorce suit formerly pending, defendant prosecutes this appeal.

The suit is for maintenance of the plaintiff, the wife, and the bill charges that the defendant, her husband, deserted her without just cause on January 1, 1918, and has thereafter failed and refused to live with her. Plaintiff avers that it requires the sum of $500 each month to suitably maintain her; that she has expended for that purpose out of her estate, since the abandonment, approximately $4,000, and the further sum of $2,000 as counsel fees and expenses in defending a former divorce proceeding instituted against her by defendant; and she prays for suitable allowance for her maintenance and recovery of the sums expended.

Defendant admits that since the marriage they lived together as man and wife until 1911, but avers that from that time until he left her on January 1, 1918, they had no relations as such except to reside together in the same house on Fifth Avenue in the city of Huntington. Defendant also avers that when he left her and made his abode in the hospital, which he then owned in that city, he had cause and justification therefor; that she had been guilty of adultery about the year 1905, the legal evidence of which he had not obtained until about the time he left; and that her conduct toward him for many years constituted cruelty and inhuman treatment, and had impaired his health and destroyed his peace of mind, the acts and omissions which he asserts constitute cruel and inhuman treatment being set out in detail.

The marriage was solemnized in the year 1890, and three children were born, one of whom died in infancy, and the other two, a boy and a girl, aged about 20 and 17 years, respectively, are witnesses, giving testimony of the unfortunate estrangement of the parents. Defendant at the time of marriage was beginning a successful career as a physician and surgeon, and by dint of energy, industry, and ability soon attained an enviable professional standing, and rapidly accumulated a fortune. His wife, a member of an old, aristocratic, wealthy, and influential family, was frugal and industrious, and it is evident that she thus largely contributed to his professional and material success. A few years after the marriage defendant erected a fine residence on Fifth avenue, in the residential section, furnishing it sumptuously, and they resided there until the time of the separation. It is now occupied by plaintiff. After moving into this home, differences began concerning their domestic life, followed by violent quarrels and bickerings. The conduct of the household affairs was a source of disagreement. What one desired or suggested, the other opposed. One instance will suffice to illustrate the regrettable trend in their domestic life. The husband built a porch to the house, opposed by the wife because it covered some pretty stone work. She refused to be reconciled, and would not sit on the porch for about two years. Their temperaments were incompatible, their wills in conflict, growing from bad to worse, until it appears that they became irreconcilable. Mutual jealousies arose. In 1905, defendant testifies, he discovered a compromising relationship existing between his wife and a Dr. Price, who was associated with him in his practice, and who had access to his home, his professional office at that time being located in the dwelling house; that afterwards she admitted that Dr. Price had hugged and kissed her, but denied that any further impropriety existed between them. Dr. Price was promptly discharged, and afterwards died about 1909. The wife became jealous of her husband, and suspected that improper relations existed between him and some of his female patients, and more especially one of the girl employees at the hospital, and she testifies that she heard and saw her husband kissing this particular employee. This the husband denied. In this air of mutual suspicion, "Trifles light as air are to the jealous confirmations strong as proofs of holy writ." In this atmosphere of distrust, love disappeared, and mutual condemnations and reprimands filled its place. Somber jealousy sat at the hearthstone and would not be driven forth. It was ever present, like the death heads at the feast, an impassive acolyte at the sacred family altar. The wife testified that from the beginning their married life had been filled with sorrow, and Dr. Vickers testified that his home had been a hell.

[1] Shall we enumerate the various mutual charges preferred, and detail the evidence adduced in support of each? It would serve no useful purpose. It is reasonably well established that while the marital relation exists it is the duty of the husband to maintain the wife, and he cannot abandon her and escape his duties unless he can show that the wife has been guilty of some marital offense which would entitle him to a divorce from bed and board. Alkire v. Alkire, 33 W. Va. 517, 11 S. E. 11; Martin v. Martin, 33 W. Va. 695, 11 S. E. 12. Neither spouse is justified in abandoning the other unless the conduct of the one abandoned has been such that, when judicially determined, it constitutes good cause for such a divorce.

The grounds relied upon by defendant to defeat plaintiff's claim for support are: (1) Adultery; (2) cruel and inhuman treatment. We think the charge of adultery is not well established. It is alleged to have been committed in 1905 by plaintiff with Dr. Price, and the evidence of two servants, both negroes, is relied upon. Coupled with this evidence is the testimony of other persons that plaintiff and Dr. Price were friendly, often seen together in the home and elsewhere, and seemed to be fond of each other's society; then the alleged confessions of plaintiff that Dr. Price had hugged and kissed her. The plaintiff indignantly denies any improper relations with Price, and denies the alleged confessions. The incident of the soiled towels thrown down the back stairway, testified to by the woman servant, is unsatisfactory. She does not connect defendant therewith, except inferentially. Her testimony is vague and uncertain. The character and life of this witness is such as to lend little credence, little probative value, to her testimony. The testimony of Jas. Bullock, the negro manservant, relating to the bathroom incident, is contradicted so successfully both by witnesses and physical facts as to leave little weight.

Taking the evidence of these witnesses as true, there is no positive act of adultery proven. To establish adultery, positive and direct evidence is not required, but, if it is sought to be established by circumstantial evidence, such evidence must be so strong and clear as to carry conviction of the truth of the charge. Huff v. Huff, 73 W. Va. 331, 80 S. E. 846, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 282; Martin v. Martin, supra; Anderson v. Anderson, 78 W. Va. 118, 88 S. E. 653, 2 A. L. R. 1617; Nicely v. Nicely, 81 W. Va. 269, 94 S. E. 749. Moreover, it must be remembered that these alleged acts occurred in 1905, and never came to light until after the separation. It was the other alleged cause, the cruel and inhuman treatment, which induced the abandonment. There might have been thoughtless or impulsive indiscretions committed by each. How many of us are free from them? But, as was aptly said in Martin v. Martin, by Judge English:

"In assuming the marriage relation, it is understood that the contracting parties do so fully aware of the frailties and imperfections of human nature, and conscious of the fact that mutual forbearance must be practiced to enable them to pursue pleasantly the journey of life as companions; each party undertaking to overlook the moral wrongs and infirmities of the other. The best interests of society, decency, and morality combine in demanding that the obligations taken upon themselves by the parties who enter into the marriage contract should not be abandoned and disregarded upon the mere whim or caprice of either party, or upon slight cause, real or imaginary."

[2] What are the grounds alleged as constituting cruel and inhuman treatment? Alleged persistence of the wife in doing menial work, and her refusal to employ servants for that purpose; preparation and serving of unwholesome food in the home; unsanitary housekeeping; eavesdropping while defendant consulted his female patients in the hospital and elsewhere, and while directing the hospital business affairs; interfering with the workmen and the nurses and servants at the hospital; abuse of defendant for taking skilled nurses with him when called away to perform surgical operations of a serious nature; illiberal and unmotherly treatment of the children; and generally a systematic and persistent effort, in many ways too numerous to detail, calculated and designed to humiliate defendant in his social and professional life; the result of which, defendant avers, was to destroy his nerves, his peace of mind, and to undermine his health. Much evidence was taken in the attempt to substantiate these charges; on the other hand, much evidence is in the record to rebut these charges. Can we say that any of them have been satisfactorily established? If they have been successfully proven, do they constitute cruel and inhuman treatment as meant by the statute? Want of congeniality, incompatible temperament, jealousy, nagging, quarreling, angry words, and the like are not sufficient alone. The marital conduct and offenses must be such as to impair health.

Just before the abandonment defendant applied for and obtained a life insurance policy for $50,000, after undergoing a medical examination for that purpose. He was sixty years of age at that time, and had practiced his arduous profession with constant energy and consummate ability. Had his health been impaired from any cause, a strict examination at that age for so large a life policy would likely have discovered impairment of health. Can we say that impairment of defendant's health has been satisfactorily established?

But on conflicting evidence, such as is shown by this record, this court gives peculiar weight to the judgment of the lower court. Even where the appellate court might have found otherwise in the first instance, it will not disturb the findings of the lower court where the evidence is such that different minds might reasonably disagree. Gates v. Gates, 87 W. Va. 603, 105 S. E. 815; McCraw v. Bower, 62 W. Va. 417, 59 S. E. 175; Richardson v. Ralphsnyder, 40 W. Va. 15, 20 S. E. 854; Sibley v. Stacey, 53 W. Va. 293, 44 S. E. 420; Bartlett v. Cleavenger, 35 W. Va. 720, 14 S. E. 273; Smith v. Yoke, 27 W. Va. 639. Our conclusion, then, is to sustain the finding of the lower court that plaintiff is entitled to maintenance and support; and, having arrived at that conclusion, we are not disposed to disturb the monthly allowance fixed by the decree for that purpose.

[3] It appears that the sum of $250 is allowed from the date of the institution of the suit, May 1, 1919, subject to credits of monthly installments paid by defendant pending the suit, such sum to be paid monthly, "until the further order of this court." The circuit court has seen fit to retain jurisdiction in this regard, and, should occasion and circumstances require, the amount can be enlarged or diminished to meet the changed conditions. It appears that plaintiff occupies the furnished dwelling house on Fifth avenue, and no doubt the judge took this fact into consideration when the decree was pronounced. At this time the maintenance and education of the two children devolve upon defendant, and he is abundantly fulfilling that expensive duty.

[4] It is insisted that it was error for the decree to allow attorneys' fees expended by plaintiff in defending a suit for divorce instituted against her by defendant, after he had left her, charging her with serious marital offenses, and which was afterwards dismissed on motion of defendant (plaintiff in that suit). It is asserted that such fees have no place in this suit, and should have been asserted in the proceeding in which they arose, and not having been decreed therein the claim is barred under the doctrine of res judicata, and she is now estopped from asserting a claim which she should have litigated in the former suit. But when we examine the decree dismissing that action, we find the following:

"That the dismissal of this case shall be without prejudice to defendant to institute any other suit or proceeding for the purpose of compelling plaintiff to furnish her support and maintenance, or to collect any costs or fees expended or contended for by her in this cause."

There is no doubt but that attorneys' fees could have been properly allowed her in that proceeding, and, having been expressly reserved, we can see no inequity in allowing recovery in this proceeding. Why should she be compelled to resort to an action at law? Why not adjudicate this money claim arising out of the marriage relation in a suit for maintenance? They are matters which are closely related; besides, there is authority for the proposition that such fees fall within the category of necessities for which the wife may recover in proceedings for maintenance. 13 R. O. L. § 243; Porter v. Briggs, 38 Iowa, 166, 18 Am. Rep. 27; Conant v. Burnham, 133 Mass. 508, 43 Am. Rep. 532; Hamilton v. Salisbury, 133 Mo. App. 718, 114 S. W. 563. Under the facts of this case we are of the opinion that the court properly allowed the fees complained of as error, and that the amount thereof was in the discretion of the judge. We see no abuse of his discretion.

[8] The only question remaining is plaintiff's cross-assignment of error for failure of the court to decree to her the sum of $2,444.15 expended by her out of her separate estate for support during the time intervening between the date of abandonment, January 1, 1918, to the date of the institution of her suit May 1, 1919, 16 months. The amount expended by her for this purpose is itemized, and she states that she lived as economically as possible, and purchased very little clothing, using almost exclusively the clothing she had purchased prior to the abandonment, and had no servants. We find no attempt to controvert her statement in this regard. Can she recover for these expenditures in this suit? It is the duty of a husband to support his wife, irrespective of her separate estate. It is an incident of the marriage relation, based on the marriage contract. Judge Ritz said in Norman v. Norman, 88 W. Va. —, 107 S. E. 407:

"The marriage contract imposed upon the husband the obligation to support and maintain his wife and the offspring of the marriage, and he cannot relieve himself of the obligations . . . by conduct which compels his wife to leave his home for her personal safety. The fact that the wife has a small amount of property in no way affects her right to compel her husband to support and maintain her and their infant child given to her custody. She is not compelled to make good his obligation out of her estate, but is entitled to receive from him sufficient sums to support and maintain her and the child intrusted to her custody in the station in life to which they belong, considering, of course, the capacity of the husband to earn money, and the income which he has from any property he may own"—citing Kittle v. Kittle, 86 W. Va. 46, 102 S. E. 790.

If a man deserts his wife, she may maintain an action against him to recover according to his ability the amount she has expended from her separate estate for her necessary support. 13 R. O. L. p. 1188, § 220, citing De Brauwere v. De Brauwere, 203 N. Y. 460, 96 N. E. 722, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 508. It will be observed that the amount expended by the wife for her necessities per month during this period of 16 months is less than the monthly allowance of $250 fixed by the court in its decree, and which begins with the institution of the suit on May 1, 1919, and less than the monthly sum voluntarily deposited by defendant for the same purpose. We do not find that any provision was made for her support during the time of separation and up to May 1, 1919. We note the answer states that plaintiff had ample means in her possession belonging to defendant at the time he left her to support her during that period, but we find no evidence to support that statement, and none has been pointed out in the briefs. We are unable to perceive on what theory this claim was disallowed. It is specifically claimed in the bill, fully proven, and is one of the issues. If the support can be decreed from the beginning of the suit, there is no good reason why it should not be also allowed from the date of the abandonment.

We modify the decree to the extent that plaintiff shall be allowed and decreed the sum of $2,444.15, the amount expended by her out of her separate property for her support and maintenance from January 1, 1918, to May 1, 1919, affirm the decree in all other respects, and remand the cause.

Affirmed, with modification, and remanded.

WILLIAMSON v. HINES, AGENT.

(No. 4230.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Oct. 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Continuance \S 30—Amendment of declaration by substituting official designation of plaintiff held not to warrant postponing trial.

Amendment of a declaration by the substitution of Walker D. Hines, Agent, as defendant, in lieu of Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads, does not warrant postponement of a trial of the action then begun or about to begin, unless defendant shows good cause for the delay.

2. Damages \S 213—Instruction limiting recovery to injury inflicted in railroad collision independent of injury suffered in other like collisions approved.

An instruction given in an action for damages for an injury sustained in a railroad collision, which limited the recovery to the injury so inflicted, independent of injuries suffered by plaintiff in other like or similar collisions specified, is not erroneous if he had become more responsive to injury because of such former collisions, which rendered him more susceptible to injury, of which susceptibility defendant was not aware at the time of the accident.

3. Damages \S 213—Instruction directing verdict for defendant if passenger's other injuries were unknown to carrier, held erroneous.

An instruction which directs a verdict for defendant, provided the jury should believe plaintiff was, when he became a passenger, "in a highly nervous condition" because of former wrecks, and was not, therefore, a "fair average individual," and his condition was unknown to the carrier, and that the injury occurred without wanton negligence and but for such condition it would have been slight, if any, had he "been well" when the collision occurred, is erroneous, because it makes the knowledge of the carrier a condition precedent to the right to compensation for the injury inflicted.

Error to Circuit Court, Cabell County.

Action by Carl E. Williamson against Walker D. Hines, Agent, etc., for personal injuries. Judgment for plaintiff, and the defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Fitzpatrick, Campbell, Brown & Davis, of Huntington, for plaintiff in error.

A. A. Lilly, of Charleston, and J. S. Lilly, of Huntington, for defendant in error.

LYNCH, J.. The errors assigned by defendant below and plaintiff in error for the reversal of a $5,000 judgment for plaintiff in an action for damages due to an injury inflicted upon him, as the declaration charges, in a collision of the train on which he was a passenger and an engine negligently permitted to stand on the track over which the train had the right to unobstructed passage on its eastward trip from Huntington to Charleston, and elsewhere over defendant's line of railroad, will appear as the discussion proceeds. The collision occurred December 18, 1918, and that it did occur in the manner indicated is not controverted. The only vital question to be determined upon this review has arisen on the motion to set aside the verdict of the jury and grant a new trial, which motions the trial court overruled, and entered judgment for the sum returned by the jury. All other assignments center upon the rulings upon the motions mentioned.

The only excuse offered for obstructing the track is that, as the east-bound train was nearly an hour late in leaving the station at Huntington, the agent of the company who drove the engine on the track concluded, without inquiry, that the train had run on its regular scheduled time. That supposition is not an extenuation of the negligence that was responsible for the collision, and defendant does not contend that it is. The declaration, the sufficiency of which the defendant challenged by demurrer, sets forth with certainty and particularity every fact and circumstance necessary to constitute good pleading, and we see no reason for any appropriate action thereon other than that taken by the court in overruling the demurrer, and defendant assigns no such reason.

[1] The substitution of the name Walker D. Hines, Agent, for Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads, as the defendant named in the summons and declaration, worked no prejudice against him, and he does not show in what respect, if any, the substitution prejudiced his right of defense during the progress of the trial; the change in name having been made after the jury had been impaneled and had heard part of the evidence. Defendant did object to the motion to amend the pleading by the substitution of a different description of the person sued, and excepted to the action of the court upon the motion, but did not request a postponement, or show or attempt to show cause for postponing the trial, or, in so far as appears from the record, assign as erroneous the permission to amend and the amendment of the declaration, until after the allowance of the writ bringing the case here for review. There is no error in the procedure. Harness v. B. & O. Railroad Co., 86 W. Va. 284, 297, 103 S. E. 866.

[2, 3] A discussion of the court's refusal to direct a verdict for defendant seems unnecessary, as clearly plaintiff was injured by the collision and was entitled to some compensation for the loss sustained by him, whether the injury so inflicted was temporary or permanent. He did receive some injury chargeable to defendant's negligence, a fact as to which there is no dispute. If he is to be credited, he spent $1,000 to effect a cure for the impairment of his physical health due to the accident.

Our examination of the instructions requested by plaintiff, and given by the court, discloses no valid cause for unfavorable comment. Plaintiff's instructions A and B are not criticized by defendant, and we find them unobjectionable. His instruction C directed the jury's attention to like injuries inflicted upon plaintiff in a railroad accident in 1913, and an automobile accident in 1916, and told the jury that, if by reason thereof he was more susceptible to injury, nervousness, and pain at the date of the Chesapeake & Ohio wreck on December 18, 1918, and that on that date the defendant negligently injured the said Williamson, and he was damaged thereby, the jury should find for the plaintiff an amount sufficient to compensate him to the full extent of the injury inflicted by defendant, etc. The objection to this language goes to the failure of the plaintiff to inform defendant of his former injuries, presumably for the purpose of exacting from defendant's agents in charge of the train a higher degree of care as to plaintiff than that devolving upon them in case plaintiff had not theretofore received such or like injury affecting his health or strength. That such was the theory of defendant seems plausible when measured by his instruction No. 7, which the court refused to give, and of which refusal he complains. The language of instruction C fully guards against the danger of misinterpretation by the jury, and in effect advises the jury to assess the defendant with such an amount of damages as will compensate plaintiff for the injuries inflicted by defendant, and not for injuries suffered by him in any other manner. Defendant's instruction No. 7, if given, may have induced the jury to believe that if a passenger having an infirmity, not apparent when a railroad company receives him as such, is injured in an accident, attributable to the company's negligence, he cannot recover unless the company is aware of his condition when it receives him as a passenger; that is, the instruction propounded makes susceptibility to injury the test. That is not a reasonable test. Suppose, as was the case in Mann Boudoir Car Co. v. Dupre, 54 Fed. 646, 4 C. C. A. 540, 21 L. R. A. 289, a married woman who, when received for railroad transportation, was in the early stage of pregnancy, of which condition the carrier had no knowledge, is subjected to unreasonable treatment by the agents of the carrier, for which and for other reasons she deemed it advisable or was required by them to leave and did leave the coach, in consequence of which she suffered a miscarriage and other harmful results, for which she sued and recovered a judgment, one of the lines of defense being the lack of the company's knowledge of plaintiff's condition at the time she became a passenger. In the opinion the court said:

"This theory, and the requested charge embodying it would require every pregnant woman to refrain from travel, to take all the risks of the negligence of public carriers, or to proclaim her condition to the servants of the carrier."

In East Tenn., Va. & Ga. Railroad Co. v. Lockhart, 79 Ala. 315, Louisa Lockhart, a child, being plaintiff, was a passenger on the railroad, and at the time was sick, and was required by defendant's agents to leave the train, which she did and walked to the station beyond which they had carried her, whereby her illness was seriously aggravated, and the court said, in substance, that ignorance of her condition was not an excuse, "and the defendant is as responsible, as if he had full knowledge of the fact." Also in City of Roswell v. Thomas M. Davenport, 14 N. M. 91, 89 Pac. 256, Davenport having obtained a judgment against the city for injury occasioned by a defective sidewalk, whereby the diseased condition of the plaintiff, of which defendant was not aware at the time of his injury, was aggravated, the lack of such knowledge did not affect the question of negligence. There is therefore no error in the action of the trial court upon the two instructions. It would be an extraordinary requirement if a passenger afflicted with some disguised disease or infirmity should be compelled to publish to the company's agent his physical condition in order to hold the company liable for the negligence of such agents.

Defendant claims to be aggrieved by an oral instruction not asked by either party to the action, but objected to by defendant. What the character, purport, and effect of the language used was nowhere appears in the record. It may have been harmless; it may not have influenced or tended to influence the jury. If defendant considered it sufficiently important to require the opinion of this court upon the propriety or harmful effect of the instruction, defendant should have made it a part of the record by a bill of exception.

[4] A further complaint goes to the refusal of defendant's instruction No. 5, which required a verdict for defendant if the jury believed the evidence sufficient to show: (1) That the ailments from which the plaintiff is suffering, in accordance with his allegations, were not caused by the injuries, or any of them, received in the collision of December 18, 1918; (2) that no substantial injury was received in such accident; (3) that there was no loss of time by the plaintiff; and (4) that his business was not interfered with.

A sufficient reason for refusing this instruction is the absence of proof of the facts upon which it is predicated. From the date of the accident, December 18, 1918, until March 6, 1919, plaintiff did no work and received no compensation except that voluntarily contributed by Barrett Bros., doing business in Pittsburgh, whose agent he was, and when he resumed the transaction of their business in the territory assigned to him he was unable to perform the service required to the same extent and with the same degree of efficiency as he had done before the accident; and from its date and for some months afterward his physical condition was such as to prevent him from engaging in any profitable occupation, and to require frequent medical treatment, either in a hospital in Pittsburgh or Huntington, or at the office of his medical adviser. This condition persisted even at the time of the trial, as did also the tenderness of the injured parts of his body, produced by the collision, and which then caused him pain and other serious inconvenience, more or less persistent. That such was the result of the accident the evidence does in some measure tend to show, and part of it relating to his ability to resume and the deferred resumption of the avocation pursued by him before the accident is without contradiction, and hence its inclusion would have been erroneous.

The character and seriousness of the accident and its effect upon plaintiff are matters submitted to and passed upon by the jury, and, unless the jurors failed to give due weight to the testimony touching that feature of the case, their verdict must stand.

[5] As heretofore said, the collision resulted from the gross indifference for the safety of defendant's passengers, and as a result thereof plaintiff was thrown forward against a table in the club coach, located near the partition dividing the car into its two compartments, and at which he was sitting for the purpose of ordering and eating breakfast, thereby causing him pain in the right lower quadrant of his abdomen, and the severance or dilaceration of the nerves contained under the part so affected, some of them extending to the scrotum. From the ailments so produced or aggravated, if produced by the accidents heretofore referred to, plaintiff still suffered at the time of the trial, after the lapse of 16½ months, during which period he was examined by experienced surgeons and treated by competent physicians, most of whom were unable to discover a likelihood of persistency or permanency in the injury, but one or two of whom did, and they are corroborated by his wife and himself as well as others. And, although we might be inclined to agree with defendant and a majority of those who testified in defendant's behalf in believing the verdict and judgment to be excessive, that belief cannot ordinarily authorize appellate interference by granting a new trial. Hicks v. Romaine, 116 Va. 401, 82 S. E. 71; Hill v. Norton, 74 W. Va. 428, 82 S. E. 363, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 489.

From December 18, 1918, the date of the accident, until March 6, 1919, he did no work and received no compensation except wages paid by his employer, and then was inefficient to some extent by reason of the injury, and for that reason unable to cover the territory assigned to him by the company in whose business he was employed. In the meantime he was under the observation and care of one or more physicians, and part of the time in a hospital in Pittsburgh and another in Huntington. It was therefore the duty of the jury to determine whether the injury was permanent or temporary, and, as they have done so, it is incumbent on us to affirm the judgment.

STATE ex rel. HATFIELD v. FARRAR, Mayor. (No. 4448.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Oct. 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Municipal corporations ~~§~~182—Mayor may not suspend chief of police, such power being vested in city commission.

By section 42, c. 20, Acts 1919, Municipal Charters, jurisdiction and power to suspend the chief of police of the city of Williamson is vested in the city commission; and the mayor of that city has no authority to suspend or remove him.

2. Municipal corporations ~~§~~90—Majority of qualified members of tribunal is necessary to quorum, and not a majority of all elected.

Under a statutory provision saying in general terms a majority of the members of a public tribunal, composed of a prescribed number of officers, shall be necessary to form a quorum, a majority of its members in office at a given time suffices, and, if there are vacancies, a majority of the whole number elected to membership is not required.

3. Municipal corporations ~~§~~90—Removal of member of tribunal does not ipso facto create vacancy, and he must be included in determining necessary number for quorum.

Upon the assumption that a member of a city commission composed of elected members renders himself ineligible longer to hold his position by removal from the city and state after induction into office, such removal does not ipso facto create a vacancy, and a majority of those in office at the time including such member is required to constitute a quorum.

4. Municipal corporations ~~§~~90—There is no vacancy for disqualification until vacancy shall have been declared by quorum.

In such case there is no vacancy until the fact of disqualification shall have been ascertained and determined and the vacancy declared by a quorum so constituted.

5. Municipal corporations ~~§~~90—Resolution by majority of commission after excluding one disqualified and reciting vacancy held void.

An order or resolution adopted by a majority of the members of such commission after excluding such member from the count, and reciting vacancy in his office by reason of such removal, is void on its face.

Original proceeding by the State, on the relation of E. C. Hatfield, against W. A. Farrar, Mayor, for peremptory writ of mandamus to restore relator to the office of Chief of Police of the City of Williamson. Writ awarded.

Joe P. Hatfield, of Williamson, Jno. T. Simms, of Charleston, and John B. Morrison, for relator.

Douglas W. Brown, of Huntington, for respondent.

POFFENBARGER, J. The relator seeks a peremptory writ of mandamus to restore him to the office of chief of police of the city of Williamson, from which an order issued by the mayor of that city purports and attempts to suspend him.

[1] By the charter of the city (chapter 14, Acts of 1915, Municipal Charters, as amended by chapter 20, Acts of 1919, Municipal Charters), the jurisdiction to suspend that officer is vested in the commission of six members, which governs the city. See section 42 of Acts of 1919. No provision of the present charter empowers the mayor to do so.

As the law of the city formerly was, it seems the mayor was empowered by a valid ordinance to remove the chief of police from office, and the amendatory act of 1915, Municipal Charters, continued in effect all ordinances then in force and not inconsistent with the provisions of that act, until amended or repealed. That statute put the power of suspension of the chief of police in the city manager. This of necessity impliedly repealed the ordinance. The act of 1919, amending the act of 1915, puts that power in the commission. Hence lack of authority in the mayor to suspend the relator is clear.

Any implication of such authority in him, arising out of the general powers conferred upon him, is excluded by this express provision. A mere unnecessary implication cannot stand against express terms inconsistent therewith. Moreover, it is very unusual to place a power of appointment or a motion in the hands of two distinct officers or tribunals. In such case there would be an inevitable conflict of authority, often leading to trouble between the repositories of such power and public embarrassment.

[2, 3] The return, however, sets up removal of the relator by the commissioners, between the issuance of the alternative writ and the return thereof, by a resolution or order passed or adopted by three of them, claiming to have acted in a meeting at which, under the circumstances, they constituted a quorum. The commission, theoretically, is by-partisan. In the return it is asserted that ordinarily no meeting could be held in the absence of any of the members representing one of the political parties, because neither of the other two would attend. Now it is claimed one of those three has resigned, abandoned, or forfeited his office by removal from the city and the state. The three members of the other party, deeming themselves then to be a sufficient number to constitute a quorum, held a meeting, declared vacant the office of the migrating member, and passed the resolution above mentioned, and here interposed as a defense.

If the resolution was passed in a duly constituted meeting of the commissioners, it would no doubt bar the relief sought because the award of the writ would be fruitless and unavailing. Hall v. Staunton, 55 W. Va. 684, 47 S. E. 265. As the resolution, if valid, would make the writ useless and futile, the objection to the filing thereof, on the ground of its adoption after award of the alternative writ, is untenable. But, if the meeting in which it was adopted was not duly constituted and could not validly do what it undertook to do, the objection can be sustained on the ground of invalidity of the resolution. The vital question then is whether the three members constituted a quorum.

As the charter provision respecting a quorum is general, simply saying a majority of the commissioners shall be necessary to form a quorum (Acts 1915, § 15), the presence of three sufficed, if the commission was then composed of only five members. State v. Huggins, Harp. (S. C.) 139; Coles v. Williamsburgh, 10 Wend. (N. Y.) 659; State v. Wilkesville Tp., 20 Ohio St. 288; 29 Cyc. 1688. Otherwise it did not. If removal of Commissioner Sammons from the city and the state ipso facto put an end to his membership of the tribunal, it consisted of only five members at the date of the meeting, but, if it did not so terminate his membership, and action of the commission was necessary to its termination upon that ground, the commission then consisted of six members, and attendance of four was required for a quorum.

[4, 5] In the absence of positive legal provisions indicative of intention to adopt a different rule on the subject, a vacancy in office occurs by: (1) Expiration of the term; or (2) death of the incumbent; or (3) his resignation; or (4) his removal from office. McQuillin, Mun. Cor. § 478. This author adds two more, abolition of the office and disqualification of the incumbent to hold it. The first of these two is an impossibility. There can be no vacancy in a nonexistent office. The other is disqualification by express legislation. People v. Highland Park, 88 Mich. 653, 50 N. W. 660; People v. Morrell, 21 Wend. (N. Y.) 575. Likely Judge Christian thought a vacancy occasioned by death of the incumbent was too apparent for mention when he said in the Bland and Giles County Judge Case, 33 Grat. (Va.) 443, that—

“An office is determined proprio vigore by resignation, expiration of term, and removal by competent authority. But in other cases the office is not determined ipso facto by the occurrence of the cause. There must be a judgment of a motion after a judicial ascertainment of the fact.”

This language is partially quoted with approval in Johnson v. Mann et al., 77 Va. 265, 270.

In parliamentary law, which governs in cases of the class to which this one belongs, an office is vacated by refusal of the elected member to accept it, communicated to the proper authorities; refusal to qualify; resignation; and death. In all other instances, such as expulsion, adjudication of a controverted election, disqualification by act of the party, and acceptance of an incompatible office, ascertainment of the fact and declaration of the existence of the vacancy are necessary. Cush. L. & Pr. Leg. Assemblies, §§ 471 to 478, inclusive. Application of this rule to the case now under consideration harmonizes with our decisions in those cases in which persons elected to municipal offices are alleged to be ineligible. They are admitted, subject to inquiry and determination of the question of their eligibility. Price v. Fitzpatrick, 85 W. Va. 76, 100 S. E. 872; Tru- nick v. Town of Northview, 80 W. Va. 9, 91 S. E. 1081. As to the fact of disqualification by removal from the subdivision in which an officer holds his position, he is entitled to be heard, if he desires a hearing. He must have notice, if it can be conveniently given, and be allowed his "day in court," and he cannot be deemed to be out unless nor until he shall have had these privileges.

Upon these principles and conclusions, the writ asked for was awarded.

WOOD & BROOKS CO. v. D. E. HEWITT LUMBER CO. (No. 4297.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Oct. 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Sales §23(3)—Written offer to purchase lumber does not become contract until accepted.

An offer in writing to purchase lumber to be manufactured and delivered by the offeree, not signed by him, does not become a contract until he accepts it.

2. Sales §23(3)—Acceptance need not be actual, but is inferable from conduct.

Acceptance to enlarge such an offer into a contract need not be actual; it may be inferred from the acts and conduct of the offeree in respect thereof.

3. Sales §23(3)—Shipment of lumber pursuant to offer held acceptance.

A partial and reasonably prompt shipment by the offeree of more than half of the quantity and quality of lumber purchased for delivery, and delivered to and accepted by the offeror, pursuant to the terms and conditions of the offer, amounts to an acceptance by the offeree.

4. Frauds, statute of §129(2)—Performance of part of offer of sale held not sufficient to obviate inhibition of statute.

Performance in part of an offer to purchase lumber to be manufactured and delivered by the offeree as required by the offer, when not signed by the offeree, is not sufficient to obviate the inhibition of the statute of frauds (clause 7, § 1, c. 98, Code 1913 [sec. 4171, cl. 7]).

5. Frauds, statute of §45(2)—Contract in writing not signed as required not inhibited unless it appears therefrom that it does not admit of performance within year.

Clause 7, § 1, c. 98, Code 1913 (sec. 4171, cl. 7), does not inhibit an action based on a breach of a contract in writing, not signed by defendant, as therein specified, unless it should appear from the terms and conditions thereof that the contract does not admit of performance within a year from its date.

6. Frauds, statute of §44(4)—Written offer to purchase lumber held not within statute.

Where a written offer bearing date in October, to purchase lumber of a prescribed quantity and quality to be manufactured by the offeree in the ensuing winter months for delivery during the following summer, it is not within the inhibition of clause 7 of section 1 of the statute of frauds, chapter 98, Code 1913 (sec. 4171, cl. 7).

7. Sales §416(2)—Evidence of acquiescence in delay held competent in action for breach.

Where a contract for the purchase of lumber to be manufactured and delivered by defendant within the time and upon the terms and conditions therein specified is breached by him a few years after the expiration of the time limit, each of the parties thereto acquiescing in the delay during such period, the statutory limitation not applying; and plaintiff, though diligent, was unable to purchase lumber of the kind and character prescribed in the contract within the year the breach occurred, for delivery that year, but could and did purchase it for delivery the next year, the evidence showing the facts to be as stated was competent and justifiable.

8. Frauds, statute of §48—Postponement of completion acquiesced in does not prevent plaintiff's suing for breach, where full performance within year was possible.

Postponement of the completion of a contract concurred and acquiesced in by the parties thereto does not affect the right of the plaintiff to sue for its breach, where full performance within a year from its date was possible, and the parties contemplated compliance within that time.

9. Continuance §30—Defendant's motion because of amendment of declaration was properly rejected where not showing how he might be prejudiced.

A motion for a continuance, predicated upon an amendment of a declaration to admit proof introduced by plaintiff during the early stages of the trial, properly is rejected where defendant, although objecting to the amendment, proceeds with the trial without showing in what respect, if at all, he is likely to be prejudiced by a continuation of the trial thus begun.

10. Contracts §29—Where evidence is conflicting as to existence of contract, question is for jury.

Where plaintiff affirms and defendant denies the existence of a contract binding upon both of them, and each introduces evidence upon that phase of the controversy, consisting of letters and acts and conduct of the parties pertaining thereto, thereby producing a conflict, the question of the existence of such contract is for the jury to determine, and an instruction submitting that question to them for determination is not erroneous when properly prepared.

Error to Circuit Court, Cabell County.

Action by Wood & Brooks Company against D. E. Hewitt Lumber Company. Verdict for plaintiff set aside, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed, verdict reinstated, and judgment entered on the verdict for plaintiff.

L. L. Willson and Geo. S. Wallace, both of Huntington, for plaintiff in error.

Fitzpatrick, Campbell, Brown & Davis, of Huntington, for defendant in error.

LYNOH, J. The trial court set aside a verdict for plaintiff in an action for damages for a breach of an alleged contract, in the form of an order, for the sale and delivery of lumber, the order being as follows:

Wood & Brooks Co., Ontario St., Buffalo, N. Y.

Oct. 18, 1915.

D. E. Hewitt Lumber Co., Huntington, W. Va.:

Please enter our order for the following:

Ship: N. Y., C. & St. L.

Via: Ship to Black Rock station, Buffalo, N. Y.

500,000 feet 5/4 basswood, white No. 1 common and better, all white one face 80% white the other, suitable for piano keys, subject to our inspection at point of shipment.

Price $39.00 delivered Buffalo 2% cash 10 days from receipt of car. 1916 delivery.

If you cannot deliver as ordered, please advise us immediately.

Wood & Brooks Company, Per N. R. Luther.

[1, 2] Defendant below and in error neither signed nor formally accepted the order, and for these and other reasons denies liability on the grounds that if the order be a contract it does not on its face require performance within a year from its date, wherefore it is void under section 1, clause 7, chapter 98, Code (sec. 4171). The order considered apart from the correspondence between the parties to the action, and their acts and conduct respecting the transaction, may be subject to the criticism urged against it. While it requires delivery in 1916, the requirement could have been fulfilled after October 18 of that year. But the correspondence throws light upon the intent of the parties as to the order.

It is an offer to purchase basswood timber, and if accepted directly or inferentially it becomes a binding contract to deliver the timber called for, whether signed or not signed by the offeree. If viewed in the light of the subsequent correspondence, the acts of the parties, and the usages and customs of business of that character there is disclosed an intention on the part of each of them to comply with its terms. If the contract could have been performed within a year from its date, it is not within the terms of the statute.

[5] Decisions construing the statute show a tendency to limit its application to contracts which cannot by a reasonable and fair interpretation admit of performance within a year (Franklin Sugar Co. v. Taylor, 37 Kan. 435, 15 Pac. 586; cases cited 25 R. O. L. 454), or in which it affirmatively appears that performance cannot be had within that time (Walker v. Johnson, 96 U. S. 424, 24

L. Ed. 834). Our authorities sustain and strengthen this view:

"An oral contract which may, in any possible event, be fully performed according to its terms within a year, is not within clause 7 of the state of frauds" (McClanahan v. Otto-Marmet Coal & Mining Co., 74 W. Va. 543, 82 S. E. 752), and, "A verbal contract the terms of which do not expressly provide for performance beyond a year or by fair and reasonable construction contain anything inconsistent with complete performance within that time, is not within the statute of frauds" (Reckley v. Zenn, 74 W. Va. 43, 81 S. E. 565).

[8] As plaintiff's letter of October 18, 1915, that also being the date of the order, contains nothing which indicates that more than a year is to be required for completing the contract, and as A. M. Hewitt, the secretary and treasurer of the defendant company, admits that the quantity of lumber to be furnished was a small order, or, as he says, not more than 6 per cent. of the annual capacity of the defendant's plant, and that the quantity could have been cut and shipped before the summer of 1916, the contract could not be considered as one necessitating more than a year for its performance.

The fact that because of a series of delays, more or less willingly acquiesced in by plaintiff, the deliveries were as a matter of fact continued for more than a year is immaterial; it is the fact that the contract could have been performed within the necessary 12 months that carries the contract without the statute. Ford Lbr. & Mfg. Co. v. Cobb, 138 Ky. 174, 127 S. W. 763; Van Woert v. Albany & S. R. Co., 67 N. Y. 538; Reynick v. Allington & Curtis Mfg. Co., 179 Mich. 630, 146 N. W. 252. Nor does the statute apply to an obligation not in writing to pay money, though payment is not to be made within one year. Rake's Adm'r v. Pope, 7 Ala. 161; Reed v. Gold, 102 Va. 37, 45 S. E. 868; Hodgens v. Shultz, 92 Ill. App. 84; Dant v. Head, 90 Ky. 255, 13 S. W. 1073, 29 Am. St. Rep. 369.

It is urged by defendant that the parties by the order and correspondence manifested an intention to extend performance over a time exceeding the statutory period. Neither the offer nor defendant's letters warrant such construction, as the former, construed in connection with the acts of defendant, rather evince a purpose to consummate the sale within the 12 months. In fact Mr. Hewitt in his letter of September 7, 1916, admits that such was his intention, but this feature we regard as indecisive. "Intention or expectation of the parties is immaterial." McClanahan v. Otto-Marmet Coal & Mining Co., cited. All the cases cited by defendant to sustain its contention seem to involve contracts which on their face have their performance postponed beyond a year. Such contracts are of course within the statute. 3 Minor's Inst. (2d Ed.) 196.

That the sufficiency of the memorandum may be gathered from letters and writings and not from parol evidence is well settled. Rahm v. Klerner & Sons, 99 Va. 10, 37 S. E. 292, but it is equally true that an offer in the form of a letter and an acceptance in like form may, if each refers to the same subject, be sufficient to constitute the writing called for by the statute. 2 Page, Contracts, § 1321; Smith, Law of Frauds, p. 586. In defendant's letter last referred to, written some three months after the first of several shipments of timber in June, 1916, pursuant to the order, appears the following clause: "When we took this order for 500,000 feet, we expected to cut that much this year." This letter, properly signed by defendant, is strongly suggestive of a completed memorandum.

[4] Defendant's statement that part performance does not take a contract out of the statute seems quite correct, the law on that point being very well presented in a monographic note appended to Diamond v. Jacquith, L. R. A. 1916D, 880, at 886, as follows:

"The rule that part performance will prevent the operation of the statute so far as performance has gone can, by the nature of things, have no application to actions for the breach of contract. In such actions recovery is based, not upon what has been done under the contract, but upon the loss accruing from what has not been done. Therefore, even in jurisdictions which have adopted that rule, there can be found no ground upon which to base a right of recovery for the breach of a contract not to be performed within a year."

Many cases are there cited in support of this rule. But the principle thus stated has no application here, because plaintiff has not found it necessary to rely, and has not relied upon part performance as taking the case out of the express provisions of the statute. Performance in part only re-enforces the conclusion predicated upon writings passed between the parties touching the matter out of which the litigation has arisen.

[3] The proposal was to buy basswood timber for 1916 delivery, and as such it was a valid offer to purchase, and the acts of defendant in cutting and shipping part of the timber, viewed in the light furnished by the written correspondence, constituted an effective acceptance or ratification of the offer. They thereby satisfied the requirements of the statute, and defendant is liable for any loss sustained by plaintiff by noncompliance with its terms.

One contention of defendant is (page 11, brief) that no contract was ever consummated, and that any subsequent shipments of timber were by virtue of later understandings. This argument is founded upon the theory that an offer to ripen into a contract must be accepted within the time specified, and if no time is specified, then within a reasonable time, with the further contention that the offer was not accepted within a reasonable time, and that, its acceptance having been delayed indefinitely, there could be no assent to its terms and no agreement to perform its obligations. So far as defendant's exposition of the law is concerned it seems correct. Hanly v. Watterson, 39 W. Va. 214, 19 S. E. 536; 1 Page, Contracts, § 139, cases cited, note 5. In the application of these principles, however, defendant appears to stress too heavily the failure on his own part to immediately notify plaintiff of his assent to the offer. While there has been some practical difficulty in applying the doctrine, courts have generally, though not universally, held that an offer to buy becomes a binding agreement when the offeree performs an act from which acceptance may be implied. 35 Cyc. 52; Colgin v. Hanly, 6 Leigh (Va.) 85. It follows, therefore, that since plaintiff's offer prescribed no specific form of acceptance, it may be implied from conduct as well as from words. 1 Page, Contracts, § 188; Clark, Contracts, p. 24.

The record shows that defendant notified plaintiff by letter, dated April 3, 1916, that 12 cars of basswood were ready for shipment, and desired that the inspector, Mr. Pratt, be sent down from Buffalo to pass upon its quality. As plaintiff did not want the wood so early in the season, the inspector was not sent at once, for which reason the first car was not shipped until June 14, between which time and June 24 9 cars, containing 160,490 feet of timber, were delivered to the carrier and later accepted by plaintiff. Such unqualified act on the part of defendant was surely sufficient to indicate to plaintiff an intent to perform the contract according to its terms. The law is settled that the shipment of a part of an order of goods is an acceptance of the whole order. 1 Page, Contracts, § 156; Monarch Portland Cement Co. v. Creedon, 94 Neb. 185, 142 N. W. 906. It was shown in the proof that it is customary to cut the timber in the winter when there is no sap in the trees, and ship the lumber in the following summer. That such was the custom defendant knew, and plaintiff relied on it, as appears by the letter of April 7, 1916, in which it is stated:

"We shall not accept any basswood from any one until the month of June, which is none too late for it to have dried out properly for shipment."

Shipments prior to the spring or early summer of 1916 would seem, under such circumstances and usage, to have been unusual and unwarranted. It seems, therefore, that the shipments made, even without any notice to the buyer, are, to say the least, strongly indicative of an intention to effectuate a valid acceptance of the offer. 35 Cyc. 55, cases cited. As stated in Page, Contracts, § 156, decisions which reach different results are generally founded on differences in the wording of the orders, trade usages, or other circumstances not present here.

There is an additional circumstance to be considered in this connection which strengthens plaintiff's position, and that is the statement in its letter of October 18, 1915, as follows:

"If you cannot deliver as ordered, please advise us immediately."

While it is a general rule of law that acceptance may not be inferred from mere silence, such silence under some circumstances may be taken as some evidence of assent. Particularly is this true in case the offer states that acceptance will be assumed in case there is no reply. While plaintiff's request for a reply in case delivery was impossible does not say that acceptance would be assumed, it is possible that defendant may have regarded it in that light. In view of this circumstance, the former dealings between the parties, the custom of the trade to deliver no basswood during the winter months, it was reasonable that plaintiff should have recognized that defendant's silence might possibly have meant an assent. On this subject see Williston, Contracts, § 91A.

At any rate, it is apparent that plaintiff, when accepting the timber shipped, regarded the offer as in force, and that, according to a recent English decision (1913), is evidence upon the question. Morrell v. Studd & Millington, 2 Ch. Div. 648.

Plaintiff's right to recover for the loss sustained because of defendant's failure to deliver lumber of the character described in the order, and at the time and place therein specified, is strengthened further and in effect conclusively by the admission of both plaintiff and defendant that they intended the order to be filled within a year from its date, and that it could have been filled within that time. Such being their intentions with respect to performance, defendant's ability to perform within a year, and its performance in part within that time, considered in connection with all the facts and circumstances developed by the proof, including the correspondence, put the contract beyond the operation of the statute.

Defendant professes to perceive serious error in the jury's assessment of damages carried into the verdict. As the position so taken involves various aspects of the facts presented, a further view of the record is necessary.

[7, 8] Plaintiff's original offer contemplated prompt delivery of the basswood lumber. As a matter of fact, only 160,490 feet were shipped in 1916, and by letter dated September 7, of that year, Mr. Hewitt advised plaintiff that, although he had expected to cut the full 500,000 feet "this year," labor troubles had so far retarded the progress of defendant's work that it had been impossible to reach that boundary of timber wherein defendant's basswood was located. This explanation he followed by a reminder that basswood had advanced several dollars in price, and concluded:

"We hope you will not compel us to furnish stock next year at these old prices on the last year's contract."

On September 19, plaintiff replied, denying a charge of defendant that they were paying higher prices to other people for basswood, expressing some dissatisfaction that defendant had not shipped a larger quantity during the year, and insisting upon completed performance during 1917. Defendant answered:

"We will let the order stand as it is and cut all the 5/4 basswood we possibly can on your order."

These letters are the best evidence of the understanding of the parties in regard to the contract during 1917. True, several letters were exchanged in January, but those of the plaintiff merely expressed disappointment at defendant's failure to give more definite information as to the amount of lumber of the kind ordered plaintiff might expect during the year, and those of defendant explained the impossibility of forecasting the quantity accurately. The letters of March and April dealt principally with the details of shipment of the 1917 deliveries and the dispatching of Mr. Pratt to inspect the lumber, preparatory to its shipment. Defendant's letter of July 3, however, besides advising plaintiff that 4 cars were ready for shipment, added, "This will be all we will have this year." Plaintiff's reply of July 6 again expressed disappointment at the small quantity shipped, and concluded:

"Perhaps you are planning to cut it in the coming season instead. Will you please advise us immediately concerning this?"

Defendant, in answering this letter three days later, ignored this inquiry, and nothing further passed between the parties as to the continuance of the contract until April 6, 1918, when plaintiff wrote, asking when defendant desired Mr. Pratt to inspect the lumber and how much of it would be shipped during the season. Defendant replied on April 18, just 8 months after the last car was shipped, stating that all lumber was being sold to the government, and that—

"You must realize that we could not ship lumber to-day at prices made in 1915."

This, we believe, was the first intimation plaintiff had that defendant did not contemplate shipping all of the basswood called for in the order. From this time forward plaintiff was at liberty to consider the contract breached by defendant. As appears from the testimony of Mr. Luther, secretary of the plaintiff company, he "immediately got busy and made inquiries at Michigan, Indiana, West Virginia, Virginia, and Wisconsin for quotations on specifications, the same as in this order to the D. E. Hewitt Lumber Company." This effort on his part was fruitless until July, at which time the best market price obtainable was $60 and $62 per thousand, delivered in Buffalo, 1919 delivery. Plaintiff's damage, as found by the jury, was based upon the difference between $39 per thousand, the price named in plaintiff's order, and the quotation of $60 and $62, just referred to. Defendant urges insistently that this was an improper measure of damage: First, because the contract was breached not in April, 1918, but on July 3, 1917, when defendant advised plaintiff that 4 cars would "be all we will have this year"; and, second, because the quotation of $60 and $62 covered, not 1918, but 1919 delivery.

As to defendant's first contention, it is to be noted that by the terms of the original offer all of the basswood was to have been delivered during 1916; only a part was shipped, however, and plaintiff's secretary, though disappointed, acquiesced in the delay. Five cars were shipped during April, 1917, and in July plaintiff received the letter relied upon by defendant as a repudiation of the contract. This letter, properly interpreted, is not sufficient to justify the conclusion insisted upon by defendant. Its plain import is that 4 cars would be all defendant "will have this year." It omitted the excuses or explanations contained in the correspondence of the preceding year, but falls far short of the "unequivocal and absolute" renunciation of the contract which the law requires. Bannister v. Victoria Coal & Coke Co., 63 W. Va. 502, 61 S. E. 338; Elliott, Contracts, § 2032. In view of this circumstance, the evidence introduced by the defendant as to the market value of basswood in 1917 does not affect the issue.

The general statement of the law in regard to damages in cases of this character, as recently set forth by this court, is as follows:

"For breach of contract for the sale of personalty, by nondelivery of the property, the measure of damages ordinarily is the difference between the contract price and the market value of the articles at the time and place specified for delivery." Wilson v. Wiggin, 77 W. Va. 1, 87 S. E. 92 —and where no specific time is fixed for delivery, the market value will be estimated as of the time of the refusal to deliver (Sutherland, Damages [4th Ed.] § 651; 5 Elliott, Contracts, § 5108; Guice v. Crenshaw, 60 Tex. 344; Summers v. Hibbard, 153 Ill. 102, 111, 38 N. E. 899, 46 Am. St. Rep. 872), and the same rule applies where delivery is postponed from time to time (Sedgwick, Dam- ages [9th Ed.] § 737; Roberts v. Benjamin, 124 U. S. 64, 8 Sup. Ct. 393, 31 L. Ed. 334). Defendant contends, however, that although the breach may have occurred in April, 1918, proof of the market value in July for 1919 delivery is not a proper basis for recovery. Such position is without proof to sustain it. While it is quite true that the buyer in such a case must act with promptness in obtaining goods to replace those undelivered (David v. Whitmer & Sons, 46 Pa. Super. Ct. 307), the evidence shows that diligent efforts were made at once to secure quotations on basswood of the character specified in plaintiff's offer, and although inquiries were directed to dealers in several states, plaintiff obtained no definite answers until July, when, according to Luther, the lowest price then obtainable was for 1919 deliveries. Certainly this circumstance in no way prejudices defendant's rights in the controversy. Investigation discloses several cases in which the agreement related to property not to be found in the market, and in such cases it is held that if the course pursued by the purchaser in obtaining other like property was the only way it could be obtained, or was a reasonable or prudent way of obtaining it, the difference between the contract price and the higher cost of the property thus obtained may be recovered by the purchaser as damages naturally arising from the breach itself. Sutherland, Damages (4th Ed.) § 652, cases cited. In our judgment plaintiff's conduct fully satisfied this test, and we find no error in the damages as found by the jury.

[8] The refusal to grant defendant a continuance after plaintiff was permitted to amend the first count of the declaration during the progress of the trial is complained of. As has been pointed out, plaintiff's theory of the case is that, as plaintiff acquiesced in delays in the fulfillment of the contract, it was extended beyond the time fixed in the original offer. In order to establish this proposition, plaintiff offered as evidence, and filed as exhibits, many letters exchanged between the parties, some of which have been referred to.

Immediately upon their introduction, defendant moved to strike from the evidence any letter after the year 1916, which tended to prove or show any continuation or modification of the contract. The legal foundation for this motion, according to defendant's brief, lay in the fact that the two counts of the declaration alleged the purchase of the lumber specified in the order for 1916 delivery, and that therefore the letters, to whose admission it objected, were foreign to the case. At this point, counsel for the plaintiff asked leave to amend the declaration in order to show that by mutual consent the contract was carried through the years from 1915 to 1918. The leave the court granted, and the declaration accordingly was amended, and to this action defendant excepted, and moved for a continuance upon the ground of lack of preparation on its part to show the market price after 1917, which motion the court overruled, and the defendant again excepted.

Section 8, chapter 131, Code (sec. 4912), authorizes amendments of a pleading when necessary to warrant proof offered and admitted, to the end that substantial justice may be promoted, and to grant a continuance should good cause therefor be made to appear. In the statute there is no language to warrant the statement sometimes expressed that the defendant is entitled to a continuance "as a matter of right," nor do our decisions so hold. Koen v. Fairmont Brewing Co., 69 W. Va. 94, 70 S. E. 1098; Adams v. Adams, 79 W. Va. 546, 92 S. E. 463. These decisions are conclusive that cause satisfactory to the trial court must be shown. As in the Adams Case, the amendment did not affect the merits of the action, nor did the proof thereunder introduce any element in the case which the defendant might not have anticipated under the original declaration, which did not purport to fix the date of the breach. No doubt the same witnesses called in by defendant to prove the market value of basswood during 1917 were as well qualified to testify as to its value during the succeeding year. The necessity of a continuance was not made apparent to the trial court, nor do we see any.

[10] The right of the plaintiff to benefit by the language used in his instruction No. 1 is questioned by defendant on the theory that it submits to the jury the existence of a contract between the parties as of October 18, 1915, when, as the truth is, it was the duty of the court to determine that fact, if fact it was, and for this proposition E. T. Barnum Iron Works v. Prescott Construction Co., 86 W. Va. 173, 102 S. E. 860, is cited. In that case, however, the contract upheld and enforced depended entirely upon the correspondence between the parties, as the opinion shows. Here there were letters, it is true, but they are inconclusive unless they are construed in conjunction with other facts and circumstances found in the record, and as there is some conflict as to their effect upon the issue involved, the jury is the proper body to find a solution for the conflict.

The rule laid down in 13 C. J. 782, also cited in the Iron Works Case, supra, is this:

"But where letters introduced in evidence by plaintiff in proof of the contract sued on do not constitute in themselves a completed contract, but merely negotiations with a view to a contract, as they are supplemented by oral testimony, it is proper to submit to the jury the question whether it was in fact completed,"

—and to support the rule so stated, the author cites Harvard Pub. Co. v. Syndicate

Pub. Co., 94 Fed. 754, 86 C. C. A. 470; Crossley v. Summit Lumber Co., 187 S. W. 118 (Mo. App. 1916); Dougherty v. Briggs, 231 Pa. 68, 79 Atl. 924. These citations sustain the text quoted, and the rule is especially applicable to the question here considered, relating, as it does, to defendant's acceptance or non-acceptance of plaintiff's order; that of course being a question for the jury to settle, as held in each of the cases last cited, and also in Camp v. Wilson, 97 Va. 265, 33 S. E. 591. This instruction, therefore, was not improperly given.

So far as it is incumbent upon us to enter upon a discussion of other instructions requested by plaintiff, it is only necessary to refer to what has been said on the subject in other connections. The order to be entered here, pursuant to this opinion, will be to reverse the judgment of the circuit court, reinstate the verdict, and enter judgment thereon, and award to plaintiff the costs expended by him in that court and here.

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF DISTRICT OF TOWN, RALEIGH COUNTY, v. DUNK-
LEY. (No. 4309.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Oct. 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Landlord and tenant §63(3).—Tenant may not dispute landlord's title without first surrendering possession.

A tenant is not allowed to dispute the title of his landlord without first surrendering possession; and while in possession he may not collude with another, who claims to hold an adverse or hostile title, and thus prejudice the right of possession of his landlord.

2. Landlord and tenant §66(2), 68.—When tenant disclaims under lease or attorns to one other than landlord, his possession becomes tortious and adverse, and landlord may dispossess.

When a tenant disclaims to hold under his lease, and brings notice of that fact to his landlord, then the relation of landlord and tenant ceases, and he becomes a trespasser and his possession is adverse, and the landlord may at once dispossess him. If the tenant claims the fee to be in another, or attorns to another, he must give notice to his landlord, and then his possession becomes tortious and adverse, and the right of entry in the landlord is complete, and he may sue at any time within the period of limitation.

3. Landlord and tenant §65.—Purchaser from landlord succeeds as landlord of tenant holding premises.

A purchaser of land for value on which there is a tenant holding under the vendor succeeds his vendor as landlord of that tenant, unless there is a stipulation to the contrary; and if the tenant desires to repudiate his tenancy and to make his occupancy adverse he must give notice thereof to his new landlord and refuse attornment. If he does not do so, and continues under the lease without such notice and without protest, the relation of landlord and tenant continues and remains unimpaired.

Error to Circuit Court, Raleigh County.

Action by the Board of Education of the District of Town, Raleigh County, against J. W. Dunkley for unlawful detainer. Verdict and judgment in favor of the defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Bumgardner & Preston, Ben H. Ashworth, and David D. Ashworth, all of Beckley, and David Lilly, of Ghent, for plaintiff in error.

C. M. Ward and W. H. File, both of Beckley, for defendant in error.

LIVELY, J. From a verdict and judgment in an action of unlawful detainer in favor of the defendant, plaintiff prosecutes this writ of error.

The controversy arises over possession of one acre of land in or near the city of Beckley, on which is erected a frame dwelling house. It appeared that the Beaver Coal Company deeded this tract of land in the year 1901 to the Beckley Seminary to be used for educational purposes, or as a playground or park in connection with the Beckley Seminary. The Beckley Seminary took possession of the land and caused the brush and some timber to be removed therefrom, and in the year 1905 erected a dwelling house thereon, which dwelling house was occupied by defendant at the time this action was instituted. In the year 1907 the Beckley Seminary conveyed this acre of land to the Christian Women's Board of Missions, a corporation, for educational purposes. A short time thereafter this last grantee erected a building on some land near by which it had purchased from other grantors, and conducted a sectarian school therein until the year 1917. About the year 1915 the Christian Women's Board of Missions employed the defendant as janitor of their school buildings and put him in possession of the house on the lot of land in controversy as its tenant. He was paid a stipulated price per month, including the use of this dwelling house, for his services. In October, 1917, the Christian Women's Board of Missions deeded this one acre of land in controversy to plaintiff, the board of education. According to the testimony of two members of the board of education, they retained the defendant as janitor for their school buildings and permitted him to remain in the dwelling house for about two years after they obtained title to the property. During all this time the board paid the electric light, water, and fuel bills for this house. The payment of these bills by the board is not in dispute. In the early part of the school year of 1919 the school board, before that time having erected a new school building, desired the defendant, Dunkley, to clean up the old Institute building, for which he had previously acted as janitor, and which was near the lot of land in controversy, for the purpose of using the same temporarily until the congestion of pupils terminated, and, through its secretary, Mr. Ashworth, employed Mr. Dunkley to do that service, including janitor service. For this service defendant claimed $75 per month, including rent, and rendered a bill for seven weeks' work, amounting to $131.25, and wrote the board a letter to that effect, saying that this bill was due November 31st, and "I would like to have this as soon as possible, as I need it to settle my bills, and oblige. This statement is true and correct." In the fall of 1919 the board, by its record, directed Mr. Ashworth, its secretary, to notify defendant to vacate the property on January 1, 1920. The secretary testifies that he verbally notified defendant to that effect, and afterwards, about the 26th or 27th of February, 1920, served a written notice on him to vacate the house on or before the 1st of April, following. To collect his account of $131.25 for cleaning and janitor service, defendant sued the board of education, and it appears that his evidence in that suit was taken down by a shorthand reporter. He was asked this question:

"What was your contract with the board of education? A. It was only a verbal contract. They were to pay me $75 per month and give me my rent 12 months a year; the $75 from the time school commenced until it closed. I commenced generally a week before the school commenced to get everything ready, and then a week after school closed cleaning up."

He was then asked:

"Whom did you have that arrangement with? A. With the board of education."

He was also asked:

"Did you pay the board any rent for July, August, or September, 1919? A. No; but I worked the following year over there, all the year, and my rent run from September until September. Q. You mean the previous year? A. Yes; I mean the previous year."

In the trial of this unlawful detainer case the witness Dunkley, the defendant, was confronted with this testimony and asked if he made those statements, and he replied:

"That was the contract I had with the C. W. B. M."

He was asked if he had made that statement in the former trial, and he replied:

"If that is my testimony I suppose I did, but I was mistaken in the people it was made with."

Defendant, to maintain the issue on his part, testified that he had gone into this house in the year 1915 under a contract with an agent of the C. W. B. M., and that a Mr. Howell, who was the last agent of the C. W. B. M., went away to sell the property, and that he was told by Howell that the property would go back to a Mr. T. K. Scott, would revert back to him, and he was instructed to look to Mr. Scott for directions and as his landlord. He testified that he never had any contract with the board of education with reference to renting the dwelling house in controversy, but that he served as janitor for their school buildings in the year 1917 and 1918. He then testified that in the fall of 1919 the board did not intend to have school in the old building, and, not having sufficient room in the new building, the secretary of the board came to him and asked him to clean up the old building, which he did, and acted as janitor in the months of October and November, in all seven weeks, and when he went to the board to get his pay he was told that they would pay him his bill when he moved out of the house, and he was notified to move out of the house by the first of the year—that is, January 1, 1920. He refused to move, and instituted a suit at law to recover his salary for seven weeks, in which suit he gave the foregoing testimony. He testified that he had a verbal contract with T. K. Scott for the premises, and, being asked when this contract was made, he could not remember whether the contract was made before he received the notice on the 25th of February, 1920, to vacate, or not. He was not certain when that contract was made. He testified that he had been paying rent to Scott, but could not remember whether he had paid any rent in February, 1920, or not. He was unable to say who had been paying the water, light, and fuel for the house up to March, 1920. He was asked if he had ever been the tenant of the board, and replied, "Not that I know of." T. K. Scott was examined as a witness for the defendant, and introduced into the evidence a contract which he had made with the Beckley heirs in the year 1908 by which he was to survey out parcels of land which were supposed to belong to the Beckley heirs and which had not been disposed of; if necessary, to institute suits to recover the same, for which he was to receive a one-half interest in all of the lands so secured to the Beckley heirs in that way. If he failed in any of the litigation, he was to pay the costs; if he was successful in such litigation, then the Beckley heirs were to pay one-half the costs, and they were then to execute to him a deed for a one-half interest in all of the lands so surveyed, recovered, and secured to them. Mr. Scott was a surveyor. He also produced a deed which he had executed in the year 1909 to the C. W. B. M., conveying to that organization a one-half undivided interest in a two-acre tract which tract included the one acre in controversy, and which had a clause therein that, if the property which was conveyed ceased to be used by the grantees for educational purposes, that his title, which he was then deeding, should thereby revert to him. He also introduced the record of a suit instituted about the year 1910 or 1911 by the school commissioner against T. K. Scott and others, which was for the purpose, among other things, of declaring as forfeited to the state of West Virginia these two acres of land, one acre of which is the subject of this controversy, for non-entry on the tax books in the name of John Beckley. Such proceedings were had in this suit that in about the year 1913 the court decreed that this land, these two acres, was forfeited to the state for nonentry in the year 1878; that the heirs of John Beckley had the right to redeem within a certain time by paying the amount of back taxes; and that upon their failure to so redeem the land would be sold by a special commissioner, who was appointed for that purpose. At this state of the proceedings the C. W. B. M. filed a petition, claiming that this two-acre tract belonged to them, and making certain allegations with reference thereto which it is unnecessary to set out here, and on that petition an order was entered setting aside the former order giving the Beckley heirs the right to redeem, and enjoining the commissioner from making sale of the land. That proceeding stopped them, so far as this tract of land is concerned. The witness T. K. Scott introduced before the jury a deed dated the 15th day of April, 1920, from the Christian Women's Board of Missions to himself, making a reconveyance to him of the two-acre tract, a one-half interest of which he had deeded to them in the year 1909. He then testified that defendant, Dunkley, was his tenant, and that he had made him such by two written contracts, one executed or written about the 24th day of February, 1920, which was to run until the following September, and that on the last date a new contract had been made which extended the lease to March 1, 1921. It will be observed that this first contract was executed just about the time the notice of the board of education to give possession of the property was served on Dunkley. A motion was made to strike out and exclude from the jury all of the testimony of Scott and the documentary evidence introduced by him, the deeds and school land proceedings, which motion was overruled, and to which ruling plaintiff excepted.

The court seemed to be under the impression that the best title to the land would control the possession thereof, and tried the case on that theory. Three instructions were given for defendant which proceeded upon that theory, all of which were objected to by the plaintiff, and it will only be necessary to refer to one of the instructions to show upon what theory the court proceeded. Instruction No. 2 is as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that, if you believe from the evidence that the Christian Woman's Board of Missions held the land on controversy in this case under a deed from Beaver Coal Company and also under a deed from T. K. Scott, and at the time it reconveyed the land so purchased by it from the said Beaver Coal Company to the board of education of town district, and also at the time it reconveyed the land which had been conveyed to it by T. K. Scott back to the said T. K. Scott, then the right to possession of the said land depends upon the title to the same, and, unless the jury believes that the said plaintiff has proved by a preponderance of evidence that its title is a better title than the title claimed by the defendant, J. W. Dunkley, they will find for the defendant T. K. Scott."

It will be observed that the plaintiff and its predecessors in title had possession and occupancy of this one-acre tract since the year 1901. It is not necessary to say in this proceeding whether its title was good or bad. There is no controversy over the fact that from the year 1915 defendant was the tenant of the Christian's Women's Board. He says so expressly in his testimony. When confronted with his former testimony in the suit to recover for his services rendered in the fall of 1919 as janitor in the old building, in which he had stated that his occupancy was under the board of education, he said again that he had meant to say that his contract was with the C. W. B. M. Being the lessee and tenant of the C. W. B. M. at the time they sold and delivered possession of the property to the board of education in 1917, by operation of law he became the lessee and tenant of the purchaser. At common law this was not true.

[1,2] A tenant neither owed fealty nor rent to the assignee until he had assented to the assignment by attorning to the purchaser. However, to remedy this inconvenient principle of the common law, a statute was passed (4 Anne, c. 16) which made assignments of reversions valid in all cases without attornment. This statute has been held to be effective in the states which have adopted the common law. 24 Cyc. pp. 1173, 1174. Under section 1 of chapter 93 of the Code (sec. 4127) a grantee of any land let to lease shall enjoy against the lessee the like advantage by action or entry for any forfeiture or by action upon any covenant or promise in the lease which the grantor might have enjoyed. The possession is the gist of this controversy, and not the title to the land. It is not material to inquire who has the superior title, Scott or the board. Section 1, c. 89, Code (sec. 4065), expressly says that, if the entry is lawful or peaceable, and the tenant shall retain the possession of the land after his right has expired without the consent of him who is entitled to the possession, the party so turned out of possession, no matter what right or title he had thereto, or the party against whom such possession is unlawfully detained, may within three years after such unlawful detainer sue, etc. It is elementary that the tenant cannot dispute the title of his landlord. In a suit for unlawful detainer against a tenant it is not necessary for the landlord to show any title. An acknowledgment by the tenant that he went into possession under the landlord is sufficient to entitle the landlord to recover the possession. Defendant could not dispute the title of the Christian Women's Board nor will he be permitted to dispute that of its immediate successor, the plaintiff in this case. Stover v. Davis, 57 W. Va. 196, 49 S. E. 1023; Voss v. King, 33 W. Va. 236, 10 S. E. 402; Tiffany, Landlord and Tenant (1910 Ed.) § 209. It is reasonably clear that defendant admitted his tendency by special contract with the board when he testified in the suit to recover his janitor's services, and wherein he rendered his account, including his rent. His claim that in this suit he was talking about a contract he had with the Christian Women's Board does not relieve him for he could not dispute the title in that way. Moreover, Scott had no title to this land in 1917; his title, if it can be called such, was not obtained until the spring of 1920, when the lot was reconveyed to him. He has had no possession, and attempts to get possession by entering into a written contract with Dunkley about the time that the board of education is trying to put Dunkley off. If defendant desired to change his fealty and hunt up another landlord after the board had given him notice verbally or by writing to vacate the premises, it was his duty to first surrender possession to those under whom he had been holding. He cannot render his possession adverse except by a disclaimer and the assertion of an adverse right brought home to his landlord.

"If he takes a secret lease or conveyance for the land from a third party claiming to be the owner, without the knowledge of his landlord, the character of his possession will not be changed. So an adverse claimant who gets into possession of the land by tampering with the tenant cannot resist the landlord's claim where the tenant himself could not." Voss v. King, supra; Harman v. Lambert, 76 W. Va. 370, 85 S. E. 660.

[3] But it is claimed by defendant that Howell, the agent of the Christian Women's Board, told him when the property was sold to plaintiff in 1917 that he should look to Scott. That direction could not avail against the board. It does not appear that any reservation of that kind came to the knowledge of the board, and the possession delivered to the board was the possession of the grantors under which defendant held his tenancy. If defendant then desired to attorn to Scott, it was his duty to so notify the board. He did not do so, nor did he recognize Scott as his landlord, nor pay rent to him until the board had notified him to vacate, when he immediately enters into a written lease from Scott, and begins paying him rent. During all of his tenancy the board paid for water, light, and fuel for the dwelling. Suppose he had made no agreement with the board except to act for it as janitor, and that the two members who testified that his rent was included as a part of his wages were mistaken. The simple fact that he was in the house as a tenant of its grantee when it bought the property and took possession would preclude him from denying the tenancy unless at that time he served notice that he was holding under another landlord. It would be presumed that he was continuing as tenant.

"When a tenant remains in possession after the expiration of his original term, by permission, the implication is that he continues in possession under the conditions of the former demise." Hobbs v. Batory, 88 Md. 68, 37 Atl. 713; Kendall v. Moore, 30 Me. 327; Commissioner v. Clark, 88 N. Y. 251.

If defendant then desired to repudiate his tenancy and assert that he was holding under another landlord, that fact should have been brought home to the board, and then the relation of landlord and tenant would have ceased, and it would have been the duty of the board to evict him within the statutory time. Then his possession during the statutory time (3 years) would have been adverse and tortious. Wild v. Serpell, 10 Grat. 405; Miller v. Williams, 15 Grat. 213; Stover v. Davis, 57 W. Va. 196, 49 S. E. 1023.

There is no evidence, even of an inferential character, in the record that defendant ever repudiated his tenancy under the Christian Women's Board, or under its successor in title, the plaintiff, or ever recognized or proclaimed Scott as his landlord until after the notice to vacate. When he refused possession this suit promptly followed. He will not be allowed to deny the title and possession under which he took his tenancy. It follows that the defense of adverse title in Scott relied upon is not available in this action, and the evidence thereof should have been rejected, and that the instructions based on that defense should have been refused. The judgment is reversed, verdict set aside, and a new trial awarded.

Reversed and remanded.

CUNNINGHAM v. BIRCH RIVER LUMBER CO. et al.. (No. 4203.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Oct. 25, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Justices of the peace §58(3)—Judgment not void for recital that claim was in excess of jurisdictional amount where rendered for less.

A judgment of a justice for less than $300 rendered upon a trial before such justice, in which there was no defense made, will not be held void for lack of jurisdiction because there is a recital that the plaintiff's claim was for an amount in excess of $300. It will be presumed that there were admitted offsets which reduced the claim to the amount for which the judgment was rendered.

2. Evidence §383(3)—Certified transcript is prima facie evidence of judgment.

A transcript of the record of a judgment from the docket of a justice of the peace, certified as provided by law, is prima facie evidence of such judgment in any proceeding where it becomes necessary to prove the same.

3: Evidence §345(2)—Transcript of judgment by other justice must show him successor of one rendering judgment or having lawful custody of docket.

Where the transcript of a justice's judgment is relied upon as proof of the same, and is certified by a justice other than the one who rendered the same, the certificate must show that the justice so signing it is the successor of the one who rendered the judgment, or is the person having lawful custody of his docket, or these facts must appear from some competent evidence in the case.

4. Corporations §517—Corporation's answer should be signed by president with corporate seal affixed.

The answer of a corporation should be signed by its president with its corporate seal affixed.

5. Equity §427(1)—Defendant could rely on denial in answer, although exception to answer should not have been overruled.

Where, in a suit brought to enforce a judgment of a justice, the defendant, a corporation, files an answer denying the existence of such judgment, to the filing of which the plaintiff objects and excepts because the same is not signed by the president of such corporation, and does not have its corporate seal affixed thereto, which objection and exception is overruled and said answer filed, and a decree rendered in favor of the plaintiff establishing the validity of the alleged judgment without competent proof thereof, such decree cannot be upheld upon the ground that the court should have sustained the objection to the filing of said answer, and the exception thereto. The defendant filing such an answer under such circumstances may rely on the denial therein contained.

6. Equity ¶259—On sustaining exception to answer as not properly authenticated, leave should be given to file new answer.

Upon sustaining an exception to an answer because the same is not properly authenticated, leave should be given to file a new answer authenticated in the manner required by law.

7. Judgment ¶866(2)—Judgment not barred so long as right to sue out scire facias to revive same remains.

A judgment is barred by the statute of limitations, and not by the equitable doctrine of laches, and so long as the right to sue out an execution exists, or there is a right to sue out a scire facias to revive the same, the judgment is not barred.

8. Judgment ¶735—Holder of judgment lien subsequent to vendor's lien not barred from asserting judgment against the judgment debtor because not setting up same in suit to enforce vendor's lien.

The holder of a judgment lien upon real estate, subsequent in time to a vendor's lien against the same, will not be barred from asserting such judgment against the judgment debtor because he did not set the same up in a suit to enforce the vendor's lien.

9. Judgment ¶801—Before decreeing sale in creditors' suit, court should ascertain if rents, issues, and profits will not pay lien.

In a lien creditors' suit, before decreeing a sale of the real estate of the defendant debtor, the court should ascertain that the rents, issues, and profits will not pay off the liens against such real estate within five years.

10. Judgment ¶801—In suit to enforce lien any party holding lien may file petition without being made formal party.

In a lien creditor's suit any party holding a lien upon the lands sought to be subjected may file a petition asserting such lien without being made a formal party to such suit, and he may do this for the purpose of showing that an apparent lien in his favor has been discharged.

11. Judgment ¶801—When holder of apparent lien files a pleading in lien creditor's suit averring satisfaction, the court should not dismiss him, but decree satisfaction and provide for release.

When the holder of an apparent lien against real estate, which is sought to be subjected to sale in satisfaction of the liens against it, files a pleading in such suit averring that the lien in his favor has been fully satisfied and discharged, the court should not dismiss such party from the suit, but should decree such lien satisfied and provide for the execution of a release thereof.

12. Justices of the peace ¶131—Judgment not a valid lien prior to docketing in county clerk's office.

A judgment of a justice is not a valid lien upon real estate conveyed by the judgment debtor to a bona fide purchaser prior to the docketing of such judgment in the office of the clerk of the county court in which such real estate lien.

13. Judgment ¶767—Entry of judgment in lien docket in county clerk's office must be sufficiently full and accurate to inform intending purchasers to constitute lien on real estate.

The entry of a judgment upon the judgment lien docket in the office of the clerk of the county court must be sufficiently full and accurate to inform intending purchasers or other interested parties of the facts which it is essential for them to know, and such that a reasonably careful search in the particular quarter indicated will not fail to disclose the judgment.

14. Judgment ¶768(2)—Clerical error in entry of justice court judgment upon county clerk's lien docket will not render it void where furnishing sufficient notice to purchasers.

A clerical error in the entry of a judgment upon the judgment lien docket in the office of the clerk of the county court, showing its rendition upon a date slightly different from the date of its actual rendition, will not render such docket entry void, where it appears that the matter contained in the entry upon the judgment lien docket is sufficient to fully inform an interested party of the facts necessary for his protection.

15. Judgment ¶801—In lien creditors' suit where plaintiff's judgment is the only lien on land, it is proper to decree sale without referring to commissioner to audit liens.

Where, in a lien creditor's suit, it appears that the plaintiff's judgment is the only lien against real estate, and the amount thereof is clearly ascertainable from the proof introduced, it is not error to decree a sale of such real estate in satisfaction of such lien without referring the cause to a commissioner to audit the liens.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Nicholas County.

Suit by Charles Cunningham against the Birch River Lumber Company and others to enforce a lien of a judgment. Decree for the plaintiff, and the defendant lumber company appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Alderson & Breckinridge, of Richwood, for appellant.

G. G. Duff, of Summersville, and R. M. Cavendish, of Sutton, for appellee.

RITZ, P. This suit was brought for the purpose of enforcing the lien of an alleged judgment in favor of the plaintiff against the real estate of the defendant Birch River Lumber Company, and from a decree granting the relief desired this appeal is prosecuted.

The bill as amended alleges that the plaintiff, on the 6th day of June, 1914, obtained a judgment against the defendant Birch River Lumber Company before a justice of the peace of Nicholas county, for the sum of $277.75, with interest and costs, which judgment was duly docketed in the office of the clerk of the county court of that county; that through some inadvertence the docket entry in the county clerk's office indicates that the judgment was rendered on the 4th day of March, 1916, instead of the 6th day of June, 1914; that upon discovering this error in the docket entry plaintiff caused the same to be corrected by docketing another abstract of the judgment in the county clerk's office. The bill also alleges that execution was duly sued out on the judgment in June, 1914, and that the same was returned "no property found"; that the defendant was the owner of the minerals underlying a tract of 1,030 acres of land situate in Nicholas county upon which said judgment became a lien; that it appeared from the records of said county that the grantor of said defendant lumber company had a vendor's lien against the said real estate for a considerable sum of money, which in fact had been entirely paid off and discharged, for which reason said grantor should be required to release the same, and he was accordingly made party defendant to the bill; that the plaintiff's judgment is the only subsisting lien against said real estate. The defendant lumber company demurred to the bill, and upon the demurrer being overruled it filed an answer in which it denied that there was any such judgment as that set up and relied on in plaintiff's bill; that any judgment was ever rendered against it in favor of the plaintiff as described in plaintiff's bill; that process was ever served upon it in any such cause; and that execution had ever been issued and returned not satisfied upon any such judgment. The answer further asserted that even if there was such a judgment, the plaintiff was barred from asserting the same by laches; and, further, that any such question between the plaintiff and the said lumber company was res judicata, by reason of the final determination of another suit in which both the said plaintiff and the said lumber company were parties. The answer further alleged that the lumber company had purchased a tract of land of 1,030 acres from one C. E. Mollohan who had reserved a lien as vendor in the deed conveying the same to the lumber company, and that in a deed made in settlement of the suit above referred to as being a bar to the plaintiff's right to recover, Mollohan agreed, in consideration of the conveyance to him of the surface of the 1,030 acres of land, to pay all of the liens against the same, and asked the court to grant the relief, if the plaintiff was entitled to any, against Mollohan instead of against the defendant. The defendant Mollohan also filed an answer in which he averred that the purchase-money notes secured by the vendor's lien had been transferred by him to sundry parties named in the answer, and that he did not know whether the same had been paid off or not. The answer of the lumber company was excepted to upon the ground that it was not properly executed, not being signed by the president or executed under the seal of the corporation. There was also filed by the plaintiff a special reply to this answer in which he asserted that the judgment relied upon in this suit was not involved in the suit referred to in the lumber company's answer, but was the result of a settlement had between him and the lumber company, by which the amount due him was ascertained to be $277.75, the amount of the judgment, which amount said lumber company agreed to pay, and advised the defendant that it was not necessary that the same be set up in said chancery suit; that the said judgment was obtained by him long after the said chancery suit was instituted, but while the same was pending. It does not appear that the court ever passed upon the exception of the plaintiff to the answer of the defendant lumber company, but treated such answer as sufficient. The defendant lumber company, at the time the final hearing of the cause was requested, moved for a continuance in order that it might have an opportunity to take testimony to support its answer. This motion was denied, and a final decree rendered in which the plaintiff's judgment was ascertained to be a valid and subsisting lien against the mineral interests owned by the defendant lumber company in the 1,030 acres of land; further ascertaining that there were no other liens against said interest for which reason a reference of the cause to a commissioner was unnecessary, and decreeing said interest to sale in satisfaction of said lien unless the same was paid within 30 days from the adjournment of the court.

[1] The defendant in its assignment of errors contends that the circuit court erred in 27 different particulars to its prejudice in the conduct of the cause. It first insists that it was error to overrule its demurrer to the plaintiff's bill as amended. This is based upon the fact that the transcript of the judgment filed as an exhibit with the bill shows that the plaintiff's claim was for $427.76, an amount in excess of the justice's jurisdiction. The transcript does not indicate for what amount the summons was issued. It does show upon its face, however, that the defendant made no appearance to the suit, and that the justice of the peace, after hearing the plaintiff's evidence and trying the case ex parte, found that the plaintiff was entitled to recover $277.75, and rendered judgment for that sum. Can we say that the judgment is void because the plaintiff's claim is said to be for an amount in excess of the justice's jurisdiction? It appears that there was no defense made to the suit, and if plaintiff was really claiming $427.76 we cannot understand why he did not get a judgment for at least $300, the amount of the justice's jurisdiction. There is no direct showing in the record that the suit was brought for more than $300, nor does it appear that the plaintiff claimed that he was entitled to recover more than $277.75. In fact, it may be said that the contrary appears, for that is all that he did recover in a suit to which there was no defense. There is no presumption against the validity of a judgment of a justice of the peace, nor do we think the fact that the record recites that the plaintiff's claim was for $427.76 is enough to show that the justice was without jurisdiction. Undoubtedly there must have been offsets admitted by the plaintiff which reduced it to the amount for which judgment was actually rendered, which must have been for all that the plaintiff claimed upon the hearing.

[2] The defendant lumber company also claims that the court erred in decreeing that the plaintiff had a valid judgment against it, for the reason that there was no competent proof of the same. Of course, the bill alleges that a judgment was rendered, and that the same is a valid and subsisting lien against the real estate of the lumber company, and there is exhibited what purports to be a transcript of this judgment from the docket of the justice of the peace. This allegation of the bill is denied. The answer says that no judgment was ever rendered against the defendant in favor of the plaintiff; that no process was ever served upon the defendant in any such suit; and that no execution was ever issued upon any such judgment and returned, as shown by said transcript. The transcript shows that the summons was returned duly executed, and it further shows that upon the rendition of the judgment an execution was issued and placed in the hands of a constable, and that the same was returned "no property found." If this transcript can be read as evidence in the cause, it shows prima facie that the plaintiff has such a judgment as he sets up and relies upon, which prima facie case might be rebutted as the recitals of a justice's docket are not conclusive. If, however, as contended by the defendant lumber company, the transcript cannot be read as evidence, there is no proof of the allegation of the bill that such a judgment exists, and the same being denied by the answer the plaintiff was not entitled to the decree entered in his favor.

[3] The objection of the defendant to the transcript of the judgment as evidence is based upon the fact that the certificate appended to the transcript purports to be made by one Peter C. Tinney, a justice of the peace of Nicholas county, on the 7th of January, 1919, while the judgment purports to have been rendered by A. M. Lewis, a justice of the peace of said county. The certificate of Tinney does not show that he is the successor of said Lewis as justice of the peace, or that he is the custodian of the docket of said justice of the peace, nor do either of these facts appear from any other evidence in the case. Section 182 of chapter 50 of the Code (sec. 2738) provides that whenever it is necessary to prove a judgment of a justice of the peace, the docket in which it is entered, or a transcript thereof certified by him, or his successor in office, or the person lawfully having the custody of the docket, shall be evidence of the same. There is no showing here that the party who certifies this judgment is the successor of the justice of the peace who rendered it, or is the proper custodian of the docket of said justice of the peace. In the case of Jackson, Wiant & Co. v. Conrad, 14 W. Va. 526, it was held that in order to make such a transcript evidence when certified by another than the justice of the peace who rendered the judgment, such certificate must show that such other was either the successor in office of the justice rendering the judgment, or is the person lawfully having the custody of such docket, or these facts must appear from some competent evidence in the case. In other words, it must be shown that the transcript comes from an authoritative source. Otherwise, it cannot be read as evidence. It follows that the plaintiff has failed to prove by any competent evidence that he in fact has a judgment against the defendant lumber company.

[4, 5] The plaintiff, however, seeks to avoid the effect of this lack of proof because his exception to the answer of the lumber company should have been sustained for the reason that the same was not executed by its president under its corporate seal. This exception was filed to the answer. It does not appear from the record that the court below ever passed upon it. It does appear, however, that he treated the answer as filed, and allowed the plaintiff to file a special reply in writing thereto, from which action it may be said that he in effect overruled the exception. It is quite true that the answer of a corporation should be executed on its behalf by its president, or one of its chief officers under its corporate seal. Teter v. R. R. Co., 35 W. Va. 433, 14 S. E. 146. But can the plaintiff sustain his decree upon this failure of the defendant to so authenticate its answer?

[6] The court below treated the answer as in, and in effect overruled the exception. If he had sustained the exception to the answer, his duty would have been to give the defendant leave to have it properly authenticated, and all we can do now in passing upon this exception is to sustain the same and grant leave to the defendant to file an answer properly authenticated, if he desires to do so. The plaintiff could not be entitled to take a decree pro confesso, unless the defendant refused to tender a further answer after leave given for that purpose. It is similar to those cases where the court below erroneously overrules a demurrer to a pleading and grants relief not justified by the pleading. In such cases we have always held that this court upon reversing the decree granting the relief will give the plaintiff leave to file an amended pleading, instead of rendering a decree in favor of his adversary. Billingsley v. Menear, 44 W. Va. 651, 30 S. E. 61. We are therefore of opinion that the plaintiff's lack of proof to support his judgment cannot be dispensed with upon the theory that the court allowed the defendant to file an answer not properly authenticated. For the purpose of the decree entered by the court below, this answer was in the case.

[7, 8] The defendant also insists that plaintiff's lien is barred by laches. There is nothing in this contention. The lien of a judgment is barred by the statute of limitations, and not by the equitable doctrine of laches, and so long as the right to sue out an execution exists, or there is a right to sue out a scire facias to revive the same, the judgment is not barred. Werdenbaugh v. Reid, 20 W. Va. 588.

There is no more merit in the defendant's contention that the former suit set up and relied upon brought by Cox et al. against the defendant lumber company is res judicata as to the plaintiff's judgment. It is true the bill alleges that that was a general creditors' suit. It further appears, however, from the bill that it was brought to enforce liens for purchase money against the land. There is exhibited with the answer only the decree of reference, and it appears from this decree that the only liens which the commissioner was directed to report upon were the vendor's lien and certain liens claimed by a cross-bill filed in the case for manufacturing the lumber from the land. If this decree of reference is justified by the pleadings, which are not made a part of this record, then it was no more than a suit to enforce the vendor's lien against the land, and the plaintiff was not required to set up his judgment in that case. Of course, if there had been a surplus realized from a sale of the land in the suit brought to enforce the vendor's lien, it may be that the plaintiff here could have asked in that suit to have that surplus applied to the discharge of his subsequent judgment lien, but an arrangement was made by which the vendor's lien was paid off, as well as the costs of the suit, and the suit dismissed without any sale of the subject-matter being had. While the plaintiff, under some circumstances, may have had his judgment lien enforced in that suit, it was not necessary that he do so, and unless it was actually brought into the pleadings the dismissal of that suit would in no wise affect the plaintiff's right to enforce his judgment in this suit. There is nothing in the record here which indicates that the judgment now sought to be enforced was in any wise involved in the suit relied upon as a bar.

[9] It is further contended by the defendant lumber company that it was error for the court below to decree the land to sale in the absence of a finding that the rents, issues, and profits thereof would not pay off the plaintiff's lien and the costs of the suit in five years. There is no averment in the bill that the rents, issues, and profits are not sufficient to discharge the liens within that time, nor is there any finding in the case to that effect. The statute controlling such proceedings requires that this be done, and inasmuch as this case must go back in order that the plaintiff may have an opportunity to prove his judgment by competent evidence, if he desires to do so, this defect can then be remedied.

[10, 11] The action of the court in not determining that the vendor's lien reserved in the deed from Mollohan to the defendant lumber company had been discharged, and in dismissing the holders of the vendors' lien notes from the suit, is assigned as error. It appears that when the defendant Mollohan filed his answer asserting that he had assigned certain of these notes to divers parties, whose names he gave in his answer, the plaintiff was given leave to amend his bill and bring in these holders of the notes as parties to the suit, and the cause was remanded to rules for that purpose. He did sue out process against these parties, but he did not file any amended bill. All of the parties appeared and filed answers asserting that the vendors' lien notes which had been assigned to them had been fully paid off and discharged. Upon this showing the court below did not decree the vendor's lien satisfied, and require or provide for the execution of a release of that lien, but simply dismissed these parties from the suit. In an ordinary chancery suit it is not only necessary to serve process upon a party to make him a defendant in a suit, but there must be some allegation in the bill against him upon which a prayer for relief is predicated, and as stated there is no allegation in the bill against these new parties. But this is a lien creditors' suit, and under the statute any one holding a lien of any kind may come in and file a petition, and in effect be made a party plaintiff, whether he has been theretofore a party to the suit or not. The answers of these several holders of vendors' lien notes may be treated as petitions by them. It appeared at that time that they were the holders of notes secured by a vendor's lien unreleased upon the record, and it was proper for them to come into the case and assert that lien. It would likewise be proper for them to come in and assert that that lien had been discharged. The court should not have dismissed them from the suit, but should have entered a decree upon the showing made by their answers, treated as petitions, that the vendor's lien was discharged, and provided for a release of the same.

The defendant lumber company also insists that it was error for the court not to require the defendant Mollohan to pay any lien which the plaintiff might be found to be entitled to, because of the fact that it conveyed back the surface of this land to Mollohan in consideration that he satisfy certain liens. The defendant contends that he undertook to satisfy all of the liens upon the land at the time in consideration of this reconveyance of the surface to him. The deed reconveying the land to him appears in the record and shows that the only lien he agreed to pay off in consideration of the reconveyance was the vendor's lien. The plaintiff's lien set up in this case does not fall within that class, and there was therefore no error in not decreeing the same against Mollohan upon the showing made.

[12] It is also insisted that it was error not to find that the plaintiff's judgment was a lien upon the whole of the 1,030 acres of land, instead of simply upon the mineral interest of the defendant lumber company. This judgment was not docketed until March 15, 1916. The defendant lumber company reconveyed the surface of the land to Mollohan on the 10th of December, 1915. So far as Mollohan is concerned, as a purchaser of the surface of the land, the judgment was void at the time he made the purchase, and the court did not err in holding that it was a lien only upon the interest that the defendant lumber company owned in the land at the time the judgment was docketed. There is no showing that Mollohan had any actual notice of the judgment at the time he received the conveyance in December, 1915, and even if he did have such notice, the interest conveyed to him would not be liable to be sold to satisfy the lien until the interest retained by his grantor was exhausted.

[13, 14] The defendant also contends that the entry of the judgment in the judgment lien docket in the county clerk's office in June, 1916, was void, for the reason that the judgment was therein described as having been rendered in March, 1916, instead of in March, 1914. Is this error such as to invalidate the entry in the judgment lien docket? It is quite true that the entry in the judgment lien docket must be sufficiently full and accurate to inform intending purchasers or other interested parties of the facts which it is essential for them to know, and such that a reasonably careful search in the particular quarter indicated will not fail to disclose the judgment. 23 Cyc. 1354. Here the only error is the date of the judgment. The names of the parties are correctly given; the name of the justice of the peace before whom the judgment was rendered is correctly given; the amount of it; and all other data which could be of any service to one inquiring as to the validity of the judgment are correctly stated. There can be no doubt that any one examining the judgment lien docket could easily have found this judgment from the data furnished thereby, and we are of opinion that the error in the date of the rendition of the judgment is not of such character as to render void the entry upon the judgment lien docket. The difference in time in the actual rendition of the judgment and the date given as the date of its rendition in the docket entry is not so great but that one instituting an inquiry upon the information contained in the judgment lien docket could easily have located the judgment in the office of the justice of the peace.

[15] It is also insisted that the court erred in decreeing a sale of the land without first referring the cause to a commissioner to ascertain the liens against it. It appears from the court's decree that the plaintiff's judgment is the only valid subsisting lien against the real estate. Where this is the case the court need not make a reference to a commissioner to audit the liens, but may direct a sale of the lands if the pleadings and exhibits show clearly the amount due on the judgment set up in the bill. Howard v. Stephenson, 33 W. Va. 116, 10 S. E. 66.

It follows from what we have said that the decree of the circuit court will be reversed, the exception of the plaintiff to the answer of the defendant lumber company sustained, and the cause remanded, with leave to the said defendant to properly authenticate its answer, if it desires to do so, and for further proceedings to be had in said cause, in accordance with the principles above enunciated.

PENN-ALLEN CEMENT CO., Inc., v. PHILLIPS & SUTHERLAND. (No. 413.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 16, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error \S 122—Fragmentary appeals not entertained.

The Supreme Court will dismiss an appeal from an adjudication that plaintiff recover of defendant a certain amount on two causes of action, and that the cause be retained for trial as to a third cause of action, without passing on a counterclaim.

2. Appeal and error \S 801(4)—Supreme Court may express opinion on merits on dismissal of appeal.

On dismissal of a fragmentary appeal, the Supreme Court may in its discretion express its opinion upon the merits so far as it may be a guide in further proceedings in the court below.

3. Appeal and error \S 916(1)—Matters in answer admitted to be true by judgment on pleadings.

Judgment having been rendered for plaintiff on the pleadings, all that is set up in the answer is, for the purposes of an appeal, admitted to be true.

4. Monopolies \S 23—No recovery on contract by reason of discrimination.

Where seller of cement violated Act Cong. Oct. 15, 1914, \S 2 (U. S. Comp. St. \S 8835b), by discriminating against buyer as to the price, the contract was unlawful, and seller was entitled to recover, if at all, only upon a quantum meruit for cement delivered and accepted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Scotland County; Ray, Judge.

Action by the Penn-Allen Cement Company, Inc., against Phillips & Sutherland. From act of court in adjudging that plaintiff recover certain sums on two causes of action and retaining a third cause for trial, defendants appeal. Appeal dismissed.

This is an action to recover the price of four carloads of cement. There are three causes of action stated in the complaint. On September 17, 1920, the plaintiff shipped the defendants one carload, 231 barrels of cement, at $6.09 per barrel, less freight and war tax, making $1,039.03, which amount was paid to the plaintiff by the defendant. On September 18, 1920, the defendants sent the plaintiff a telegram to ship them two more carloads of 231 barrels each, which were received by the defendants, for which the plaintiff now seeks to recover $2,079.87 in his first cause of action. On September 27, 1920, the plaintiff shipped another carload of cement, which contained 231 barrels, which at the same price amounted to the sum of $1,039.26 and is the plaintiff's second cause of action, and another carload of 289 barrels, which the defendants refused to accept, was the third cause of action. The defendants based their refusal upon the ground that the shipment of 289 barrels was in excess of the 231 barrels which they had ordered, and, further, because they allege that they had ascertained that the plaintiff had discriminated in the price of said cement, in that it had charged the defendants $1.10 per barrel more for said cement than it had charged other purchasers within the United States, in violation of section 2, c. 323, 38 U. S. Statutes which was illegal, and they set up and pleaded as a counterclaim a rebatement of $1.10 on each of the first four carloads, and that by reason of said illegal price and the excessive quantity in the last shipment they had refused to receive the last carload, and pleaded as a counterclaim the $460.09 as freight and war tax paid by them on said last carload.

The defendants also pleaded as a counterclaim threefold damages by reason of the overcharge of $1.10 per barrel on said four carloads, making a total of $2,142.57, and threefold the damages of $28.90 per month from October 15 for storage on the carload refused.

The court adjudged that the plaintiff recover of the defendant $2,079.87, with interest thereon from October 17, 1920, on the first cause of action, two carloads, and the further sum of $1,039.26, with interest from October 27, 1920, on the second cause of action, and retained the cause for trial as to the third cause of action. Appeal by defendants.

Cox & Dunn, of Laurenburg, for appellants.

Walter H. Neal, of Laurenburg, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. [1] The court entered judgment upon the pleadings in favor of the plaintiff upon the first and second causes of action, and "retained the cause for trial as to the third cause of action stated in the complaint," and took no action as to the counterclaim pleaded by the defendants.

This court has uniformly held that it will not entertain fragmentary appeals.

"The court will not entertain appeals brought up in a fragmentary manner. The whole case must come up on appeal. Hines v. Hines, 84 N. C. 122; Comms. v. Satchwell, 88 N. C. 1; White v. Utley, 94 N. C. 511; McGehee v. Tucker, 122 N. C. 186, 29 S. E. 833. An appeal from the ruling upon one of several issues will be dismissed. The trial and appeal must be upon the whole case. Hines v. Hines, 84 N. C. 122; Arrington v. Arrington, 91 N. C. 301."

"The trial of an action should embrace and determine all the matters at issue, so that a final judgment may be entered, and any errors committed may be corrected upon one appeal.

Fragmentary appeals will not be tolerated. Therefore, in an action to recover land, with damages for its detention, where the issue as to the title and right to possession was tried, but the issue as to damages was reserved to be afterwards tried if it should be adjudged that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, the Supreme Court would not entertain an appeal for reviewing alleged errors on the trial of the issue submitted. Hicks v. Gooch, 93 N. C. 112; Rodman v. Calloway, 117 N. C. 13, 23 S. E. 37."

"Fragmentary appeals will not be allowed when the subject-matter could be afterwards considered and error corrected without detriment to the appellant. But this rule does not apply to interlocutory orders, the granting or refusal of which may produce present injury or loss. Davis v. Ely, 100 N. C. 283, 5 S. E. 239; Guilford v. Georgia, 109 N. C. 810, 13 S. E. 861."

The later decisions have all followed this rule, among them, Shelby v. Railroad, 147 N. C. 537, 61 S. E. 377; Moore v. Lumber Co., 150 N. C. 261, 63 S. E. 953; Smith v. Miller, 155 N. C. 242, 71 S. E. 353; Shields v. Freeman, 158 N. C. 123, 73 S. E. 805; Chadwick v. Railroad, 161 N. C. 209, 75 S. E. 852; Walker v. Reeves, 165 N. C. 35, 80 S. E. 885; Chambers v. Railroad, 172 N. C. 555, 90 S. E. 590; Joyner v. Reflector, 176 N. C. 277, 97 S. E. 44; Headman v. Commrs., 177 N. C. 261, 98 S. E. 776, and many other cases besides those disposed of by P. C., the ruling being so well settled.

In Joyner v. Reflector Co., 176 N. C. 277, 97 S. E. 44, Allen, J., said:

"This appeal is premature and must be dismissed, because the order appealed from disposes of only one question of many arising upon the record (Hinton v. Ins. Co., 116 N. C. 222; Richardson v. Express Co., 151 N. C. 61); but upon dismissal, the exceptions, duly taken, are preserved to be passed on upon appeal from the final judgment. Gray v. James, 147 N. C. 141."

The two latest cases probably are Hoke, J., in Lipsitz v. Smith, 178 N. C. 100, 100 S. E. 247, and Thomas v. Carteret, 180 N. C. 111, 104 S. E. 75, where Brown, J., says:

"We are of opinion that this appeal is premature, and under the rules of the court it must be dismissed ex mero motu. It is well settled by numerous decisions that this court will not entertain premature or fragmentary appeals. Cameron v. Bennett, 110 N. C. 277; Milling Co. v. Finley, 110 N. C. 412."

The defendants should have noted their exceptions and have brought up the case when a final judgment was entered. Of course until final judgment was entered no exception could issue, for otherwise the plaintiff might have collected on its judgment while defendants' demand by way of counterclaim was left undetermined. The costs of the appeal will be divided between the parties.

[2] Though the case must go back, the court may in its discretion, as it sometimes has done, express its opinion upon the merits so far as it may be a guide in the next trial. Milling Co. v. Finley, 110 N. C. 412, 15 S. E. 4; State v. Wylde, 110 N. C. 503, 15 S. E. 5, and citations to those two cases in Anno. Ed.

[3, 4] Judgment having been rendered upon the pleadings, all that is set up in the answer is for the purposes of the appeal admitted to be true. United States Compiled Statutes, § 8835b (Act Oct. 15, 1914, ch. 323, § 2) forbids "discrimination in price between purchasers of commodities, where the effect may be to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly," as unlawful, and provides:

"It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, either directly or indirectly to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities," etc.

This shipment was from Penn-Allen, Pa., to the defendants in Scotland county, and the judgment upon the pleadings admits the allegation in the answer for the purposes of this appeal that there was a discrimination and overcharge against the defendants of $1.10 per barrel. The contract was therefore unlawful, and at most the plaintiff was entitled to recover the amount charged, deducting $1.10 per barrel upon the two carloads set out in the first cause of action and on the carload in the second cause of action, for which they are liable, not upon the contract, which is unlawful, but upon a quantum meruit, having accepted the shipment. The judgment rendered upon the pleadings on the first and second causes of action is erroneous and is set aside. This matter will be open to both parties as res nova on the new trial.

As to the third cause of action, the defendants claim that they are not liable both by reason of the carload, 289 barrels, being in excess of the usual carload 231 barrels ordered, and by reason of the $1.10 per barrel excess in price. No judgment having been rendered as to this cause of action, the allegations in the answer are not taken to be true, as in regard to the first and second causes of action, and we have nothing to review.

As to the counterclaim for threefold damages for the cost of the storage of the fifth and last carload and the threefold damages of $2,142.57 by reason of the overcharge of $1.10 per barrel on the other four carloads which the plaintiff claims under the provisions of the United States Compiled Statutes of 1916, section 8829, being section 7 of the Anti-Trust Act of July 2, 1890, the plaintiff contends that the defendants cannot recover the treble damages by counterclaim pleaded in an action to collect the purchase price, but must pay for the goods and bring an independent action in the federal court under Compiled Statutes, § 8835d (Act Oct. 15, 1914, ch. 323, § 4). This matter also has not been passed upon by the court below, and there is nothing for us to consider.

The appeal must be dismissed, and upon the trial of the whole action an appeal will lie from the final judgment upon the whole controversy.

Appeal dismissed.

(182 N. C. 518)

BUILDERS' SASH & DOOR CO. v. JOYNER.
(No. 63.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 16, 1921.)

Estoppel §—44—After-acquired title held not to inure to grantees by way of estoppel as against one having prior registered title.

Where S. and wife mortgaged land owned by them by a deed duly registered, and the wife after foreclosure of the mortgage repurchased the land and conveyed to plaintiff, the title acquired by such repurchase did not inure by way of estoppel to the benefit of one to whom they had previously conveyed, whose deed was registered subsequent to the mortgage as against plaintiff, who had the prior registered title.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nash County; Calvert, Judge.

Action by the Builders' Sash & Door Company against W. D. Joyner for trespass and to remove cloud on title. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The court charged the jury that on the facts in evidence, if accepted by them, they would find for plaintiff.

E. B. Grantham, of Rocky Mount, for appellant.

Battle & Winalow, of Rocky Mount, for appellee.

HOKE, J. The evidence tended to show that on February 27, 1913, Davis conveyed the lot to Jones Smith, and it is not controverted by the parties that under this deed said Jones Smith acquired the true title. For plaintiff it is shown: That on February 28, 1913, Jones Smith and wife, Nellie Smith, conveyed the land to J. B. Ramsey to secure a debt to B. H. Bunn, said deed being duly registered in the county on April 11, 1913; deed of foreclosure, under said deed of trust, to Mrs. Ella B. Ramsey dated December 11, 1914, registered January 9, 1915; third deed of bargain and sale for value from the purchaser, Mrs. Ella Ramsey, to Nellie Smith, dated August 20, 1917, registered August 22, 1917; and a warranty deed from Jones Smith and wife, Nellie, to plaintiffs, dated November 24, 1917, registered January 25, 1918. And for defendant:

First, deed of bargain and sale with covenant warranty from Jones and Nellie Smith, his wife, to William Bullock, dated April 10, 1913, registered March 11, 1914. Second, mortgage deed from William Bullock and wife to J. N. Bone, securing a debt, dated March 10, 1914, registered March 11, 1914; Third, deed from J. N. Bone, mortgagee, to W. D. Joyner, defendant, pursuant to foreclosure under the mortgage deed, dated October 10, 1918, registered February 5, 1917.

There was proof also and without contradiction that plaintiff had acquired its title and paid for same without any actual notice and knowledge of defendant's claim or the deeds upon which it is made to rest.

From this statement it appears that the plaintiff's claim of title rests upon a connected line of deeds beginning under a deed from the true owner, Jones Smith, duly registered in the county on April 11, 1913, that of defendant under deeds beginning by a deed from Jones Smith and wife, with covenants of warranty, registered in the county March 11, 1914, and plaintiff's title from the true owner having the prior registry should prevail in the case unless, as defendant contends, the title of plaintiff's immediate grantor, Nellie Smith, inured to support and validate the deed of bargain and sale made by said Nellie Smith and her husband to William Bullock, which was registered March 11, 1914, and passing the title from Nellie Smith eo instanti, that the same was subsequently acquired under the deed from Ella Ramsey, etc.

This doctrine of title by estoppel, and under which a subsequently acquired title inures to make good a former deed of the grantor, made at a time when such grantor had no title, has been approved and applied in several decisions with us, and is very generally recognized. Hallyburton v. Slagle, 132 N. C. 947, 44 S. E. 655; Wellborn v. Finley, 52 N. C. 228-237; Hagensick v. Castor, 53 Neb. 495, 73 N. W. 932; Van Rensselaer v. Kearney et al., 52 U. S. (11 How.) 297-327, 13 L. Ed. 703; Doe v. Oliver, 2 Smith's Lead. Cas. p. 568. The headnote in this last case thus stating the principle: "The interest when it accrues feeds the estoppel."

Whether this mode of acquiring title shall be regarded as a conveyance taking effect as of the date of the former deed, or as an equitable principle made available under common-law forms as suggested by Mr. Rawle in his valuable work on Covenants, is not a settled position, numerous cases have undoubtedly treated it as a conveyance, but in many of them the position was recognized as necessary to enable the claimant under the former deed to properly protect the estate against the intervening acts of trespassers and others, strangers to the title; but as against purchasers of this title the better doctrine is that this mode of acquiring title rests upon equitable principles and is not available against purchasers who have acquired the legal title for value and without actual notice. Both Mr. Rawle and Mr. Bigelow in their work on Estoppel favor this view (Rawle on Covenants, §§ 259-265; Bigelow on Estoppel, p. 418 et seq.), and the same position is maintained by Judge Hare in his note to Doe v. Oliver, Smith's Lead. Cas., supra.

Whatever may be the weight of judicial decisions on this subject, under general principles, the better considered authorities are agreed that under and by virtue of our registration acts the prior registry shall prevail as against a title of estoppel except as to a purchaser with notice. And in determining this question of notice the decisions hold that a purchaser having the prior registry is not affected with constructive notice by reason of deeds or claims arising against his immediate or other grantor prior to the time when such grantor acquired the title, but the deed or instrument first registered after such acquisition shall confer the better right. Wheeler v. Young, 76 Conn. 44, 55 Atl. 670; Way v. Arnold, 18 Ga. 181-193; Bingham v. Kirkland et al., 84 N. J. Eq. 229; Calder v. Chapman, 52 Pa. 359, 91 Am. Dec. 163; Ford v. Unity Church Society, 120 Mo. 498, 25 S. W. 394, reported also in 23 L. R. A. 561, with an instructive note on the subject, 41 Am. St. Rep. 711; 2 Dev. on Deeds, p. 1332.

In the construction of our registration laws this court has very insistently held that no notice, however full and formal will supply the place of registration. Dye v. Morrison, 181 N. C. 309, 107 S. E. 138; Fertilizer Co. v. Lane, 173 N. C. 184, 91 S. E. 953; Quinnerly v. Quinnerly, 114 N. C. 145, 19 S. E. 99. And under such interpretation there is doubt whether this doctrine of title by estoppel would be allowed to prevail against one holding by a prior registry, whether with or without notice. In the Georgia case heretofore cited (18 Ga. at page 193) Judge Lumpkin gives decided intimation that the doctrine of title by estoppel no longer prevails as against the provision and policy of our registration acts. The question, however, does not arise in this record, as all the evidence is to the effect that the plaintiff, having the prior registered title, acquired the same for full value and without notice of defendant's claim.

Plaintiff contends also that the doctrine of title by estoppel does not apply to a married woman who has joined in a conveyance of her husband's land, though the deed may contain general covenants of warranty, and the wife's interest does not appear on the face of the instrument, and cites authorities which seem to favor this view. 10 R. C. L. p. 741, and cases cited. Under terms of the deed in this case and the broad provisions of our enabling statutes known as the Martin Act (Cons. St. § 2507), the position may be otherwise in this jurisdiction, but we now make no definite ruling on the question, preferring to rest our decision on the right arising to plaintiff by reason of the priority of registration and the purchase without actual notice of defendant's claim.

There is no error, and the judgment for plaintiff is affirmed.

No error.

ALLEN v. GARDNER. (No. 399.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 16, 1921.)

1. Trial \S 165—Plaintiff's evidence alone considered on motion for nonsuit.

The evidence for plaintiff is alone to be considered on a motion for nonsuit.

2. False Imprisonment \S 39—Malice and probable cause held questions for jury.

In an action for false imprisonment brought by a regular in the United States army against the commanding officer of the National Guard engaged in preventing rioting, evidence held to make question for the jury as to whether the imprisonment was without probable cause and malicious; plaintiff's evidence tending to show that no rioting was in progress, and that he was arrested merely because he refused to sleep at the National Guard barracks instead of a hotel.

3. False Imprisonment \S 8—Commanding officer of National Guard liable for sending arrested United States soldier to jail.

If the commanding officer of the National Guard engaged in preventing rioting believed plaintiff, a regular in the United States army, to be a member of his command, he should have sent him to the barracks instead of under guard to the city jail upon his insisting on going to a hotel, instead of to the barracks, to sleep.

4. Militia \S 1—Can act only by authority and in execution of civil power.

The supremacy of civil authorities over the military is at the very basis of our form of government, and the military can act only by authority and in execution of the civil power.

5. Militia \S 19—Soldier liable for acts with or without orders or in excess of orders.

A soldier is responsible for damages for wrongful acts done by him whether with or without orders or in excess of his orders; his being a member of the military giving him no license to do those things which a civilian cannot do.

6. Militia \S 19—Officer arresting person must not use unnecessary force and is liable for oppression or any willful injury.

A military officer may legally arrest a person in given instances, but no more force must be used than is necessary, and, if the power is exercised for purpose of oppression or any injury is willfully done, he will be liable.

7. False Imprisonment ¶40 — Instructions held sufficiently favorable to defendant commanding officer of National Guard.

In an action against officer of National Guard by a regular in the United States army for false imprisonment, instructions held sufficiently favorable to defendant.

8. False Imprisonment ¶40—Instruction on malice properly refused.

In an action for false imprisonment against a commanding officer of the National Guard engaged in preventing rioting, an instruction that plaintiff could not recover unless defendant was moved by personal ill will or malice toward plaintiff was properly refused.

9. Appeal and error ¶927(3)—In reviewing motion for nonsuit only evidence favorable to plaintiff can be considered.

While the jury could consider the evidence favorable to defendant, the court on appeal in reviewing the denial of a nonsuit is privileged to consider only the evidence in favor of plaintiff and with the most favorable inferences from it in his favor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Davidson County; Finley, Judge.

Action by James R. Allen against June T. Gardner. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This was an action for false imprisonment. The plaintiff alleges that he was wrongfully arrested and imprisoned in the city jail of Charlotte under the orders and directions of the defendant, in command of the First Regiment, North Carolina National Guard. The defense was that the defendant was acting under the orders of the Governor to quell a threatened riot in that city, and arrested the plaintiff upon a reasonable apprehension that it was his duty to do so.

The pleadings raised the issue whether the conduct of the defendant was in good faith or was arbitrary and unwarranted. The jury found all the issues against the defendant, who makes no exception except as to the refusal to nonsuit and the refusal to give certain prayers for instruction, which, as the record shows, the court substantially gave. From the verdict and judgment the defendant appealed.

Phillips & Bower, of Lexington, and J. S. Manning, Atty. Gen., for appellant.

P. V. Critcher and J. R. McCrary, both of Lexington, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. [1,2] The evidence for the plaintiff, which alone is to be considered on a motion for nonsuit, was to the effect that the plaintiff was not a member of the defendant's command "the First North Carolina National Guard," but was a regular in the United States army on furlough, whose uniform and hat distinguished him from the members of the National Guard. The evidence also shows that he was a man of good character and went to Charlotte at the invitation of the officers of the Lexington Company to act as a bugler at the 20th of May celebration the next day. He had taken no bedding or other equipment with him, and therefore, not being prepared to sleep in the barracks of the National Guard on the night of the 19th, he was on his way to the hotel, all of which, he testifies, he explained fully and respectfully to the defendant when he was arrested, but avers that the defendant arbitrarily and unjustly, without reasonable cause and without any necessity to prevent a riot and without authority, sent him to jail.

The testimony of plaintiff and his witnesses is that at the time of the plaintiff's arrest and imprisonment and for some time previously the streets had been cleared of both civilians and soldiers with the exception of the guard of soldiers, and at the time of the plaintiff's arrest there was no commotion or disturbance going on anywhere. When the plaintiff was halted by one of the sentinels, he promptly obeyed the command, and when asked where he was going replied that he was a member of the regular army and did not belong to the National Guard, and was going to the hotel to get a bed to sleep on; that Col. Gardner, the defendant, told the plaintiff that "he would have to go back to the barracks." The witnesses testify that the plaintiff in a respectful manner repeated to Col. Gardner the above statement, and stated his object was to find a bed to sleep, whereupon the defendant told him that he would have to respect him, and the plaintiff in a most respectful manner did salute him, but the defendant replied that "He did not give a d—— for his salutes," and in an angry manner told the plaintiff that he "would give him a bed" and ordered the witnesses to take him under arrest and carry him to jail, which was done, and the plaintiff was thrown into the city prison, with the humiliating circumstances of its filth and odors and disorderly inmates, where he was kept confined until the next morning, when he was released, as the defendant claims, on his orders.

[3] If the defendant deemed the plaintiff was a member of his command, he should have been sent back to the barracks, and there is no evidence which justifies his being sent under guard to the city jail, which was a humiliation to a soldier, and which was especially unwarranted as to the plaintiff, who for the purposes of this occasion was a civilian, attending the celebration as the guest of the officers of the Lexington Company.

The evidence of all these witnesses, with slight contradiction from the defendant's witnesses, was that the manner and conduct of the plaintiff was calm, quiet, respectful, and inoffensive, and that the conduct of the defendant was angry, offensive, arbitrary, and without reason or necessity, and that the plaintiff disobeyed no order of the defendant, and that his arrest and imprisonment was unnecessary to preserve the peace and order of the city, in order to prevent any further trouble, if there had been any prior trouble worthy of mention, which the record does not disclose. The witnesses testify to seeing only one man apparently hurt, and the plaintiff, when arrested, knew nothing of any riot or disturbance having occurred.

On the motion to nonsuit the evidence for plaintiff must be taken as true. The jury upon the issues submitted found that the arrest and imprisonment was without probable cause and was malicious.

[4] With every allowance for the excitement and confusion, and the possible misunderstanding of the situation, there was evidence properly submitted to the jury upon which they found their verdict. The supremacy of the civil authorities over the military is at the very basis of our republican form of government, both state and federal, and the military can act only by authority and in execution of the civil power.

"A member of the state militia, whether a private or an officer, in active service, is not relieved from civil liability, for his acts while so engaged, on the ground that he acted in obedience to orders received through the regular military channels." Frank v. Smith, 25 A. & E. 319, and notes.

[5, 6] A soldier is responsible for damages for wrongful acts done by him, whether with or without orders or in excess of his orders. His being a member of the military does not give him license to do those things which a civilian cannot do. A military officer may legally arrest a person in given instances, but no more force must be used than is necessary, and, if the power is exercised for the purpose of oppression or any injury is willfully done, he will be answerable. 18 R. C. L. 1082.

[7] The requirement of reasonable good faith and probable cause and the evidence tending to show arbitrary and oppressive use of authority by the defendant are fully and correctly set out in the judge's charge, who instructed the jury that, if the plaintiff refused to go to barracks when there was danger of the renewal of a riot, or if the defendant had reasonable ground to believe that the plaintiff's going up the street in uniform might excite the negroes, or tend to bring on a renewal of the trouble, they should answer the second issue as to probable cause in favor of the defendant.

The court further charged the jury that under the circumstances the defendant's conduct should not be weighed in golden scales, and if he acted in good faith and under good reasons, the jury should answer the issue in his favor.

The court further charged the jury that, if the plaintiff went with the soldiers to Charlotte as their guest, he was under obligation to abide the military rules and regulations and render obedience to the officers of the militia, and had no right to resist any lawful command of the defendant, who had a right to prevent the plaintiff from going up town if there was reason to apprehend that it might cause trouble between the whites and blacks. Indeed, the larger part of the charge was the statement of the contentions for the defendant and giving at length substantially the instructions asked by his attorneys. These were as favorable as he could expect, if not indeed in some respects too much so.

[8, 9] The court properly refused to give the prayer that the plaintiff could not recover unless the defendant was moved by personal ill will or malice towards the plaintiff. While the jury could consider the evidence that tended more favorably towards the defendant, as already stated, the court on appeal is privileged to consider on the motion to nonsuit only the evidence in favor of the plaintiff and with the most favorable inferences from it in his favor.

The facts have been found by the jury upon evidence that, if believed, justified their findings, and without any erroneous statement of the law prejudicial to the defendant. No error.

ANDERSON V. TOWN OF ALBEMARLE. (No. 412.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 16, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error \S 1046(3)—Where verdict was directed at close of all the evidence, appellant may not complain that he was compelled to open.

In proceedings to levy assessment on property for street improvement where the verdict was directed at the close of all the evidence, appellant may not complain that the burden of proof was put on him by requiring him to open the case.

2. Municipal corporations \S 484(1)—Party attacking assessment roll for street improvements has burden of proof.

The assessment for street improvements is prima facie evidence of a valid assessment and of the regularity and correctness of all prior proceedings, and one attacking its validity has the burden of proof.

3. Municipal corporations \S 484(3)—Exclusion of testimony by property owner that his property was not benefited held correct.

In proceedings to levy an assessment upon property for street improvements, exclusion of testimony of the property owner that his property was not benefited was correct.

4. Municipal corporations \S 484(2)—Determination of governing board as to what lands would be benefited by improvements is conclusive.

The question of benefits by street improvements is one of fact, and the governing board of a municipality under legislative authority is vested with the power to determine what lands will be benefited, and their determination is conclusive upon the owner, except in rare cases.

5. Municipal corporations \S 508(1)—Assessments for improvements according to benefit reviewable on appeal.

The assessment to each property owner for street improvements by apportionment according to benefits is subject to review by appeal.

6. Municipal corporations \S 429—Paving of entire width of street not necessary in order to assess abutting property for improvements.

Under Pub. Laws 1915, c. 56, § 13, authorizing an assessment to be made against property abutting on the street, section 5, requiring petition for improvements to be signed by a majority of the owners of the lots abutting upon the street or streets, or part of a street proposed to be improved, section 6, requiring that the proportion of the costs be assessed upon abutting property, and section 8, providing that one-half of the cost of improvements shall be assessed on lots abutting directly on the improvements, it is sufficient if the property assessed adjoins the street improved, and is not necessary that the paving for which the assessment is made extend the entire width of the street.

7. Municipal corporations \S 429—"Abutting on the improvement"; "abutting property" defined.

"Abutting on the improvement" means abutting on the street that is improved, and this does not require that the pavement shall extend the entire width of the street. By the term "abutting property" is meant that between which and the improvement there is no intervening land.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Abutting.]

8. Municipal corporations \S 429—To be assessable for street improvements land need not abut directly on street.

Land need not necessarily abut directly on the part of the street that has been improved to subject it to liability for its share of the cost of the improvement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanly County; Bryson, Judge.

Proceedings by the Town of Albemarle to assess property for street improvements. From assessments on property of J. N. Anderson, he filed exceptions and appealed from the commissioners to the superior court, and from judgment for the town, said Anderson appeals. No error.

The commissioners of Albemarle, under authority of chapter 56, Pub. Laws 1915, assessed against the plaintiff for improvements on the street in front of his lot on North street the sum of $207.05. He filed exceptions and appealed. In the superior court the court instructed the jury, if they believed the evidence, to answer the issue $207.05 with interest, and the plaintiff appealed to this court.

Raper & Raper, of Lexington, and R. L. Brown, of Albemarle, for appellant.

R. L. Smith & Son, of Albemarle, and Manly, Hendren & Womble, of Winston-Salem, for appellee.

OLARK, C. J. [1] The plaintiff excepted and assigned as error that the court refused to require the defendant to open the case and thereby required him to take the burden of proof. Since at the close of all the evidence the court directed the verdict, it could make little difference upon whom the burden of proof was placed.

[2] The assessment had been made by the commissioners under chapter 56, Laws 1915, and it had been reviewed and approved by them on exceptions filed by the plaintiff. The assessment roll is prima facie evidence of a valid assessment, and of the regularity and correctness of all prior proceedings. McQuillin, Mun. Corp. § 2117, which he says is based upon the general maxim that public officers are presumed to have acted rightly until it is otherwise made to appear. In the absence of any showing to the contrary, assessments are presumed valid, and he who attacks their validity has the burden of establishing by competent evidence the contrary. Justice v. Asheville, 161 N. C. 62, 76 S. E. 822.

[3] The second exception is to the refusal of the court to allow the plaintiff to testify that the work done on the street did not in any manner benefit his property or enhance its value. It is not open to the property owner to say that the improvement is not a benefit to the property. Doubtless, if the owner's opinion on this point was to govern, there would be few streets or sidewalks improved in their entire length.

[4] The question of benefit is one of fact, and the governing board of a municipality under legislative authority is vested with the power to determine what lands will be benefited by the improvements, and their determination is conclusive upon the owner of the ground charged with the costs of the improvements, except in rare cases. Felmet v. Canton, 177 N. C. 52, 97 S. E. 728; Justice v. Asheville, 161 N. C. 62, 76 S. E. 822; Tarboro v. Staton, 156 N. C. 504, 72 S. E. 577.

[5] There are several methods of apportioning the costs of improvements, but there are two which are generally recognized—I. e., apportionment according to benefits and apportionment according to frontage—but the liability of the land to assessment is determined by the municipality under the authority of the Legislature. The assessment to each owner when the apportionment is according to benefit is subject to review by appeal.

This matter is fully discussed 25 R. O. L. at page 138, and the general principles applicable on the question of assessment of benefit is discussed 25 R. O. L. 160. The general principles of apportionment when made, as in this case, according to frontage are set forth 25 R. O. L. 144 et seq.

[6] The plaintiff excepted to the action of the court in directing the jury to answer the issue in favor of the town upon these grounds:

(1) The petition does not sufficiently describe the local improvement to be undertaken. An examination of the record shows, in our judgment, an entirely sufficient description of the improvements to be undertaken.

(2) The second objection is that the order of the board prescribed that the street should be "improved by covering the same with sheet asphalt," whereas only 30 feet in the middle was paved, leaving a space of 22½ feet between the plaintiff's property and the paved portion of the street, and the principal point of this appeal lies in the contention that the plaintiff's lot does not "abut on the improvement."

If there was force in this objection, then the town could not impose any part of the improvement of a street upon the adjacent landowners unless the street was paved to its entire width. In the good judgment of the board of the town of Albemarle this was not required at the present time by the needs of traffic in that town, and to have done this would have more than doubled the assessment upon the plaintiff's property, of which he already complains.

Section 13 of the statute authorizes the assessment to be made against "the property abutting upon said street or streets," and in another place says "abutting on the improvement." We take it that the intention of the statute which authorizes the apportionment of the charge mentioned in the statute and assessed by the board, according to frontage, is that the lots abutting on the street which is improved shall be assessed, and not that the town shall be required to improve the entire width of the street.

Section 5 of the act requires that the petition shall be signed by a majority of the owners of the lots "abutting upon the street or streets or part of a street proposed to be improved," and section 6 says that the proportion of the costs is to be assessed "upon abutting property." Section 8 provides that one-half of the total cost "of a street or sidewalk improved * * * shall be specially assessed upon the lots and parcels of land abutting directly on the improvements according to their respective frontage thereon," and section 13, as above stated, refers to the assessment being against "the property abutting upon said street or streets."

[7] We think it clear that all these mean the same thing, and that the words "abutting on the improvement" means abutting on the street that is improved, and that this does not require that the pavement shall extend the entire width of the street when this would be an unnecessary cost, and would greatly enhance the burden of which the plaintiff in this case complains. By the term "abutting property" is meant that between which and the improvement there is no intervening land. Millan v. Charlton, 145 Iowa, 648, 124 N. W. 766.

[8] Land need not necessarily abut directly on the part of the street that has been improved to subject it to liability for its share of the cost of improvement. Indeed, premises separated from a street by a small stream, but having access to the street by means of bridges, are premises abutting on the street, though the owner of the premises is not the owner of the bed of the stream, and he is liable to assessment provided he has the right of ingress and egress over the intervening land to the improvement. 25 R. O. L. p. 112, and cases cited under notes 8, 9, 10, and 11.

If the plaintiff's contention that the property sought to be assessed must "abut" upon the improvements by coming in actual contact with the improvement could be maintained, then the common practice of paving the middle of a sidewalk, leaving a strip of unimproved sidewalk between the property line and the paved portion, and leaving another strip between the curb and the paved portion, must be abandoned, since the property which abuts the sidewalk could not be assessed, because it does not abut the improved part of the sidewalk.

The common sense, practical meaning of the legislation is that lots abutting the street that is improved, either with respect to the roadway or the sidewalk, are benefited thereby, and should be assessed for a proper proportion of the cost over and above that portion of the cost paid by the city by reason of the general benefit. It cannot be said that the street or sidewalk is not improved because it is not paved the entire width.

In this case the street in front of the plaintiff's property is 75 feet in width, and the traffic over it at this time did not, in the judgment of those to whom the law has committed the making of the improvement, require the paving of the entire width of the street. In the course of time the town of Albemarle will assuredly increase in population and wealth, so that the traffic will require the street to be paved the entire width, and then the plaintiff or his successor in title will be charged with the additional costs which he is now complaining that he is spared by the action of the authorities. No error.

(182 N. C. 410)

PINNIX v. SMITHDEAL. (No. 393.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 9, 1921.)

1. Frauds, statute of §74(1)—Agreement to divide profits on sale of realty not within statute.

A contract to divide the profits on a sale of realty purchased by defendant for resale is not within the statute.

2. Limitation of actions, §46(3)—Does not run until time for division of profits.

Under a contract to divide the profits on a sale of realty purchased in defendant's name, where it was expressly agreed that the division was to take place after a sale, limitations did not begin to run until a sale was made.

3. Limitation of actions §46(1)—Repudiation of agreement held not to start running of statute.

Under an agreement to divide the profits on a sale of realty purchased in defendant's name, defendant, by a verbal repudiation of the agreement, could not force plaintiff to presently commence suit, and he was entitled, at his election, to wait until a sale was had.

4. Appeal and error §882(3)—Party claiming agreement to be indefinite not entitled to complain of submission on quantum meruit.

Where, in an action for a share of the profits from a deal in real estate under an alleged agreement, defendant by plea and testimony endeavored to show that the facts were too indefinite to establish an express agreement, he could not insist on appeal that the evidence did not justify the submission of the case on quantum meruit.

5. Limitation of actions §195(3)—Plaintiff held to have burden of proof.

While the law puts the burden of pleading the statute of limitations on defendant, when it is properly pleaded the burden is on plaintiff to show that his cause of action comes within the statutory period, and it was error to charge that the burden was on defendant.

6. Appeal and error §1172(3)—Error as to one issue held to require new trial on both issues.

In an action for one half of the profits from a deal in real estate, the error in charging that the burden of proof was on defendant as to the defense of limitations required a new trial as to the other issue of damages as well, where the court submitted the case as one on an express agreement and on a quantum meruit, and it could not be said with certainty that the recovery was not based on a quantum meruit, but recovery on that theory would have been barred by limitations.

7. Joint adventures §4(1)—Division of profits on a sale of real estate held estimated on improper basis.

Under an express agreement to divide the profits on a sale of real estate purchased in defendant's name and with his money for purpose of resale, it was error to charge defendant with the full selling price and all rents collected, without allowing anything for interest on the investment or for taxes or other incidental expenses.

8. Joint adventures §5(3)—Question of interest on investment should not have been left to jury, where rents charged against defendant.

In an action for one-half of the profits on a sale of real estate purchased in defendant's name and with his money, where rents were charged against defendant, the allowance of interest on defendant's investment was a matter of right and should not have been left to the jury's discretion.

9. Appeal and error §1172(3)—When error as to one issue will not affect result stated.

It is only where two issues are separate questions, and it is clear that the finding on one could in no way have injuriously affected the decision of the other, that an error committed in the determination of one issue will not be allowed to affect the result.

Appeal from Superior Court, Guilford County; Finley, Judge.

Action by M. H. Pinnix against L. A. Smithdeal. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. New trial ordered.

The action is to recover one-half of profits accrued from a deal in real estate, alleged by plaintiff to be due from defendant. There was denial of liability and plea of statute of limitations. On issues submitted the jury rendered the following verdict:

"(1) What amount, if any, is plaintiff entitled to recover of defendant? Answer: $2,218.24, with interest at 6 per cent. from March 6, 1921.

"(2) Is plaintiff's claim, or any part thereof, barred by the statute of limitations? Answer: No."

King, Sapp & King and Fentress & Jerome, all of Greensboro, for appellant.

Wilson & Frazier, of Greensboro, for appellee.

HOKE, J. There were allegations with evidence on part of plaintiff tending to show that in September, 1914, plaintiff, an agent who had made some successful deals in real estate, was approached by defendant with a request that if plaintiff found a desirable investment of that kind defendant would advance the money, and on resale they would divide the profits equally; that soon thereafter plaintiff found a piece of property in Greensboro, known as the Hawkins place, and same was purchased by defendant pursuant to agreement. It being considered desirable that some improvements should be made on the property, plaintiff undertook to supervise this work, and about the time or soon after it was completed and the property rented, plaintiff, in December, 1914, suggested that the agreement between them be reduced to writing. The parties having met for that purpose, there was a dispute between them as to how much interest defendant should be allowed on the money he had advanced for the purchase and improvements.

The evidence showed that defendant had procured this money by a sale of some bank stock on which he was realizing 8 per cent., payable semiannually, and he contended the agreement was that in adjustment of this matter he was to be allowed the same per cent. Plaintiff denying this, no written or further agreement was made about it; defendant testifying, in reference to this interview, that when the disagreement arose plaintiff said he would proceed to sell, and defendant replied: "No; you won't sell my property. You haven't invested a cent in it."

[1] The facts in evidence tended further to show that defendant retained control and possession of the property, renting it, etc., till March 5, 1919, when he sold same at a profit, according to plaintiff's testimony, of $4,436.48; one-half of same, $2,218.24, being plaintiff's share as per their agreement, and defendant's evidence being to the effect that the entire profits were about $2,000 or a little more. And there were other facts in evidence which may have tended to render the alleged agreement indefinite. There was also evidence as to the character of plaintiff's service in supervising the improvements and the time he gave to this work; that, on sale being made, plaintiff had demanded the share of the profits alleged to be due him, and payment was refused. Upon this, a sufficient statement to a proper apprehension of the questions presented, the case was submitted to the jury in two aspects of liability; one under and by virtue of the express agreement to divide the profits, and another on a quantum meruit for services rendered, in case the first position should not be sufficiently proved. As to the express agreement, the contract, if so established, being for a division of profits on and after a sale of realty is not within the statute of frauds. Bourne v. Sherrill, 143 N. C. 381, 55 S. E. 799, 118 Am. St. Rep. 809; Michael v. Foll, 100 N. C. 178, 6 S. E. 264, 6 Am. St. Rep. 577.

[2-4] And under the express terms of the agreement, this division of the profits to take place after the sale, the statute of limitations would not begin to run until a sale was had, and defendant, by his mere verbal effort to repudiate the agreement in 1914, even if his words amounted to that, could not force the plaintiff to presently commence suit, but he was entitled at his election to await for division the time that the agreement specified, under principle approved in Smith v. Allen, 181 N. C. 56, 106 S. E. 143; Helsabeck v. Doub, Administrator, 167 N. C. 205, 83 S. E. 241, L. R. A. 1917A, 1; Smith v. Lumber Co., 142 N. C. 26, 54 S. E. 788, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 439; Markham v. Markham, 110 N. C. 356, 14 S. E. 963. And as to the quantum meruit, while there seems to be very little evidence to justify a submission of that question, the objection is not open to defendant on the record, as he, by plea and all the testimony available to him, was endeavoring to show that the pertinent facts were too indefinite to establish an express agreement, in which event the issue could have been properly submitted on a quantum meruit. On authority he should be precluded from insisting on an exception so entirely inconsistent with the position maintained by him in the trial of the cause. Lipsitz v. Smith, 178 N. C. 100, 100 S. E. 247; Brown v. Chemical Co., 165 N. C. 421, 81 S. E. 463; Railroad v. McCarthy, 96 U. S. 258, 24 L. Ed. 693.

[5] On the second issue, that as to the statute of limitations, the court charged the jury that the burden of the issue was on the defendant, and the question was considered under that ruling. The law puts the burden of pleading the statute of limitations on a defendant, but, when properly pleaded, the burden is then on the plaintiff to show that his cause of action comes within the statutory period. Sprinkle v. Sprinkle, 159 N. C. 81, 74 S. E. 739. The charge of his honor therefore is clearly erroneous.

[6, 7] And on the record we are of opinion that there should be a new trial as to both issues. As heretofore stated, the first issue was submitted in two aspects, on the express agreement and on a quantum meruit. As to the first, the statute of limitations could in no event affect the question, as the suit was commenced within a few days after the sale. But on the second ground of imputed liability the statute of limitations would bar the claim; the evidence showing that the services involved in such a position were rendered more than four years before suit brought, and although it would seem that the jury, in determining the first issue, have accepted plaintiff's version of the matter both as to an express agreement and the amount due thereunder, we cannot be so assured of this as to say that the error in the statute of limitation may not in any way have affected the result. While we have found no error in the determination of the first issue, which is covered by any exception, it is clear from a perusal of the evidence that the profits claimed on a resale have been estimated on an improper basis. Under an alleged express agreement for profits on a sale of the property, defendant has been charged with the full amount of the sale, all of the rents collected, and has been allowed nothing either for interest on the investment or for taxes or any other expenses incident to the ownership and control of the property or the collection of the rents.

Considering the question briefly in a recent decision (Samatt v. Klaff, 181 N. C. 503, 107 S. E. 2, the court said:

"'Profit' implies, without more, the gain resulting from the employment of capital, the excess of receipts over expenditures * * * and so understood the expenses must be deducted before the profits can be ascertained."

[8] Apart from this, and in the absence of express agreement affecting the matter, in any fair estimate of profits, when rents are considered as an item of charge, the interest on the capital invested must be allowed for by way of reduction. The court seems to have left this question of interest to the jury, but in a case of this character, the adjustment of profits growing out of a contract, the allowance of interest at the legal rate is of right and should not be left to a jury's discretion. Bond v. Cotton Mills, 186 N. C. 20, 81 S. E. 936.

[9] In this aspect of the record we cannot say of a certainty that the jury may not have awarded recovery on the theory of a quantum meruit, and merely adopted plaintiff's estimate as a guide to the conclusion arrived at. We are not inadvertent to a decision at the present term to the effect that, when an issue determinative of the controversy has been properly settled, an error committed in the determination of a second issue will not be allowed to affect the result. Poindexter v. Call, 109 S. E. 28, at the present term. But this is where the two are on separated questions, and it is clear that the finding on one could in no way have injuriously affected the decision of the other. But not so here, where the finding of the issue on the statute of limitations under an erroneous ruling may have very real significance from the manner in which the first issue was presented and necessarily considered by the jury.

For the error indicated, plaintiff is entitled to a new trial on both issues; and it is so ordered.

New trial.

CAUBLE v. SOUTHERN EXPRESS CO.
et al. (No. 400.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 9, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 1064(1)—Instructions submitting wrong measure of damages held harmless in view of evidence.

In shipper's action against express company for damage to cash register sustained during transportation, instruction giving measure of damages as the difference between the value of the property just before the injury and its value at time of trial held harmless, where the cash register was of the same value at time of trial as immediately following the injury.

2. Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 1170(1) — New trial granted by Supreme Court only to subserve ends of substantial justice.

In view of Pell's Revisal, § 507, the Supreme Court will not grant a new trial except to subserve the real ends of substantial justice, and unless there is a prospect of ultimate benefit to the appellant.

3. Carriers \Leftrightarrow 137½, New, vol. 3 Key-No. Series — Carrier permitted to keep damaged goods on shipper's recovery of value before shipment.

In a shipper's action for damage to a cash register, the carrier will be permitted to keep the register on shipper's recovery of the value thereof preceding shipment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Guilford County; Finley, Judge.

Action by F. P. Cauble against the Southern Express Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff and defendants appeal. Affirmed as modified.

This action was brought to recover damages for the injury to or destruction of a cash register, sold by the plaintiff (who lived and carried on his business at High Point, N. C.) to the Bank of Hickory Grove, at a town by that name in the state of South Carolina, the machine having been shipped via the American Railways Express Company to the consignee at that place. It is alleged that when shipped it was in perfect condition, but when it arrived at its destination it was found to be in a very ruinous state, and the manufacturer could not repair it, even at great cost, because its number had been lost, so it was left in the possession of the American Railways Express Company. The jury assessed the damages at $300, and defendants appealed from the judgment on the verdict.

John A. Barringer, of Greensboro, for appellants.

Wilson & Frazier, of Greensboro, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). The defendant's first exception, and assignment of error set forth in the case on appeal, is to the charge of the court as to the rule of damages by which the jury was to be guided in assessing the amount which the plaintiff was entitled to recover. It appears the judge charged the jury that the rule of damages was the difference between the market value of the cash register before the injury complained of and the market value of the cash register at the time of the trial, which was more than a year afterwards. The defendant contends that this is not the correct rule, which is the difference between the market value of the property just before the injury and the said value immediately after the injury, and not the value of the property a year or more after the negligence complained of.

Judge Allen lays down the rule in the following language in the case of Farrall v. Garage Co., 179 N. C. 393, 102 S. E. 617:

"The correct and safe rule is the difference between the value of the machine before and after its injury."

[1, 2] But plaintiff, in making this objection to the measure of damages, overlooks, or rather leaves out, the fact that, although the charge measured the damages by the difference in the value of the cash register before the injury to it and one year after the injury, it appears that the injury to the machine was the same just after it was done as it was one year afterwards, and there was no decrease in its value between the two dates, so that there was practically, and even theoretically, no harm done. When the aid of this court is invoked to grant a new trial, the motion for the same will be carefully weighed by us, and will be denied unless the merits are made clearly to appear. Courts do not lightly grant reversals, or set aside verdicts, upon grounds which show the alleged error to be harmless, or where the appellant could have sustained no injury from it. There should be, at least, something like a practical treatment of the motion to reverse, and it should not be granted except to subserve the real ends of substantial justice. The motion should be meritorious, and not based upon merely trivial errors committed, manifestly without prejudice. Reasons for attaching great importance to small and innocuous deviations from correct principles have long ceased to have that effect, and have become obsolete. The law will not now do a vain and useless thing. The foundation of the application for a new trial is the allegation of injustice, and the motion is for relief. Unless, therefore, some wrong has been suffered, there is nothing to be relieved against. The injury must be positive and tangible, not theoretical merely. For instance, the simple fact of defeat is, in one sense, injurious, for it wounds the feelings. But this alone is not sufficient ground for a new trial. It does not necessarily involve loss of any kind, and without loss or the probability of loss there can be no new trial. The complaining party asks for redress, for the restoration of rights which have first been infringed and then taken away. There must be, then, a probability of repairing the injury; otherwise the interference of the court would be but nugatory. There must be a reasonable prospect of placing the party who asks for a new trial in a better position than the one which he occupies by the verdict. If he obtains a new trial he must incur additional expense, and if there is no corresponding benefit he is still the sufferer. Besides, courts are instituted to enforce right and restrain and punish wrong. Their time is too valuable for them to interpose their remedial power idly and to no purpose. They will only interfere, therefore, where there is a prospect of ultimate benefit. Brewer v. Ring and Valk, 177 N. C. 476, at pages 484, 485, 99 S. E. 358, citing many authorities, and among them Hilliard on New Trials (2d Ed.) §§ 1 to 7; State v. Smith, 164 N. C. 476, 79 S. E. 979; Schas v. Asso. Society, 170 N. C. 420, 424, 87 S. E. 222, Ann. Cas. 1918A, 679; S. Graham and Waterman on New Trials, 1235; Hulse v. Brantley, 110 N. C. 134, 14 S. E. 510; Alexander v. N. C. Trust Co., 155 N. C. 124, 71 S. E. 69; McKeel v. Holloman, 163 N. C. 132, 79 S. E. 445. See, also, Grice v. Ricks, 14 N. C. 62; Gray v. Railroad, 167 N. C. 433, 88 S. E. 849; Blacklock v. Clark, 133 N. C. 309, 45 S. E. 642; Reynolds v. Railroad, 136 N. C. 345, 48 S. E. 765; Pell's Revisal, p. 237, § 507.

Surely when this rule, which is both sensible and just, is applied to the facts in hand, there is nothing to be gained by granting a new trial, for the reason stated by the defendant, and it would, practically considered, be unwise to do so, as the motion, so far as it relates to this ground upon which it is based, is without any genuine merit. If defendant (Director General) had shown that the debris of this machine was of any real value, he would have been entitled to a deduction from the recovery, to the amount of it, as found by the jury, but he did not do so. But it will appear hereafter that this is really immaterial, as we will direct that the machine be kept by the defendant, who can dispose of it in his discretion, and in that way get the benefit of its value, if it has any. This was defendant's principal exception on the merits.

Plaintiff moved in this court to amend process and complaint so as to show more clearly that the injury to the cash register was not caused by the Southern Express Company, but by the defendant Director General of Railroads, having charge of the American Railways Express Company, during the period of federal control, as a war measure, and we allowed the amendment. This disposes of the defendants' contention that the Southern Express Company was the only one sued in this action and that the Director General (in charge of the American Railways Express Company) was not sued, nor was the last-named express company. While we have sufficiently answered the last contention by reference to the amendment of process and pleadings, or complaint, we are of the opinion the amendment was not necessary, but was, perhaps, resorted to as a cautionary measure. The record plainly shows that the summons was addressed to "Walker D. Hines, Director General of the American Railways Express Company," and was served, according to the sheriff's return thereon, "on J. R. Parks, Agent of Walker D. Hines, Director General of American Railways Express Co." and also on the agent of the Southern Express Company, on January 9, 1920. The bond for costs was made payable to the Amer. Railways Express Company. The case was entitled on the record below, "Cable v. Walker D. Hines, Director General," and sometimes as "Cable v. Amer. Railways Express Co.," and was, in all of these names, submitted to the jury. This would seem to be most ample to show, and show conclusively, that the Director General and both express companies were served with process, and the complaint is drawn, accordingly, expressly naming both express companies and the Director General.

The other exceptions are either merely formal or entirely without merit.

The trial of this case was errorless, and it is remanded, with instructions to dismiss the action, with costs to be taxed as to the Southern Express Company, which it appears had no connection with the transaction (McAllister v. Express Co., 179 N. C. 558, 103 S. E. 129); and, as to the Director General of the American Railways Express Company, we affirm the judgment.

[3] The cash register, as above indicated by us, will remain in the possession of the defendant Director General, having charge of the American Railways Express Company, as his property, so that he may get the benefit of its value, if it has any.

Judgment affirmed, as modified.

Affirmed, as modified.

IN RE EDENS' WILL. (No. 287.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 9, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error \S 692(1)—Ruling excluding question not considered where answer not shown.

Where record does not show what answer witness would have made to excluded question, or what appellants proposed to prove by the excluded evidence, exceptions complaining of the exclusion will be overruled.

2. Appeal and error \S 1032(1)—Error must be shown to have prejudiced appellant.

A judgment will not be reversed in the absence of a showing that the erroneous ruling constituted a denial of some substantial right of the appellant.

3. Wills \S 329(4)—Refusal to charge jurors to attach importance to testimony of subscribing witnesses not reversible error.

On caveat to will based on ground of mental incapacity and undue influence, where subscribing witnesses to the will testified not only as to the mental condition of the testatrix when making the will, but also as to other matters which existed and transpired at other times and places both before and after the date of attestation, refusal to charge jury to attach importance to the testimony of the subscribing witnesses held not reversible error.

4. Wills \S 303(1)—Subscribing witness' testimony as to matters which transpired at time and place other than that of attestation not entitled to special weight.

Testimony of subscribing witness to will is not entitled to greater weight than testimony of other witnesses where it relates to matters which transpired at a time and place other than that of attestation.

5. Wills \S 384—Refusal of instruction held harmless in view of testimony.

On caveat to will, refusal to charge jurors to attach importance to testimony of subscribing witnesses held harmless as to caveators where testimony of such witnesses as to matters which did not transpire at time and place of attestation was favorable to contention of caveators.

On Motion for New Trial.

6. New trial \S 140(3)—Evidence insufficient to warrant new trial on ground of intoxication of juror.

Evidence held insufficient to warrant new trial on ground that one of the jurors was intoxicated during the trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Robeson County; Daniels, Judge.

Proceeding to probate will of Letilla M. Edens, deceased, to which Allen Edens filed a caveat. No error. Motion for new trial denied.

Issue of devisavit vel non raised by a caveat to the will of Letilla M. Edens. Alleged mental incapacity and undue influence are the grounds upon which the caveat is based.

Allen Edens, a bachelor, and his maiden sister, Letilla M. Edens, whose will is the subject of this controversy, owned as tenants in common a valuable farm situated in Robeson county, upon which they lived and worked together for quite a number of years. From time to time they took into their home some young man to act as overseer of their farming interests. W. W. Rowland was employed in this capacity for many years, then Alton McGirt, and finally John C. Crawford, one of the propounders, who came to them when quite a young man and remained with them until they died.

Allen and Letilla Edens had but one living brother, Frank Edens, who likewise was never married. They also had two sets of nieces and nephews, children of two deceased brothers, and these nieces and nephews are the caveators in this action.

The record is replete with evidence tending to show an estrangement between the testatrix and her relatives from the time of the death of her brother, Allen Edens, in 1917, until her own death in 1919. There is also evidence of John C. Crawford, one of the beneficiaries, having ingratiated himself in her favor and acting somewhat in the capacity of a confidential adviser in relation to her business affairs. And, further, there is evidence appearing on the record tending to show that, prior to the making of her will, the testatrix became so embittered and allowed her prejudices to become so aroused that at times she would work herself into a frenzy, fly into a violent rage, and abuse her relatives, calling them "knaves, robbers, thieves, kings, kaisers, and the celebrated heirs and gang." She was 71 years of age at the time of her death; and she left a considerable estate. Mrs. Ward testified:

"She was an unusually good conversationalist, very intelligent until the last few years of her life. I began to notice a change in her habits decidedly in 1915. From then on the change in her condition grew worse."

There was a strain of hereditary insanity in the family of the testatrix.

Under the will the old Edens homeplace was devised to John O. Crawford, a stranger in blood, and this is urged as evidence of an unnatural mind.

There was much evidence, pro and con, on the question of mental capacity, and some evidence on the issue of undue influence; but, upon these controverted matters, the jury's answer established the validity of the will.

The motion for new trial was made on the ground that one of the jurors was intoxicated during the trial. The evidence in support of the motion consisted of four affidavits that affiants knew juror claimed to have been intoxicated, that they were present during the trial, and that at different times during the trial such juror was plainly under the influence of intoxicating liquor to the extent that he staggered and needed assistance. In opposition to the motion there were the affidavits of the other jurors, with the exception of one who had died since the trial, that there was nothing to indicate that such juror was under the influence of liquor at any time during the trial, the affidavit of the juror himself, who denied having been intoxicated, and the affidavits of others who saw and came in contact with him during the time of the trial, contradictory of facts stated in affidavits in support of the motion.

From a verdict and judgment in favor of the propounders, the caveators appealed.

Johnson & Johnson and McNeill & Hackett, all of Lumberton, Sinclair, Dye & Clark, of Fayetteville, and McLean, Varser, McLean & Stacy, of Lumberton, for appellants.

C. W. Tillett, of Charlotte, Stephen McIntyre, of Lumberton, G. B. Patterson, of Maxton, and Britt & Britt, of Lumberton, for appellees.

STACY, J. [1,2] There are a number of exceptions appearing on the record relating to the admission and exclusion of evidence, but none apparently raises any new question of law which would seem to merit an extended discussion. In several instances it does not appear what answer the witness would have made to the excluded question, nor what the caveators proposed to prove by the evidence which they wanted to offer. Therefore, as we cannot determine what bearing these rulings may have had upon the result, the exceptions must be overruled. Armfield v. Railroad, 162 N. C. 24, 77 S. E. 963; Fulwood v. Fulwood, 161 N. C. 601, 77 S. E. 763; Dickerson v. Dall, 159 N. C. 541, 75 S. E. 808; and numerous cases of like import. The other evidentiary exceptions, or those relating to the court's rulings on questions of proof, are not sufficiently meritorious to warrant a reversal or new trial. Verdicts and judgments are not to be set aside for harmless error, or for mere error and no more. To accomplish this result, it must be made to appear not only that the ruling was erroneous, but that it was material and prejudicial, amounting to a denial of some substantial right. Cotton Mills v. Hosiery Mills, 181 N. C. 33, 106 S. E. 24; Burris v. Litaker, 181 N. C. 376, 107 S. E. 129; State v. Smith, 164 N. C. 476, 79 S. E. 979; and Cauble v. Express Co., 109 S. E. 267, at the present term.

[3] In apt time, and in due form, the caveators requested his honor to give the following special instruction:

"The court charges you that you may attach, because the law attaches, such importance to the testimony of the subscribing witnesses to the will, for that they are known as the witnesses of the law, and the law requires them, not only for the purpose of witnessing the signature of the instrument as to form, and requires them to take certain precautions as to signing in each other's presence and in the presence of the testator, and that they see the testator sign, to protect against fraud, but they are required especially to see that the testator is of sound and disposing mind and memory and is of such mind and memory at the precise point of time when the papers are executed, and that in passing upon the testimony of the witnesses to the will you may observe this rule and consider their testimony in the light of the duty which the law casts upon them with reference to her mental capacity in executing the will."

It is stated that this prayer was taken from the opinion of this court in the case of Cornelius v. Cornelius, 52 N. C. 593, and the caveators contend that his honor's refusal to give it should be held for reversible error. Marshall, C. J., in U. S. v. Burr (Fed. Cas. No. 14,693) 4 Cranch, 470, says:

"Every opinion, to be correctly understood, ought to be considered with a view to the case in which it was delivered."

The facts of the two cases thus presented for comparison are quite different. In Cornelius v. Cornelius the testator had been badly wounded some two weeks before he made his will. Having grown worse from his injury, he sent for a physician and the two subscribing witnesses. At the request of the testator, the doctor prepared his will and the witnesses duly attested it. Upon the question of mental capacity—it being alleged that the testator was in extremis when his will was signed—the witnesses testified in detail as to what occurred, and the observations they made of the testator's condition, at the time of declaration and publication. Under these circumstances, it was clear that the subscribing witnesses were in a better position to know the mental condition of the testator at the precise time in question than any one else, and their testimony related only to his condition at that particular time. In the case at bar, however, the subscribing witnesses not only testified as to the mental condition of the testatrix at the time of the execution of her will, but they were also examined about other matters and things, which existed and transpired at other times and places, before and after the date of attestation.

[4] The law charges a subscribing witness with the duty of observing the condition of the testator at the time his will is executed, and to see that no wrong is committed, but as to what may transpire at some other time and place, especially at a subsequent date, when the witness is under no special duty to observe the testator, the law would attach no peculiar importance to his testimony in regard to these matters simply because he was a subscribing witness to the will. Attesting witnesses are witnesses of the law in regard to matters occurring at the time of attestation. They are therefore charged with the duty of observing the attendant circumstances and conditions surrounding the making of a will, but we apprehend they stand on the same footing with other witnesses when they undertake to speak of matters not coming within the scope of their knowledge and observation as such witnesses.

[5] As the prayer of the caveators is general in its terms, and not confined to that part of the testimony of the subscribing witnesses which related only to what transpired when they were charged with this special duty, we think his honor's refusal to give it, as requested, should not be held for reversible error. On the other hand, if the prayer, by correct interpretation, was intended to apply to the testimony of the subscribing witnesses only when they were charged with this special duty as witnesses of the law, still we think the caveators are not in position to complain; because the evidence of these witnesses, in this particular, was favorable to the propounders. It was only when they spoke of other matters that their testimony seemed to lend color to the contentions of the caveators.

The remaining exceptions are without special merit; and, upon a perusal of the entire case, we conclude that the judgment on the verdict in favor of the propounders must be upheld.

No error.

On Motion for New Trial.

PER CURIAM. [6] There was a motion for a new trial filed in this cause upon the ground of the alleged misconduct of a juror. Caveators aver that the information concerning the instant matter, came to their attention after the adjournment of the term of court, at which the case was tried, and after the same had been docketed here. Upon an examination of the affidavits filed by both sides in regard to the present motion, we are of opinion that it must be overruled; and it is therefore disallowed.

BONEY v. CORNWELL et al. (No. 10720.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 10, 1921.)

1. Boundaries ⇨22—Deed calling for land bounded by railroad construed as to boundary.

Deed conveying land described as bounded by railroad conveys merely to the edge of the right of way strip, if the railroad company has a fee-simple defeasible title thereto, but, if the railroad has merely an easement, it conveys to the center of the track, in absence of a showing that the parties intended that grantee should take only to the edge of the right of way strip.

2. Eminent domain ⇨317(2)—Railroad's charter construed to give railroad merely an easement in land used for right of way, without payment of compensation on owner's failure to sue for compensation within two years.

Under railroad's charter under Act Dec. 19, 1848 (11 St. at Large 533), providing that in absence of contract with owner land appropriated by the railroad for right of way purposes should be presumed to have been granted to the railroad on owner's failure to apply for assessment of value within two years after construction of the road, provided that on execution sale of the road or part thereof the right and title to the land shall immediately revert to the original owner, unless purchaser at sale shall keep up road for use of public, the railroad thereby acquired, not the fee in such land, but merely an easement of right of way.

3. Trial \Leftrightarrow 296(2)—Holding that railroad owned land in fee, instead of having merely an easement, held not cured by instruction.

In suit involving issue of whether deed describing land as bounded by a railroad conveyed land merely to the edge of the right of way or conveyed to the center of the track, erroneous holding that railroad had a fee-simple title to the strip of land used as right of way, instead of merely an easement therein, held not cured by instruction requiring jury to decide the boundaries called for by the deed.

4. Adverse possession \Leftrightarrow 115(1)—Question for jury.

In a law action to recover real estate, the question of adverse possession is a jury question.

5. Boundaries \Leftrightarrow 40(3)—Whether adjoining owners agreed as to line is a jury question.

In law action for recovery of real estate, whether adjoining owners agreed as to location of dividing line is a jury question.

6. Ejectment \Leftrightarrow 148—Whether defendants made permanent improvements is a jury question.

In law action for recovery of real estate, question of whether defendants made permanent improvements on land is a jury question.

7. Estoppel \Leftrightarrow 119—Question for jury in law action.

In law action to recover land, the question of estoppel to claim the land is a jury question.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Chester County; T. J. Mauldin, Judge.

Action by J. W. Boney against Mary Jane Cornwell and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

The paragraph of the charter referred to in the opinion follows:

XX. Be it further enacted, that in the absence of any contract or contracts with the said company in relation to lands through which the said road or its branches may pass, signed by the owner thereof, or by his agent or any claimant or person in possession thereof, which may be confirmed by the owner thereof, it shall be presumed that the land upon which the said road or any of its branches may be constructed, together with a space of 65 feet on each side of the center of the said road, has been granted to the company by the owner or owners thereof; and the said company shall have good right and title thereto, and shall have, hold, and enjoy the same, as long as the same be used, only for the purpose of said railroad, discharged from all persons' liens, and no longer, unless the person or persons owning the said land at the time that part of the said road which may be on the said land was finished, or those claiming under him, her, or them, shall apply for an assessment of the value of the said lands, as hereinbefore directed, within two years next after that part of said road was finished; and in case the said owner or owners, or those claiming under him, her, or them, shall not apply within two years next after the said part was finished, he, she, or they shall be forever barred from recovering said land, or having any assessment or compensation therefor; provided, nothing herein contained shall affect the rights of femes covert or infants, until two years after the removal of their respective disabilities; and provided also, that if the said road, or any part thereof, should be sold at execution sale, for the debts of said company or otherwise, then, and in that case, all the right and title to the land which may have been condemned by virtue of this act shall immediately revert to the original owners, unless the purchaser or purchasers at such sale shall keep up the road for the use of the public, in the same manner and under the same restrictions as by this act it is contemplated the Charlotte & South Carolina Railroad Company should do.

Gaston & Hamilton, of Chester, for appellants.

Glenn & Glenn and S. E. McFadden, all of Chester, for respondent.

COTHRAN, J. Action for the recovery of certain real estate, described in the complaint, containing 13 acres, more or less, tried before Judge Mauldin and a jury, upon certain issues submitted involving title and right to possession. The verdict was in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendants have appealed.

While the complaint seeks the recovery of the entire tract of 13 acres, as a matter of fact the contest is limited to a narrow strip containing between 2 and 3 acres, upon which is located a storehouse, a dwelling house, and other buildings; the remainder of the tract being in the possession of the plaintiff, whose title thereto is not contested. We quote from the appellant's argument:

"The land in dispute is the small area of about two acres, on which are located the store building, dwelling, and barn."

A large body of land, of which the 13-acre tract was a part, belonged to Jane I. Cornwell, who was the widow of Elijah Cornwell and the stepmother of his two sons, Eli Cornwell and Dr. W. J. W. Cornwell. The plaintiff claims that on February 15, 1878, Jane I. Cornwell conveyed the 13-acre tract to her stepson Dr. Cornwell; that Dr. Cornwell died in July, 1910, intestate, leaving as his sole heir at law his daughter Mary C. Holler; that on January 7, 1916, Mary C. Holler conveyed to him 63 acres of land, consisting of 50 acres which Dr. Cornwell had previously owned and as to which there is no dispute and the 13-acre tract. The two tracts adjoin each other; the 50-acre tract lying south of the other.

(199 S.E.)

The defendants claim under the will of Jane I. Cornwell, dated February 10, 1870, taking effect at her death in February, 1878, a few days after the execution of the deed to Dr. Cornwell above referred to. By the will she devised her entire estate to her stepson Eli Cornwell, in trust for the use and benefit of himself and his wife, Mary C. Cornwell, during their joint lives and to the survivor for life, and after the death of both to be equally divided between the children of Mary C. Cornwell then living and the children of such as may have predeceased her. Eli Cornwell is dead; Mary C. Cornwell, his widow, is living; she is a defendant in this action, along with the other defendants above named, her children.

The controversy over the disputed area will be better understood by reference to the following rough draft of the situation:

- (1) A B C D — Disputed area.
 (2) A E H D — Location of 13 acres as claimed by plaintiff.
 B E F G — Location of 13 acres as claimed by defendants.
 (3) — 50-acre tract owned by Dr. Cornwell.
 (4) — Barbara Corder land.
 (5) — Other lands of estate of Jane I. Cornwell.
 (6) — Columbia Highway.
 (7) — C., C. & A. R. R.
 (8) — McLarnon line.
 (9) — Hardin line.
 (10) — Original dividing line between Dr. Cornwell and Jane I. Cornwell.

There is no dispute as to the location of the southern line (10) between the 13-acre tract and the 50-acre tract (3) owned by Dr. Cornwell, nor as to the location of the western line between the 13-acre tract and the Barbara Corder land (4); the controversy is as to the location of the northern line between the 13-acre tract and the other land owned by Jane I. Cornwell (5), of which the 13-acre tract was a part; the plaintiff contends that the true line is that run by the surveyor Mc-

Larnon, indicated as (8) on the draft, which would give him the boundaries A E H D, inclosing the disputed area A B C D; the defendants contend that the true line is that run by the surveyor Hardin, indicated as (9) on the draft, which would give the plaintiff the boundaries B E F G, excluding the disputed area A B C D, and giving it to them under the will of Jane I. Cornwell.

The description of the 13-acre tract contained in the deed from Jane I. Cornwell, to Dr. Cornwell, dated February 15, 1878, is the source of the uncertainty and the basis of the controversy. It is as follows:

"All that piece, parcel or tract of land on the west side of the C., C. & A. R. R., containing 13 acres, bounded on the north by lands of Jane I. Cornwell, on the east by C., C. & A. R. R., on the south by Dr. W. J. W. Cornwell, on the west by Barbara Corder land."

The locus of irritation is the descriptive line "on the east by C., C. & A. R. R." Does that mean that the eastern boundary line of the 13-acre tract is the center of the railroad tract, or the western line of the strip constituting the railroad right of way? The right of way of the railroad at this point is 65 feet on each side of the center of the tract, which, on the western side, reaches to about the western edge of the Columbia highway.

It is apparent that, the southern line (10) of the 13-acre tract being fixed, the western line separating it from the Barbara Corder land (4) being also fixed, and the deed calling for 13 acres, the alternative correctness of the McLarnon line or the Hardin line depends upon the proper location of the eastern line as being the edge of the right of way or the center of the railroad track. The survey of Hardin extended the disputed dividing line (9) across the Columbia Highway (6) to the center of the railroad track (7), inclosing an area of 13 acres; the survey of McLarnon extended the disputed dividing line (8) only to the Columbia Highway (6), also inclosing an area of 13 acres. The question, therefore, whether or not the disputed area is included within the description contained in the deed from Jane I. Cornwell, to Dr. Cornwell, depends upon the basis upon which the dividing line should have been run. Should it have had its terminus at the western edge of the right of way or at the center of the railroad track? It is apparent that the further east the dividing line should be extended the further south will be its location.

[1] This question turns in a measure upon a proper construction of the charter rights of the railway company under section 20, Act of 1848 (11 Stat. 539), which will be reported. Did the railway company secure a fee-simple defeasible title to the strip of land or did it secure simply an easement? If the former, the terminus of the northern dividing line should be at the western edge of the right of way strip; if the latter, under the cases of Wright v. Willoughby, 79 S. C. 438, 60 S. E. 971, and Foster v. Foster, 81 S. C. 307, 62 S. E. 320, the terminus should be at the center of the railroad track. In the first event the McLarnon line is the true dividing line; in the second the Hardin line, unless as declared in the case of Wheeler v. Wheeler, 111 S. C. 87, 94, 96 S. E. 714, it may be shown that the parties intended the edge of the right of way strip and not the center of the track.

The appellants contend that under the section of the railroad company's charter above referred to the company did not and could not acquire more than the easement of right of way, and that the circuit judge erred in holding that they acquired the fee to the strip of land. The respondent in his argument says:

"The presiding judge charged, as requested by the defendant, that the grantor actually owned to the center of the railroad track, subject to the easement of the railroad and the highway, and he further instructed them that the title to this land passed under the deed. The judge also specifically charged that the railroad could not acquire a fee in this land.

"The jury, after being so charged, found for the plaintiff, and the defendant cannot complain of the charge of the judge, which was on this point exactly as he requested."

We do not so construe the charge. The charge contained a distinct and unequivocal declaration that the railroad company, in the absence of a contract with the owner, is presumed to have received a grant from the owner for the strip of land, and to have "good right and title thereto * * * as long as the same be used for the purposes of said railroad." He nowhere charged, as we can find, that the title to this strip passed under the deed, or that the railroad could not acquire the fee to the strip of land. His ruling that a grant was presumed, that the railroad company acquired good title thereto, defeasible upon abandonment, is entirely inconsistent with such a statement. The defendants were entitled to have their first request charged, which was as follows:

"Where a deed to land calls for a road as a boundary, such as a public highway or a railroad right of way, such conveyance of land includes the soil to the center of the way, provided the grantor owned to the center when the deed was executed, and provided there are no words of specific description to show contrary intent."

The appellants in their requests to charge embodying their contention, which were not given, and in their exceptions, squarely raise the issue.

[2, 3] This court, in construing a similar provision in the charter of another railroad company, has distinctly held that the company thereby acquired, not the fee, but an easement of right of way, of the stated dimensions (Ragsdale v. Ry. Co., 60 S. C. 381, 389, 38 S. E. 609, which was reaffirmed in Railway v. Beaudrot, 63 S. C. 266, 268, 41 S. E. 299); and in the following cases the proposition seems to have been accepted without a suggestion of controversy; Hill v. Ry. Co., 67 S. C. 548, 46 S. E. 486; Harman v. Railway Co., 72 S. C. 228, 51 S. E. 689; So. Ry. Co. v. Howell, 79 S. C. 281, 60 S. E. 677; So. Ry. Co. v. Gossett, 79 S. C. 372, 60 S. E. 956; Lorick v. Ry. Co., 87 S. C. 71, 68 S. E. 931; A. & C. Ry. Co. v. Electric Co., 90 S. C. 299, 88 S. E. 635.

The circuit judge was therefore in error in holding that the railroad company had the fee-simple title to the strip claimed by it as a right of way. While he did charge the jury:

"The jury must decide from the evidence what are the bounds to the land called for by the deed. All the circumstances and facts in evidence must be considered by the jury in deciding the boundaries called for by the deed of Mrs. Jane I. Cornwell put in evidence"

—a charge which, as we have seen, would have been entirely appropriate, under Wheeler v. Wheeler, 111 S. C. 87, 96 S. E. 714, to the theory of an easement and not a fee, it could not cure the error in holding that a fee had been acquired; for, if that be so, the dividing line would necessarily have its eastern terminus at the western line of the strip. The conclusion that the presumptive grant to the railroad company was of an easement and not of the fee raises a rebuttable presumption that the eastern line of the 13-acre tract was the center of the railroad track, but as the court declares in Wheeler v. Wheeler, 111 S. C. 87, 96 S. E. 714:

"That construction is in conformity with the general rule that where a stream is given as a boundary the grant is presumed to extend to the middle of the stream. But, as clearly appears from the decision in that case, the rule is not invariable or inflexible. It may be shown that the parties intended the edge of the swamp rather than the stream as the boundary, and, of course, when that is made to appear by competent evidence, effect will be given to their intention. It may be conceded that parol testimony of a contrary intention is incompetent to vary or control the construction. But, as pointed out in Felder v. Bonnett, it may be done by other competent evidence appearing either upon the face of the deed itself, or of the plat made at the time, and proof of the actual location of a different boundary line on the ground, and possession taken and held to the boundary so located. Especially is this so where the boundary given in the deed is ambiguous or of doubtful meaning, as it clearly is in this case; for Pudding swamp as a boundary may be either the edge of the swamp or the run of the stream."

[4-7] This is a law case, and the questions of adverse possession by Dr. Cornwell, the location of the dividing line by co-operation with the trustees, permanent improvements, estoppel, and perhaps others, are questions for the jury and such as this court is powerless to determine.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

ABERNATHY et al. v. WOLFE, Atty. Gen., et al. (No. 10751.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 9, 1921.)

Elections §—83—Persons who did not pay their taxes when due and payable held not entitled to vote at special election.

Persons who failed to pay their property and poll taxes on or before the 31st day of December, 1920, when they were due and payable, were not entitled to vote at a special election on the question of annexing a portion of one county to another county, held on January 11, 1921, though paying before the election, and, the number so voting being enough to have changed the result, the election was void, Const. art. 2, § 4, prescribing as a prerequisite of the right to vote the payment six months before any election of any poll tax due and payable, and requiring every voter to prove payment of all taxes assessed against him and collectible during the previous year.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Chester County; Ernest Moore, Judge.

Certiorari by W. L. Abernathy and others, directed to Samuel Wolfe, Attorney General, and others, as State Board of Canvassers, to review a decision in the matter of an election held in Chester County upon the question of annexing a portion of Chester County to York County. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

The decree of Judge Moore reads as follows:

This matter came before me on the 15th day of March, 1921, and was heard in response to a writ of certiorari issued by me on the 3d day of March, 1921, directed to the respondents, above named, who constitute the state board of canvassers, to review the decision of said board in the matter of an election held in Chester county, S. C., on the 11th day of January, 1921, upon the question of annexing a portion of Chester county to York county.

It appears from the record that on the 20th day of December, 1920, the Governor ordered said election to be held at the time above stated, and in obedience to said order said election was held at said time. While the order of the Governor was dated the 20th day of December, 1920, it was not received by the commissioners of election of Chester county until the 30th day of December, 1920, and the first notice of said election was not published until the 31st day of December, 1920, being only 11 days before the date fixed for the holding of said election.

On the 18th day of January, 1921, the board of canvassers for Chester county met and organized for the purpose of canvassing the returns of managers and counting the votes and declaring the results of said election. At that time Messrs. D. Ferguson and others, who were opposed to the annexation of said territory to York county, duly filed their notice of grounds of protest and contest of said election. The returns of the managers show that 212 votes were cast at said election, of which 148 votes were in favor of annexation and 64 votes against annexation. It appeared from testimony taken before said board of canvassers that of the total 212 votes cast at said election 97 of the voters so voting had failed to pay their property and poll taxes assessed against them and payable on or before the 31st day of December, 1920. It was claimed by the contestants that the 97 votes mentioned were illegal, by reason of the nonpayment of said taxes on or before the 31st day of December, 1920, although many of said voters paid their taxes after said date and before said election. The county board of canvassers, sustaining all the grounds of protest and contest, held said election to be null and void.

From the judgment and decision of the County board of canvassers, the proponents of annexation served notice of appeal to the state board of canvassers upon several grounds, which are not necessary to be stated here. On being heard by the state board of canvassers, that board affirmed the judgment of the county board of canvassers of Chester county and held said election to be void, upon the ground that the votes of the 97 voters were illegal because they had not paid their taxes prior to the 31st day of December, 1920.

While the petitioners, above named, alleged error in the decision of the said board of canvassers upon several grounds, the principal ground argued before me involved the illegality of the 97 votes above mentioned, and I do not feel it necessary to base my decision herein upon any other than the principal ground that was argued before me, namely, the illegality of said 97 votes.

The evidence is undisputed that 97 of the voters in the election in question had failed to pay their poll and property taxes prior to the 31st day of December, 1920. After a careful consideration of the matter, it appears to me that the petitioners herein are concluded by the decision of the Supreme Court in Clarke v. McCown, 107 S. C. 209.¹ That case involved the validity of an election held on the question of annexing a part of Berkeley county to the county of Charleston, and the very point in issue here was raised in that case, because it was alleged "that numerous persons (not named) were permitted to vote, whose votes were not legal because they had not paid their poll tax six months before the election." The election was held on May 9, 1916. In disposing of this question, the court (107 S. C. at page 215, 92 S. E. 481) says:

"Subdivision (a) of section 4, art. 2, of the Constitution prescribes as one of the prerequisites of the right to vote 'the payment six months before any election of any poll tax then due and payable,' and subdivision (e) of the same section requires of every person offering to vote 'proof of the payment of all taxes, including poll tax, assessed against him and collectible during the previous year.' By the plain terms of the Constitution these provisions apply to all persons offering to vote at any election. Therefore it makes no difference whether it is a general or a special election. The purpose of the lawmakers was to stimulate due performance by the citizens of their duty to support the government, and penalize delinquency in that regard, and forestall the evil practice sometimes resorted to by those interested in elections of indirectly purchasing votes by paying the taxes of delinquents immediately before an election to qualify them to vote therein. It was not intended to penalize by disqualifying one who had not become delinquent in the matter of paying his taxes. One who merely takes advantage of a privilege extended to him by the law is not in default. Therefore, although the taxes for the year 1915 were payable at any time between October 15th and December 31st, without penalty, all electors who paid their taxes on or before December 31st were not in default, and were entitled to vote in any election held after that date, if otherwise qualified. But those who failed to pay their taxes on or before December 31st were disqualified from voting in any election held within six months thereafter. The undisputed evidence shows that some 10 or 12 persons were permitted to vote in this election whose poll tax was paid after December 31, 1915. These votes were illegal; and, as there were enough of them to have changed the result, and as the poll could not have been purged of them because it did not appear how they voted, the election was thereby vitiated." (Italics are supplied in above quotation).

The same question appears to have been raised in the case of Wright v. State Board of Canvassers, 76 S. C. 574,² and it appears in the opinion of the court, by inference at least, that it is necessary for a prospective voter at an election to offer proof of the payment of his taxes during the year previous to said election. On page 592 of the report (57 S. E. 542), in affirming the judgment of the Circuit Judge, Chief Justice Pope stated:

"We see no fault in the conclusion of the circuit judge holding it mandatory that each voter should, as a prerequisite to voting, produce his registration certificate. Nor is there any fault in the view of the circuit judge in holding that it was mandatory that every voter should, as a prerequisite to voting, offer proof of his having paid his taxes during the previous year. This was not done in this case at the precincts at Laurens and Clinton. No certificate or receipt of the officer authorized to collect such taxes was produced. The only matter referred to is the oath of the voter that he was qualified to vote. This will not answer the demands of the Constitution and statute. And inasmuch as there were classed as legal voters hundreds who did not produce certificates of registration and proof of payment of taxes of previous year, the election is void." (Italics are supplied).

This question, therefore, as it appears to me, having been expressly decided by our Supreme Court, I do not think the decision was obiter dictum, or that it would be proper for me to undertake to reconsider the matter now, or to overrule the decision of that court, especially when such question involves a construction of the Constitution of the state. It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the decision of the state board of canvassers, holding said election to be void, be, and the same is hereby, affirmed.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 10, 1921.)

1. Deeds \Leftrightarrow 24, 130—Deed held to give remaindermen a fee as a covenant to stand seized to uses.

A deed conveying land to the grantor's daughter during her lifetime, but reserving a life estate to the grantor, and conveying such land on the death of the daughter to such of her children as might be then living, without any words of inheritance, will be construed as a covenant to stand seized to uses, and hence as passing a fee to the takers after the daughter.

2. Deeds \Leftrightarrow 149—Condition against alienation held valid and not sufficient reason shown for disregarding.

Where a mother, in conveying land to a daughter during her lifetime with a life estate reserved to the mother, and after the daughter's death to such of the daughter's children as might then be living, because of the thriftlessness of the daughter's husband, provided in the deed that the land should not be alienated during the daughter's lifetime, the condition was lawful, and must be respected unless there is a necessity for disregarding it, and it is not a sufficient reason for disregarding it that the husband will squander the income from part of the property and allow other property to deteriorate, and that it will be better for the contingent remaindermen to anticipate the enjoyment of their estate.

3. Life estates \Rightarrow 27(2)—Decree for sale of land and reinvestment notwithstanding condition against alienation held to contain improper provisions.

A decree ordering a sale of land conveyed to a woman for life with contingent remainders to her children, notwithstanding a provision in the deed against alienation, and directing a trustee to reinvest the proceeds in property to be taken in trust for the woman and two children, improperly provided that they should pay the taxes, insurance, and repairs, without providing what should be done if they failed to make such payments, as these provisions were not self-executing.

Appeal from Common Pleas, Circuit Court of Greenville County; T. J. Mauldin, Judge.

Suit by Henrietta E. Gaines and others against Mary Virginia Sullivan and others. From a decree for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

The decree ordered a sale of the property involved and payment of the net proceeds to a trustee and directed the trustee to invest $8,500 thereof in a house and lot to be conveyed to him in trust to permit Mrs. Gaines to use and occupy it free of rent, but charged with repairs, maintenance, insurance, taxes, and assessments during her natural lifetime, and to purchase other houses and lots to be conveyed to him in trust for each of the two daughters of Mrs. Gaines. It also contains provisions as to the title after the death of Mrs. Gaines.

Martin & Blythe, of Greenville, for appellants.

Cothran, Dean & Cothran, of Greenville, for respondents.

FRASER, J. The circuit decree contains this statement:

"John W. Stokes, a lawyer of the Greenville bar, and his wife, Mary K. Stokes, owned a considerable amount of real estate, a part of it was a lot in the city of Greenville, and the remainder farming land in the country. They had three children, daughters, Mrs. Gaines, Mrs. Sullivan, and Mrs. Hunter.

"Beginning as far back as 1877 and extending as late as 1893, Mr. and Mrs. Stokes made sundry several conveyances, deeds of gift, to their three daughters. Those deeds are described in the complaint and need not be again described in this decree, except certain clauses therein which are involved in this controversy and which will be more particularly referred to hereinafter.

"The conveyances to Mrs. Hunter were in fee simple, without any conditions or limitations; they are not here involved. The conveyances by Mary K. Stokes to Mrs. Gaines were three in number and require more particular description."

Each of the deeds forbade the sale of the land during the life of Mrs. Gaines. This action is brought to construe the deeds and seeks a sale of some of the land, notwithstanding the prohibition.

"The conveyance was to 'Henrietta E. Gaines during her lifetime only and on the condition hereinafter set forth.' It contains the proviso: 'That said tract of land shall be held, used, and exclusively employed by my said daughter for the annual or yearly support of herself and her children jointly during the natural life of my said daughter, the rents, issues, profits, and income to be paid to her individually and personally and to no one else every year and on her own personal receipt for the same. The said tract of land shall not be sold or alienated in any manner or form whatever by my said daughter or any other person during her natural life, nor be liable for her debts or the debts of herself and children or any of them.' It contained also the following provision, and it is the only one of the three deeds that does: 'If the said land should be sold, alienated, or disposed of in the lifetime of my said daughter, or if any attempt should be made by process of law to subject said tract of land or the rents, issues, profits, or income of the same to the payment of the debts of my said daughter and her children or those of either or any of them, then in either event as alternative said tract of land shall revert to my estate and become a part and parcel of my estate.' It also contained the following limitation: 'I give and convey said tract of land on the death of my said daughter to such of her children as may survive her or be living at her death, share and share alike'—with a provision for representation by children of such child as might die in the lifetime of Mrs. Gaines. It contained this reservation: 'I hereby reserve unto myself the use and enjoyment of the rents, issues, and profits of said land and the absolute control and management of said tract of land during my natural life.' This conveyance was dated July 23, 1883."

[1] The appellant claims that the deed provides for only a life estate, first in Mrs. Gaines, and a life estate in her children. The respondent claims that the deed is a covenant to stand seized to uses, and the takers after Mrs. Gaines take a fee.

[2] The appellation "a covenant to stand seized to uses" was in its origin a pure fiction, created to avoid the great hardship that followed inexpert conveyancing in which words of inheritance were ignorantly or negligently omitted. Whatever its origin, it is now well established as a rule of property. Its use in this case is preeminently just. The deed carries a fee to the takers after Mrs. Gaines. It seems that Mr. and Mrs. Stokes determined to divide their property between their children. They intended to part with the whole estate, reserving to themselves a life estate only. Beyond this life estate there was another life estate to the daughter Miss Gaines. Mrs. Gaines was given two plantations in the country and a house and lot in the city. It appears from the record that in their judgment Mrs. Gaines was fixed for life. She had a good home and an income. That is, Mrs. Gaines was safe for life, provided her "thrifless" husband did not induce her to dispose of the property. That was the danger. In order to guard against that danger, a sale was forbidden in Mrs. Gaine's lifetime. It is conceded that Mrs. Gaines has a "thrifless" husband. This husband is to be guarded against, and the defense of the daughter is to forbid the sale in the daughter's lifetime. The court is now asked to put its judgment against the judgment of the grantor, who owned the property and had the right to give it away absolutely, or with conditions. Mrs. Stokes gave the property with the condition that it should not be sold during a life in being. The condition was lawful and must be respected and upheld, unless there is a necessity. No necessity has been shown. The reasons urged are two, i. e.: (a) The thrifless husband will squander the income from the plantations and allow the city property to deteriorate; (b) it will well serve the contingent remaindermen to anticipate the enjoyment of their estate. Neither of these amounts to a necessity.

[3] In no event can the plan provided for in the decree be approved. Writing into a decree that those who occupy the new bought houses (even if the hazardous scheme of building be not adopted shall pay taxes, insurance, and repairs are not self-executing provisions, and if they do not do so as directed, what then? While legal proceedings are being perfected to enforce the decree, the houses may burn down, uninsured, and the land sold for taxes, and another sale may be necessary to make repairs.

The decree, in that it provides for a sale of the property in anticipation of the time set in the deed, is reversed.

2. Deeds \S 196(2)—No presumption of fraud in conveyance from parent to child.

The mere fact that a parent deeds property to a child raises no presumption of undue influence, overreaching, wrong, or fraud, such as to shift the burden to the child to show that there was none.

3. Deeds \S 192—Party attacking deed has burden of overcoming presumption of its validity.

A deed properly executed is presumed to be what it purports to be, and one assailing it has the burden of rebutting this presumption.

4. Contracts \S 99(1)—Where fiduciary relation exists between parties to transaction, the burden of showing good faith rests with the superior party.

Where there is a fiduciary relation between parties, and a business transaction occurs between them, and the superior party obtains the advantage or a possible benefit, a presumption arises against the validity of the transaction, and puts the burden of proving good faith on the superior party.

5. Contracts \S 94(1)—Secured by overpowering will of parties will not be upheld.

Where person has a weak understanding, if the proof is of such weakness as incapacitates or dangerously near borders on incapacity, if the nature of the contract warrants the conclusion that it was not the exercise of deliberate judgment, but that the judgment of another has been imposed in the place of his judgment by cunning, artifice, overpersuasion, and undue influence, the contract will not be upheld.

cult decree must be affirmed, unless the appellant can convince this court that their findings are against the weight of the testimony.

[2] The laity, in part, and some of the bar, seem to think that when a father conveys to a child there is a presumption of fraud, wrong, or undue influence. Such is not the law. There is no presumption, from the mere fact the parent deeded property to a child, of undue influence, overreaching, wrong, or fraud, that shifts the burden to the child to show there was none. The peculiar circumstances and facts of each case must determine this.

[3, 4] A deed ordinarily, when properly executed, is presumed to be what it purports to be. And the party assailing it is charged with the burden of rebutting this presumption and proving his case. He who avers and charges must ordinarily prove. The burden of proof is on him. Where there is a fiduciary relation between parties, and a business transaction occurs between them, and the superior party obtains the advantage, or a possible benefit, equity will closely scrutinize the transaction and raise a presumption against the validity of the same and throw the burden on him to prove good faith.

[5] Where a person is of weak understanding, if the proof is of such weakness as incapacitates or dangerously near borders on incapacity, if the nature of the contract warrants the conclusion that it was not the exercise of deliberate judgment, but that the judgment of another has been imposed in the place of his judgment, by cunning, artifice, overpersuasion, and undue influence, the contract will not be upheld. In the case at bar it is not one of principal and agent; it is of father and son.

[6] The son did not live with his father; he lived in another county; he did not start the negotiations which ended in the conveyance; the father did. The family knew what was going on in reference to the matter, including the "in-laws." There was no concealment as to what was going on.

There is no doubt but that the plaintiff is old and had physical infirmities, due to age, but we cannot conclude from his evidence, and that of others, that he was mentally incapacitated to such an extent as not to know what he was doing, and that his solemn deed of conveyance should be set aside; that he should be allowed to get out of what some of his family and his neighbors think to be a bad trade on his part.

The facts of the case were not such as were the facts in Craddock v. Weekley, 85 S. C. 329, 67 S. E. 308, and Devlin v. Devlin, 89 S. C. 268, 71 S. E. 966, but the principles applicable are those announced by Mr. Justice Hydrick in the last case.

The consideration was a valuable one; the deed was properly executed and delivered; no concealment; a neighbor drew the deed; it was properly witnessed. There is no preponderating evidence of fraud, undue influence, or overpersuading, such as to overreach the father and substitute the judgment of the son for that of the father; in executing the deed the father exercised his will and judgment, and should not, under the evidence, circumstances, and facts, be allowed to repudiate his solemn act.

The exceptions are sustained and judgment reversed.

COTHRAN, J. (dissenting). I am satisfied that the findings of the master who had all the witnesses before him, concurred in by the circuit judge upon the facts and the law of the case, are not overborne by the testimony for the defendant, but are supported by the weight of the testimony.

SLIGH v. SOVEREIGN CAMP, W. O. W.
(No. 10721.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 10, 1920.)

Insurance ~~665~~ 665(3)—Evidence held not to show insured knew or should have known he had pleurisy when examined.

In an action on a life insurance policy, questions in the application which as to whether insured had consulted a physician within five years and had had pleurisy, were answered "No," testimony while tending to show that he had had pleurisy, held not to show that he knew or should have known it when examined.

Cothran, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Richland County Court; M. S. Whaley, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth L. Sligh against the Sovereign Camp of the Woodmen of the World. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Melton & Belser, of Columbia, for appellant.

E. J. Best and E. W. Mullins, both of Columbia, for respondent.

FRASER, J. R. E. Sligh took out a policy of insurance with the appellant. The principal questions in this case arise from the answers to two questions: Have you consulted a physician within five years? and Have you had pleurisy? Both questions were answered "No" in the written application. The testimony tends to show that Sligh had a case of pleurisy, but it fails to show that Sligh knew it, or should have known it, when Sligh was examined for life insurance. The record shows from the testimony of Dr. Butler, who examined Sligh for the appellant, as follows:

"Doctor, something has been said here in respect to the question here whether or not he had been treated by a physician for five years prior to the application here for insurance. Now, please state whether or not you explained that clause to him at the time that you filled it in in your handwriting here. A. I asked him this question, whether he had been treated in the last five years by a physician for any of the following diseases laid down there. He said, 'No.' 'Had you been in bed treated through a long spell of sickness?' He said, 'No.' "

"Q. Did you explain to him what you meant? A. Anything that incapacitated him or affected his eligibility for insurance.

"Q. Did you explain that to him? A. Yes, sir. He said, 'No.'

"Q. State whether or not he denied that a physician had attended him for some trouble before? A. He said 'No' to my questions. That is all I know. My record speaks for itself.

"Q. Yes, sir. You say you explained to him what you meant? A. Yes, sir. Long spell of sickness.

"Q. Such sickness that impaired his eligibility for insurance? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You so explained to him in answer to that question there? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Whether he had been treated by a physician in five years? A. Yes, sir. I went by what was told me in forming my opinion.

"Q. Doctor, necessarily you would not have passed him if he had not stood a good physical examination? A. I would not have examined him.

"Q. State whether or not you made a careful examination of him. A. I would not let the examination go in if he was not eligible for it.

"Q. State whether or not he was sound in every respect from that standpoint. A. It seemed so to me.

"Q. Of health? A. It seemed so to me. Active; came in without his coat on; had been working all day.

"Q. At the time you took his application, he was sound in every respect. A. It seemed so to me. I formed a history of the case—what he tells me—whether or not to let him go on.

"Q. State whether or not, Doctor, you read this question here, which enumerates many different things, among others, the word 'pleurisy.' A. Read over all of it.

"Q. State whether the word 'pleurisy' is not included among many other things here. A. That is included.

"Q. In a great list of things? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You asked him whether or not he had been treated by a physician within five years? A. For any of those diseases wrote down.

"Q. Which would impair his eligibility for insurance? A. Yes; and he said 'No.'

"Q. He didn't deny he had been treated once or twice by a physician? A. Oh, for some minor trouble. He said he never had been in bed.

"Q. But he admitted he had been treated by a physician for some minor trouble? A. Yes. He consulted Dr. Du Bose for a cold, he said.

"Q. So he didn't deny that any doctor had attended him in the last five years? A. No.

"Q. And he specifically admitted that Dr. Du Bose had attended him? A. Yes.

"Q. Doctor, how long have you been examining for the Woodmen of the World? A. About 14 years.

"Q. Fourteen years."

Cross-examination:

"By Mr. Belser:

"Q. Doctor, you know that pleurisy is a very serious disease? A. Pleurisy is an inflammation of the pleura covering the lungs.

"Q. And one of the diseases that very frequently leads to consumption. A. Sometimes. But I have seen the fluid extracted, and they get over it very quickly.

"Q. And very frequently, and in the majority of the cases, pleurisy is followed by consumption—tuberculosis? A. Not in the majority of cases. It is possible, though, in a good many cases, because in pleurisy there is but one thing involved; that is the serous membrane covering the lungs.

"Q. Is it a serious illness? A. Yes.

"Q. That is, when one has to be punctured and draw off the fluid? A. Yes.

"Q. And if you had treated a man for pleurisy and had to draw off a good deal of fluid, you would consider that he had consulted you. A. He could be relieved entirely.

"Q. You would consider that he consulted you? A. Oh, yes.

"Q. Is it a serious illness? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. This application—of course, you are the camp physician? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. For this camp? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And you know what your duties are? A. I think I do.

"Q. And of course you carried them out? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And this says: 'The camp physician will require the applicant to answer the following questions separately.' Of course, you did that, and you explained to him the names of those diseases here, and he answered, when you asked him if he had a chronic cough, consumption, or grip or pleurisy, that he had not had it. That is what is written down here. And you asked him had he consulted or been attended by a physician for any disease or injury during the past five years? A. Injury, disease of extended character, impairing his liability [eligibility] for insurance, and he said 'No.' "

When Dr. Du Bose was on the stand he did not testify that he had told Sligh that he had pleurisy, but did testify:

"I thought Mr. Sligh had gotten over his first attack very fully."

When Sligh went to Dr. Butler, the Company's physician, for examination, he went in his shirt sleeves from his work, and, so far as Dr. Butler could ascertain from his examination, Sligh was a sound man. Sligh had another spell of pleurisy, and died of tubercular meningitis within a year after the policy was issued.

This is a very much stronger case for the respondent than the case of Wingo v. Insurance Co., 112 S. C. 139, 99 S. E. 436; Id., 101 S. E. 653. Sligh told the examining physician all that the record shows that he knew. So far as the record shows, he was a sound man when the policy was issued. If life insurance policies issued as this was, are to be upset after the death of the insured by reason of some fact unknown to the insured, then life insurance policies are liabilities, and not assets.

The judgment is affirmed.

GARY, C. J., and WATTS, J., concur.

COTHRAN, J. (dissenting). The facts appear to be as follows:

On June 20, 1919, the defendant, which I shall refer to for convenience as the Company, issued to R. E. Sligh, member of a local camp, a beneficiary certificate for $1,000, payable at his death; the amount however to be reduced to $500 in the event of his death within the first year of his membership. The plaintiff was designated as the beneficiary. The insured died on January 8, 1920, within the first year, of tubercular meningitis, and upon refusal of the Company to pay the insurance this action was brought, resulting in a verdict, July 8, 1920, in favor of the plaintiff for $500.

The Company's defense was that the insured had, in his application for membership, made false representations relating to two material matters: (1) That he had never had pleurisy; and (2) that he had not been treated by a physician for any disease during the past five years; that his answers to the questions involving these matters were constituted warranties, under the terms of the application, certificate, and rules of the organization; and that accordingly the certificate was void.

The trial judge ruled that the answers were not warranties, but were simply representations, which would not avoid the policy unless these conditions were made to appear by the defendant: (1) That the representations were false; (2) that they were material to the risk; (3) that the Company acted upon them when it issued the certificate; (4) that the insured, at the time he made them, knew that they were false.

The appeal challenges the correctness of this ruling, the defendant particularly contending that the answers were warranties, and not representations simply, and that, if so, it was not incumbent upon the defendant to show that the insured knew that they were false. This presents the vital question in the appeal, it appearing beyond dispute that the insured in April, 1919, had an attack of pleurisy, on account of which he was operated upon by a physician in a Columbia Hospital, and detained there several days under treatment.

It cannot be denied that the Company had the right to impose the conditions referred to; the testimony shows that the seeds of pleurisy in many instances develop into the disease of which the insured died in less than a year. It cannot be denied that the answers were material to the risk. It cannot be denied that the answers were, in point of fact, if not intention, untrue. If the Company had the right to contract with the insured that these answers should be deemed warranties, and not representations, and it did so contract, the question resolves itself into this: Will the court accord to the defendant the right to stand upon a valid contract, or approve the submission of that right to a sympathetic jury upon the issue of the knowledge of the insured that the representations were false; an issue which, viewing the answers as warranties, is entirely irrelevant?

My conviction is that, when parties come before this court relying upon a valid, legal contract, knowingly entered into without fraud or imposition, they should be required to abide by the terms of their convention.

Were these answers, then, warranties or representations? I do not think that the case of Wingo v. Ins. Co., 112 S. C. 139, 99 S. E. 436, cited by counsel for respondent and in the leading opinion, is at all applicable to the facts of this case, for the reason that there were two distinct issues in that case: (1) Was he at the time of the application, as a matter of fact, afflicted with tuberculosis? (2) If so, did he knowingly conceal this fact and represent to the contrary? Upon the first issue the court held that the testimony was conflicting and the issue should have been submitted to the jury. It held also that the second issue should also have been submitted.

In the case at bar, there is no issue as to the fact that in April, 1919, two months only from the date of the application, the insured had an attack of pleurisy; there can be no doubt of that. The second issue becomes unimportant in the case at bar if the answers be deemed warranties.

The question whether or not the insured was a sound man at the time the certificate was issued, the affirmative of which the leading opinion so strongly relies upon, is to my mind entirely foreign to the real issue in the case. Assuming that he was perfectly sound at that time, this fact cannot relieve the disastrous effect of having made two distinct misrepresentations at the time of his application, which, if construed to be warranties, avoid the policy ab initio.

It is impossible for me to reconcile the leading opinion with the decision of this court in the case of Gambrill v. Ins. Co., 83 S. C. 236, 65 S. E. 231, which in one of its aspects presents a stronger case for the plaintiff than the case at bar. There the insured signed an application June 18, 1906, in which he warranted his answers to be true, and in which he stated that he had not received any medical or surgical treatment during the past five years. It appeared that he had had an illness in December, 1905, and had then been operated upon in a hospital; the operating physician stated that he did not know at that time that the insured had cancer; thought it was a tumor, and did not notify the patient that he had cancer until August, 1906, after the policy was issued; he died in April, 1907. The case was tried by a magistrate, who rendered judgment for the plaintiff. Upon appeal, the circuit court reversed the magistrate's judgment, and upon appeal to this court the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed. This court, in an unanimous judgment, the opinion being written by the present Chief Justice, held:

"The statement which the assured warranted to be true was that he had not had medical or surgical treatment within the past five years, and he knew, or is presumed to know, that this statement was false. The fact that he did not know that he had cancer until August, 1906, did not destroy the effect of the statement which he knew, or is presumed to have known, was false, and which he warranted to be true."

This in reply to the exceptions which contended that, as the insured did not know until August, 1906, that he had cancer, he could not be held to have obtained the policy by a false representation.

Upon an examination of the several papers agreed to be parts of the certificate, and of the certificate itself, I am persuaded that if they do not, by agreement, constitute the answers warranties, and not representations, the English language is without a sufficient vehicle to convey that intention. The application provides:

"This application * * * shall constitute the basis for and form a part of any beneficiary certificate that may be issued."

It also provides:

"I hereby certify, agree and warrant that all the statements, representations and answers in this application * * * are full, complete and true * * * and I agree that any untrue statements or answers made by me in this application * * * intentionally or otherwise * * * my beneficiary certificate shall become void."

The insured signed the application under this declaration:

"I declare and warrant the foregoing answers and statements to be correct."

The certificate itself contained, by reference to indorsement thereon, the following:

"The consideration of this certificate is the application and medical examination on which the sovereign physician based his acceptance and approval of the application of the person within named for membership, and it was issued in consideration of the representations, warranties and agreements made by the said person in his application to become a member, and in his medical examination as accepted and approved by the sovereign physician."

Also the following:

"If any of the statements or declarations in the application for membership, and upon the faith of which the certificate was issued, shall be found in any respect untrue, the certificate shall be null and void."

The insured signed the certificate under this declaration:

"I have read the above certificate * * * and the conditions thereof and hereby agree to and accept the same."

The constitution and by-laws of the order contained the following, which, under the terms of the application and certificate, became a part of the certificate:

"If any of the statements or declarations in the application for membership, and upon the faith of which the certificate was issued, shall be found in any respect untrue, the certificate shall be null and void."

That it was the intention of the Company to constitute the answers warranties, does not admit of doubt; that the contract agreed to by the insured, fully expresses that intention is equally certain; that it was a legal contract no one would question; has the defendant not the legal right, then, to stand upon the contract as it was entered into?

The suggestion, that an adverse ruling upon the plaintiff's demand in this case would convert an insurance policy from an asset into a liability is epigrammatic, but far afield of the point at issue. In many instances the policy has developed into a liability, to the disappointment of the holder, who anticipated an asset. The question at issue is, What was the contract between the parties, and will the court enforce what the parties have solemnly agreed to, regardless of the regretful consequences to either party?

The respective interests of the insurer and the insured depend so vitally upon the issue whether certain statements of the insured shall be taken as warranties or simply as representations, that we are not surprised that hundreds of cases have involved the question. Construed as warranties, the falsity of the statement amounts to an express breach of the contract, regardless of the good faith and honest purposes of the insured, and in some cases it has been held, regardless of the materiality of the statement; construed as representations, the falsity of the statement may render the contract voidable when it is shown to have been material to the risk and knowingly made.

The first attracting point of difference between a representation and a warranty is that a representation is a part of the proceedings which propose a contract, not in-incorporated into the contract directly or by reference, while a warranty "is a part of the completed contract, either expressly inserted therein, or appearing therein by express reference to statements expressly made a part thereof." 3 Joyce, Ins. (2d. Ed.) § 1882, citing Well v. Insurance Co., 47 La. Ann. 1405, 17 South. 853; McArthur on Ins. p. 5; Ellis on Ins. 18; Hammond on Ins. 82. This distinction furnishes the primary test in solving the problem, and it leads to the tentative conclusion in favor of a warranty; for the statements which otherwise would constitute only the preliminaries to the formal contract are inducted into the certificate, and made a part of it by the clearest form of reference. In the next place, the intention to do so is evidenced as we have seen by the most explicit terms.

It is conceded that statements denominated "warranties" by the most emphatic and specific declarations in the certificate to that effect will be held to be representations, if there should be contradictory provisions showing a purpose to treat them as such, and not as warranties, or explanatory expressions indicating the same purpose. Thus it was held in Bank v. Insurance Co., 95 U. S. 673, 24 L. Ed. 563, that, although in one part of the policy the insured stipulated that his statements should be deemed warranties, in another part the statements referred to were such as should be considered material to the risk, or of facts within the knowledge of the insured, the statements should be considered representations, for the reason that their classification was appropriate to representations, and not warranties. So in McClain v. Assur. Soc., 110 Fed. 80, 49 C. C. A. 31, where the statements were characterized as such as were fraudulent; and in many other cases cited to the notes in 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 981, the same principle is announced.

It will be observed that there is absolutely nothing in the terms of any of the papers connected with this transaction which lends color to a limitation or contradiction of the provisions so clearly indicating a purpose to make the statements warranties. Bacon defines a warranty thus in section 243 (4th Ed.) of his work on Life and Accident Insurance:

"It is a stipulation, inserted in a writing on the face of the policy, on the literal truth or fulfillment of which the validity of the entire contract depends. A stipulation is considered to be on the face of the policy or it may be written in the margin or on another piece of paper or referred to in the policy."

In section 245 the author declares:

"If a contract of life insurance declares that the statements made in the application are warranted to be true, and the policy shall be void if they are untrue, the falsity of such statements will defeat the insurance."

"To justify a recovery on a fraternal benefit certificate the answers to the questions in the application for the certificate must be true." National Council v. Wilson, 147 Ky. 293, 143 S. W. 1000; Green v. National Annuity, 90 Kan. 523, 153 Pac. 586.

False statements made warranties in the application preclude recovery. The Homesteaders v. Briggs (Tex. Civ. App.) 166 S. W. 95; Finch v. M. W. A., 113 Mich. 646, 71 N. W. 1104; Alden v. Supreme Tent, 178 N. Y. 535, 71 N. E. 104. False representation in the application that applicant had never suffered from syphilis defeats the certificate. Sovereign Camp v. Cooper (Tex. Civ. App.) 208 S. W. 550. Applicant stated he had consulted one physician (naming him) within seven years for pleurisy, and recovery was complete. Evidence disclosed that he had died of consumption, and had been treated by another doctor for a serious ailment, and that the applicant only disclosed part of the truth. The court held that the statements in the application were warranties, and that they must be strictly and literally true. Modern Woodmen v. Hall (Ind. App.) 121 N. E. 835. It was expressly agreed that applicant was in sound health; that he had never been afflicted with tuberculosis, and had not consulted or been attended by a physician within five years. The court held that the form of contract made the statements warranties, and that a breach of warranties constituted a good defense. Sov. Camp, W. O. W., v. McDonald, 76 Fla. 599, 80 So. 566. 3 Joyce on Ins. § 1944, defines a warranty thus:

"An express warranty is a particular stipulation inserted on the face of the policy, or clearly embodied therein as a part thereof by proper words of reference, whereby the assured agrees that certain facts are or shall be true, or that certain acts have been or shall be done, and upon the literal truth or exact fulfillment of which stipulation concerning the same the validity of the contract depends."

And in section 1956a:

"It is undoubted that parties may, within legal limitations, stipulate that statements, whether material or immaterial, shall constitute warranties, and when so made they will, if untrue or false, avoid the contract; * * * and an untrue statement concerning a matter of fact that is, or ought to be, within the personal knowledge of an applicant for life insurance, constitutes a breach of warranty, and renders the policy void, where the policy makes the answers and statements contained in the application warranties, and constitutes them a part of the contract."

And in section 1962:

"Where it clearly appears by the express terms of the policy or from the entire contract that a warranty was intended, the materiality of the fact, matter, or circumstance warranted is not a subject of inquiry in aid of the assured; for the latter in such case will be held strictly to his contract, however immaterial the matter warranted may be, so that a breach of the warranty may be availed of, the policy be avoided, and assurer be thereby discharged from liability, whether the warranty be material to the risk or not, for the warranty being so made a part of the contract makes the matter material and its falsity precludes recovery."

And in section 2003:

"If the policy stipulates that the answers in relation to the health and condition of the assured are the basis of the contract, and that if the same are not absolutely full, true, and correct the contract will be void, or if words of like meaning are used, in such case untruthful or incorrect answers to specific questions avoid the policy, though in relation to immaterial matters. * * * Again, a misrepresentation as to the health or symptoms of a certain disease in answer to specific questions, the statements being made a part of the policy, stipulated to be true and the basis of the contract, binds the assured to correct answers; otherwise the policy will be void, even though the statements be inadvertently or innocently made, and whether designedly untrue or undesignedly so."

In Metropolitan Co. v. Brubaker, 78 Kan. 146, 96 Pac. 62, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 362, 130 Am. St. Rep. 358, 16 Ann. Cas. 267, it is said:

"An applicant for life insurance, who from motives of his own has sought and obtained a professional interview with a physician regarding the state of his health, cannot truthfully answer the question referred to in the negative merely because the interview concerned some temporary ailment or indisposition, slight in character and not seriously affecting health. The fact of a consultation with a physician does not depend upon the gravity of the subject of the interview. * * *

"Very often men who are not strictly honest seek insurance on their lives, and a life insurance company may properly be allowed to take full precautions against deathbed insurance. It is entirely reasonable that such a company should ask an applicant for insurance if he has consulted a physician. The question is simple and unambiguous. It is not like questions relating to illness, which may call for the opinion and judgment of the applicant upon a debatable matter hard to decide. It involves nothing which the applicant cannot answer categorically out of his own personal knowledge. It relates to a fact which may be recollected, as well as an illness. The question is important, because, if an affirmative answer be given, the company may make an investigation, and ascertain the exact truth regarding the cause for the consultation, and the state of health it revealed, or ought to have revealed. It requires no argument to show that the action of the company may well be influenced by the answer to this question."

In Cobb v. Covenant Mut. Ben. Ass'n, 153 Mass. 176, 26 N. E. 230, 10 L. R. A. 686, 25 Am. St. Rep. 619, it is said:

"The sixth question [put to applicant] in form A of the application was, 'Have you personally consulted a physician, been prescribed for or professionally treated within the past ten years?' To this question the insured answered 'No.' * * * The plaintiff contended that such an issue should only be found against her in case the answer was intentionally false. In our view, the insured having made the truth of his statements the basis of his contract, it was sufficient for the defendant to show that this statement was actually untrue. * * *

"While the question whether [the insured] had a fixed disease, and what the disease was, might be an inquiry involved in considerable embarrassment, the question whether he had consulted a physician, or had been professionally treated by one, was simple, and one about which there could be no misunderstanding. Had it been replied to in the affirmative, the answer would have led to other inquiries. Indeed the question which follows [which remained unanswered] is, 'If so, give dates and for what disease.' It is upon the existence of this latter question that the plaintiff founds an argument that it was necessary to show that [the insured] had some distinct disease permanently affecting his general health before it could be said that he answered this question untruthfully. But the scope of the question cannot be thus narrowed. Even if [the insured] had only visited a physician from time to time for temporary disturbances, proceeding from accidental causes, the defendant had a right to know this in order that it might make such further investigation as it deemed necessary. By answering the question in the negative the applicant induced the defendant to refrain from doing this."

The leading opinion concludes: "Sligh told the examining physician all that the record shows that he knew." Did he? If he did not know that he had had an attack of pleurisy, he certainly knew that he had been operated upon by a surgeon in the hospital, and had been confined there several days, and yet he made the statement that he had not been attended by a physician in five years! Nor was it material for the defense that Sligh knew that he had had pleurisy. He warranted that he had not; that warranty was breached. The opinion further states: "He was a sound man when the policy was issued." That may be true, but it is a fact entirely aside from the issue whether or not he had breached his warranty.

If, therefore, the statements, admittedly untrue, were warranties, and not simply representations, it followed that the court was in error in the matters complained of by the defendant, and that the judgment should be reversed.

ATLANTA & C. A. L. RY. CO. et al. v. CITY OF EASLEY et al. (No. 10738.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 10, 1921.)

1. Dedication §20(1)—Railroads §82(2)—Railroad permitting right of way to be used as street estopped from claiming easement.

A railroad, having permitted its right of way to be used by the public as a street, and to be kept in repair as such by city authorities, for over 30 years, and having permitted storehouses and other buildings to be constructed thereon, was estopped from claiming an easement therein precluding assessment of abutting property for street improvements, having thereby abandoned easement and dedicated street to use of public.

2. Eminent domain §318—Railroad acquires mere easement in highway for roadbed.

Under Civ. Code 1912, § 8300, railroad constructing track along a public highway acquires easement merely in that portion necessary for its roadbed.

3. Municipal corporations §434(6)—Railroad property abutting on street not exempt from assessment for street improvements.

Railroad property abutting on street is not exempt from assessment for street improvements under Const. art. 10, § 18, notwithstanding use of such property for railroad purposes.

4. Evidence §5(2)—Judicial notice taken of benefit to railroads from good streets.

In action involving validity of assessment of railroad property for street improvements, the court knows that good roads and good streets are a great factor in human happiness, as well as a great benefit to the territory in which they are, and that good streets facilitate transportation and benefit the business of the railroad.

5. Constitutional law §290(3) — Municipal Corporations §407(1)—Assessment of railroad property by front foot rule without hearing not taking of property without due process of law.

Assessment of railroad property abutting on street for street improvements upon the basis of feet frontage, without giving the railroad company an opportunity to be heard, does not constitute the taking of property without due process of law in violation of the Constitution.

6. Municipal corporations §515(1)—Defect in street improvement ordinance for want of legislative authority cured by subsequent enactment of statute.

Assessment under street improvement ordinance unauthorized at time of enactment, but ratified by Act Feb. 21, 1919 (81 St. at Large, p. 585), held valid, the defect for want of prior legislation being cured by subsequent enactment of statute.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Pickens County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

Action by the Atlanta & Charlotte Air Line Railway Company and others against the City of Easley, S. C., and others. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Following is the decree of the court below:

This is an action to enjoin the collection of assessments for street improvement in the city of Easley, S. C., levied against the property of the plaintiffs, Atlanta & Charlotte Air Line Railway Company, and its lessee, Southern Railway Company. When the action was filed the Director General of Railroads was in possession and control of said railroads, and was made a party plaintiff. But the said railroads have been turned back to their owners and the Director General has no further interest in this suit. The real contest is between the plaintiffs, Atlanta & Charlotte Air Line Railway Company and Southern Railway Company, which will be for convenience hereinafter called the plaintiffs, and the city of Easley, which will be called the defendant. The validity of the assessments is attacked on several grounds. The first contention of the plaintiffs is that said assessments were levied without authority, were unconstitutional when levied and that the curative or validating act of the Legislature passed thereafter could not and did not render them valid and binding, but that they are null and void, and cannot be enforced. The facts out of which this contention arises are as follows:

The General Assembly, at the session of 1917, passed an act ratifying a constitutional amendment to article 10 of the Constitution of the state, which provided that "The General Assembly may authorize the town of Clinton and the city of Easley to levy an assessment upon abutting property to pay for permanent improvements on streets and sidewalks immediately abutting said property." Act 1917, p. 228. Without any act being passed authorizing such levy, the city of Easley, on December 16, 1917, and thereafter, passed ordinances providing for the levy of said assessments and the collection thereof, and all proceedings relating thereto. The plaintiffs refused to pay the assessments levied against their right of way on the ground that said assessments were unauthorized and illegal and void. By an act of the General Assembly approved February 21, 1919, an attempt was made to validate, ratify, and confirm all acts and proceedings had and taken by the city of Easley in levying assessments on abutting property. Acts 1919, p. 585. By an act of the Legislature approved March 10, 1919, the city of Easley was authorized to levy such assessments as the constitutional amendment provided for. Acts 1919, p. 84. I do not see that the last-named act has anything to do with the questions involved, as it was passed long after the assessments were levied and after the validating act was passed. So that the real question here is: Did the ratifying act have the effect of validating the assessments? I do not think it did.

It was held in the case of Mauldin v. City Council of Greenville, 53 S. C. 285, 31 S. E. 252, 43 L. R. A. 101, 69 Am. St. Rep. 855, that such local assessments were unconstitutional and void. This was the law at the time the assessments in question were levied, and consequently, when the city of Easley passed its ordinances for the levy and collection of the same, such ordinances were unconstitutional and void. Does the amendment change the situation? It required legislative authority as a condition precedent to levying said assessments. It was not self-executing, but simply provided that the General Assembly may authorize said assessments. Until such authority was given, the city of Easley was without power, authority, or jurisdiction to pass any ordinance on the subject. Such ordinances were mere nullities. The plaintiffs had the right to regard them as absolutely void, and to ratify them as sought by the city of Easley would be such taking of property as would be a lack of due process of law. In no case can the Legislature authorize the violation of the Constitution or validate an unconstitutional act. State v. Whitesides, 30 S. C. 579, 9 S. E. 661, 3 L. R. A. 777; Hodge v. School District, 80 S. C. 518, 61 S. E. 1009. Curative acts can remedy irregularities in judicial proceedings, but cannot cure void proceedings. Black, Constitutional Prohibitions, 208, 209. The Legislature may cure judicial acts which are void through irregularity in procedure. But where the court in which the proceedings were had possessed no jurisdiction, its acts cannot be validated. 12 Corpus Juris, 1093. I think the true rule on this subject is stated by the Supreme Court of this state in the case of Dove v. Kirkland, 92 S. C. 321, 75 S. E. 503, quoting from Cooley on Conn. Lim. as follows:

"A retrospective statute, curing defects in legal proceedings, where they are in their nature irregularities only, and do not extend to matters of jurisdiction, is not void on unconstitutional grounds, unless expressly forbidden. Of this class are the statutes to cure irregularities, in the assessment of property for taxation, and the levy of taxes thereon: irregularities in the votes or other action by municipal corporations, or the like, where a statutory power has failed of due and regular execution, through the carelessness of officers or other cause, irregular proceedings in courts, etc. The rule applicable to cases of this description is substantially the following: If the thing wanting, or which failed to be done, and which constitutes the defect in the proceedings, is something the necessity for which the Legislature might have dispensed with, by prior statute, then it is not beyond the power of the Legislature to dispense with it by subsequent statute. And if the irregularity consist in doing some act, it is equally competent to make the same immaterial by a subsequent law."

I think the foregoing is the correct rule upon the subject rather than the position taken by the defendant that the Legislature can validate any act which it might originally have authorized. This rule is subject to the limitation that there must have been in effect at the time the acts were performed some valid law authorizing the proceedings and conferring jurisdiction to act. In this case it is certain that, at the time the defendant passed its ordinances levying the assessments and attempting to create liens on the property of the plaintiffs it was without even the color of jurisdiction or power to act. The plaintiffs and all other persons had the right to treat such proceedings as absolutely void. The Legislature had not authorized these proceedings, and might never do so. The plaintiffs were not bound to assume that an attempt to validate them would ever be made. To give the ratifying act the effect of validating these assessments, no opportunity whatever being furnished the plaintiffs to contest them, would be depriving the plaintiffs of property without due process of law, which is inhibited by the Constitution of the United States and of the state of South Carolina. This would render the validating act itself unconstitutional. So that, even if the rule contended for by the defendant was the correct one, these assessments are invalid. The Legislature could not have originally authorized them without furnishing opportunities to be heard, for this would have been taking property without due process, and therefore the validating act, which attempts to do this, cannot have the effect of rendering these assessments valid. On this branch of the case my conclusion is that the assessments in question are illegal and void, for the two reasons that when they were levied the city of Easley was without even the color of jurisdiction or authority to do so, and to give the ratifying act the effect of validating them would be depriving the plaintiffs of property without due process of law, which can never be done by a curative or validating statute.

The next question for consideration is: What title have the plaintiffs to their right of way through the city of Easley and the extent thereof? In the year 1871 Benjamin Mauldin conveyed to the Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Railway Company, the predecessor in title of the plaintiffs, 100 feet on each side of the track or roadway, measuring from the center, for railroad purposes, in fee simple. This deed was recorded as required by law in the proper office on August 14, 1872, in Book B, p. 38. This right of way was over and through a certain tract of land which was conveyed to the said Benjamin Mauldin by William Couch on August 16, 1866, and the deed for which was recorded in the office of the register of mesne conveyance for Pickens county on January 28, 1867, in Book L-1, p. 39. The same tract of land was conveyed in the form of a fee-simple deed to the said William Couch by Mahala Mansell on October 29, 1859, and the deed for which was duly recorded in the proper office on the 16th day of January, 1860, in Book I-1, p. 224. In the month of May, 1854, Joshua Mansell, the owner of this land, departed this life leaving a last will and testament dated March 6, 1854, which was duly admitted to probate. Mahala Mansell died intestate in the year 1874. On May 25, 1875, Baylis W. Mansell, a son of Joshua Mansell, and the other heirs at law, filed an action in the court of common pleas for Pickens county against James Boswell and others, claiming that the heirs at law of Joshua Mansell were entitled to the 100 acres of land mentioned in the will of Joshua Mansell, and prayed that the title to said land might be cleared and quieted.

After certain proceedings in said case, on July 5, 1876, Baylis W. Mansell, acting for himself and as attorney for his complainants, of the first part, and R. E. Bowen, H. C. Briggs, and Thos. W. Russell, acting for themselves and for the other defendants, except the defendant Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Railway Company, of the second part, entered into an agreement by the terms of which the title to said land was to be executed under order of the court to the parties of the second part, as agents or trustees of the defendants they represented. These proceedings were never recorded, and seem to have been lost, except an order of the court dated July 15, 1876, which is recorded in the common pleas journal for the year 1876, page 750. The facts as to this case above stated are taken from the recitals in this order, and the deed made thereunder. This deed was made by J. J. Lewis, clerk of the court, to R. E. Bowen, H. C. Briggs, and T. W. Russell, trustees, on the 15th day of January, 1876, and recorded in the office of register of mesne conveyance for Pickens county in volume C-2, p. 372, on the 6th day of March, 1876. The order above referred to confirms said agreement and directs that the clerk make a deed in accordance with the terms thereof. In this order it is stated that the defendant, Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Railway Company, is excepted. The deed provides for the sale of the 100 acres of land willed to Mahala Mansell by Joshua Mansell. Under this order and deed the said trustees cut up said lands into lots and sold the same to different parties. Many of the deeds made by the trustees were introduced as evidence. They show that the lots were laid off fronting the right of way and describing the lots as bounding on the right of way of the railroad company. The railroad was constructed in the years 1872 and 1873 through this land, and has been continuously used ever since. The plaintiffs claim that they own as their right of way 100 feet on each side of the track. The defendant claims that they own their roadbed which they have been in the actual use of. It insists that, under the will of Joshua Mansell, Mahala Mansell took only a life estate, and that therefore the plaintiffs took only an estate for the life of Mahala Mansell in the said 100 feet, but have acquired by adverse possession its actual roadbed and the lands on which the depots stand. Which of these contentions is correct? I have reached the conclusion that the plaintiffs own as their right of way over the land in question 100 feet on each side of the tract or roadbed measuring from the center. I have reached this conclusion for three reasons:

(1) The testimony shows that the plaintiffs and their predecessors have been in open and adverse possession of the main track, side tracks, and depots on said right of way ever since the construction of the road in 1872 and 1873, claiming under color of title, duly recorded, the full 100 feet on each side of the track. It is a well-established principle that adverse possession of a part or parcel of land claimed under color of title extends to the whole boundary described in the color of title. In addition to this the plaintiffs had the general use of the entire parcel which was open and being used by the public, but not in a way which was inconsistent with the right of the railroad to use the entire strip of land for railroad purposes when it decided to do so.

(2) The will of Joshua Mansell is not very clear as to whether the Mansell children stood as remaindermen thereunder, but, conceding that they did take as remaindermen, and that the widow, Mahala Mansell, took only a life estate in the 100 acres of land described in said will, such remaindermen, after the death of the life tenant, could not disturb the right of way which the railroad company obtained through and under the life tenant. Their only right would be to recover compensation after the death of the life tenant. There are a number of decisions in this state which hold that the word "owner," as used in statutes authorizing condemnation for railroad purposes, does not necessarily mean the owner of the legal title, but refers to parties in possession. This doctrine is fully set out in the case of Cayce Land Co. v. Southern Railway Co., 111 S. C. 115, 96 S. E. 725. The same doctrine has been held to be true where a trustee gives the right to the railroad company to build its line through property held as trustee. See the case of Tutt v. Railway Co., 28 S. C. 388, 5 S. E. 831. This latter case sustains the contention of the railroad company to its right of way through the church property given by the trustees of said property by deed.

(3) After the death of Mahala Mansell the children of Joshua Mansell filed an action in the court and confirmed an agreement by the terms of which the 100 acres of land devised to Mahala Mansell for life was under order of court deeded to trustees to sell said lands and distribute the proceeds. The railroad company was not a party to this agreement, and it was excepted from the order. These trustees cut up the said 100 acres of land into a large number of town lots which bordered on the right of way of 200 feet as it now is, and has been ever since the right of way was acquired. The deeds made to different parties by the trustees in many instances describe the lots as bounded by or fronting on the railroad right of way. I think by this agreement, order of court, and the laying out of the lots bordering on the right of way and the deeds of the trustees, the Mansell children and all persons claiming under them are estopped from claiming that the right of way of the plaintiffs is less than 100 feet on each side of the track. Especially is this true after the lapse of so many years.

It is claimed by the city of Easley that it acquired the 200 feet in question for streets by its long use thereof against the Mansell heirs, except the part actually used by the railroad for its roadbed and depot. The railroad was in possession and claiming this 200 feet three years before the city of Easley existed. It was incorporated March 17, 1874. Acts 1874, p. 706. It has therefore at all times had notice that the plaintiffs claimed this 200 feet under the deed from Benjamin Mauldin, and of the facts hereinbefore recited as to the proceedings taken by the heirs at law of Joshua Mansell, and the acts and deeds of the trustees appointed by the court. Beck v. Railway Co., 105 S. C. p. 819, 89 S. E. 1081. In addition to this, under the decisions of the Supreme Court of this state, neither a town or the public can acquire by prescription the right to use as a street the right of way of a railroad company. Blume v. Southern Ry., 85 S. C. 440, 67 S. E. 546. A right of way of a railroad, having been acquired for a public purpose, cannot be lost by prescriptive use or adverse possession unless by the erection of a permanent structure, accompanied by notice to the railroad company of an intention to claim adversely to its right. Atlanta & Charlotte Air Line Ry. Co. v. Limestone & Co., 109 S. C. 444, 98 S. E. 188. Taking Joshua Mansell as the common source, my conclusion is that the plaintiffs own as a right of way for railroad purposes 100 feet on each side of the track, measuring from the center thereof through the tract of land described in the deed made by Benjamin Mauldin. If this be true, then the pavements in question are laid down upon the said right of way. The constitutional amendment provides for permanent improvements, and if the railroad company has the right to use for railroad purposes the whole of this 200 feet as established by the foregoing cases, then the improvements could be destroyed. I do not think the amendment contemplates levying assessments against the right of way of a railroad company where such improvements are laid down on the right of way. Nor do I think the right of way such abutting property as the amendment contemplates where there is no legally established street, and a portion of the right of way is paved, and the remaining part thereof charged with assessments as abutting property.

The foregoing are my conclusions as to the right of way which was obtained from Benjamin Mauldin. This covers most of the paved district, but there is a small part of the same where the title to the right of way was acquired in a different way. Joshua Mansell and Mahala Mansell, on August 9, 1848, conveyed by deed duly recorded to John Gilstrap, Benjamin Mauldin, Bradwell Day, W. S. Birge, and Thomas Montgomery $5\frac{1}{4}$ acres of land as trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The conveyance was in trust to build a house of worship on said land for use of the members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, according to the rules and discipline which may from time to time be agreed upon and adopted by the ministers and preachers of said church and their General Conference. On March 11, 1878, by deed duly recorded, the trustees of said Methodist Church conveyed to the plaintiff, Atlanta & Charlotte Air Line Railway Company, and its successors and assigns, a strip of 25 feet, beginning at a certain point in the center of the right of way, in width, by 640 feet in length, on the northern side of the railroad track, and 100 feet by 640 feet on the southern side of the railroad track. There is no pavement on the 25 feet, but they are laid on about 40 feet on the southern part of the 100 feet, for which, a part of the assessments in question, charge is made. I think the plaintiffs have good title to these two strips of land. The deed is in fee and the possession of the plaintiffs has been of the same character as their possession of the 200 feet claimed under the deed from Benjamin Mauldin, and most of what I have said in discussing plaintiffs' title to that 200 feet is applicable here. Besides, I do not see how the defendant can question this title. No one can do so except the Methodist Church, which has never objected. Besides, from the long adverse possession of the plaintiffs and acquiescence of the said church, it will be presumed that the trustees making the deed were authorized to do so by the proper authority.

The idea cannot be entertained that men of high character as trustees of a Christian church would make a deed without authority, especially when the valuable consideration of $350 is stated in the deed. By this deed, by adverse possession and the statute of limitations I think plaintiffs have acquired title to these two strips of land, and all I have said hereinbefore as to the pavement on the right of way of the plaintiffs for the 200 feet acquired through Benjamin Mauldin is applicable, and need not be repeated. If the plaintiffs had only their roadbed, as contended by the defendant, I do not think these assessments could be sustained. I do not think the constitutional amendment contemplates a mere easement of this kind, and such roadbed would not abut upon the pavement, there being an intervening strip of land of from 15 to 30 feet in width between the roadbed and the pavement. I do not see any merit in the contention of the defendant that there was an old public road 15 or 20 feet wide which extended along the southern side of the strips of land conveyed to the plaintiffs or their predecessors. This could not prevent the said railroad from acquiring the right of way described in their deeds. Two easements over the same property may exist; the owner of each would have to so use it as not to destroy the easement of the other.

The next question I shall consider is: Can assessments of the kind in question be levied on a right of way of a railroad company? On this question the authorities differ. I doubt if the amendment to the Constitution under consideration contemplates levying assessments against such property. But if it does, I am satisfied a railway roadbed or right of way is not subject to such assessments unless benefited thereby. The rule is so stated in 25 Ruling Case Law, p. 117, where the authorities are collected. This benefit must be actual and real, and not conjectural. In the case of New York R. R. Co. v. Port Chester, 149 App. Div. 898, 144 N. Y. Supp. 883, affirmed in 210 N. Y. 600, 104 N. E. 1135, the New York court, in considering this question, said: "It is difficult to see how such property can be benefited by the improvement of a village street passing under it. The only benefit that the learned corporation counsel specifically claims will inure to the railroad company from these improvements is an increase in its business following the increase in business and population resulting to the village from the improvement of its streets. This alleged benefit is too conjectural, fanciful, and remote for consideration."

The authorities on this subject are collected in Ann. Cas. 1916E, p. 581, and 3 Ann. Cas. p. 11. In a note to the last-named case the writer reviews the federal decisions upon this subject, and says they establish these important principles: "That state laws providing for assessing the cost of street improvements upon abutting property, which in practical operation do confiscate property, are obnoxious to the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and for that reason it is the duty of the courts to declare them to be void; that special assessments to pay for local improvements of public streets and highways do, in practical effect, deprive owners of their property without due process of law, unless the property subject to assessment is benefited by the improvement correspondingly to the amount of the assessment; that owners of property have the right to appeal to the courts for judicial protection against the unconstitutional invasion of their rights by municipal governments in enforcing state laws or local regulations for the collection of assessments which are in excess of the benefits to the property assessed, accruing or to accrue by reason of the improvements to be paid for by such assessments." In this state the doctrine that local assessments of this kind benefit abutting property is repudiated. Mauldin v. City Council of Greenville, 42 S. C. 293, 20 S. E. 842, 27 L. R. A. 284, 46 Am. St. Rep. 723. I do not think the testimony in this case shows benefits to the plaintiffs' right of way as justifies the levying of these assessments. The plaintiff's testimony is to the effect that there was no benefit, and the testimony of the defendant relates to general and speculative benefits. Besides, it appears from the testimony that the strip of land claimed as a right of way was, up to 1917, one wide space of 200 feet with the railroad tracks in the center thereof. But in the year 1917 the city renamed its streets and denominated that portion of the 200 feet on the south side of the railroad track South Main street, and that portion of the north side of said track North Main street. The assessments in question are levied against the right of way on both sides of the track, which does not touch the pavement on either side of the track, while the business houses and private property abut on the paved area. Such a method of assessment I think is discriminatory and inequitable, and amounts to a taking of property which is contrary to both the state and federal Constitutions, and renders the assessments void.

The only remaining point in the case is the contention of the defendant that the plaintiffs are estopped to question the validity of these assessments. It claims that, when the double tracking of the main line was about to begin through the city of Easley in 1916, the Southern Railway Company applied to the city of Easley for permission to do the work, and to widen South Main street; that plaintiffs did not object to the assessments when notice thereof was given under the ordinances to the depot agent and superintendent. I do not think this position can be sustained. The permission asked was done in the interest of the safety of the public during the construction work, and in no sense involved the question of plaintiff's title. The public was using the right of way as a street, and could use it only in such a way as was not inconsistent with its use by the railroad company. In the next place, when the notices in question were served, the Director General of Railroads of the United States was in possession and control of the railroads, and persons on whom these notices were served were the agents of the Director General, and not of plaintiffs. In the next place, the assessments being void for want of jurisdiction or authority to levy them, there is no estoppel here. Ann. Cas. 1915B, note, p. 753; 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 584; O'Brien v. Wheelock, 184 U. S. 450, 22 Sup. Ct. 354, 46 L. Ed. 636.

I have endeavored to pass upon all the questions arising in this action, and have reached the conclusion that the assessments in question are invalid for the reasons hereinbefore given. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the assessments levied against the property of the plaintiffs described in the complaint are null and void, and that the plaintiffs are not liable for the same.

It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the temporary injunction heretofore granted in this action be made perpetual, and that the defendants, their agents, and servants, be and they are hereby enjoined from collecting or attempting to collect the said assessments by sale of the property heretofore levied upon by them or otherwise.

Let all the record used before me at the hearing be filed with this decree.

J. J. McSwain, A. P. Du Bose, and Haynsworth & Haynsworth, all of Greenville, for appellants.

Carey & Carey, of Pickens, and Cothran, Dean & Cothran, of Greenville, for respondents.

WATTS, J. This is an action seeking to restrain the city of Easley from collecting from railway company certain assessments against abutting property for street improvements. The case was tried by Judge DeVore, who filed a decree in favor of plaintiffs respondents, on January 10, 1920. Appellants appeal, and by exceptions, 20 in number, seek reversal.

The decree of Judge DeVore should be set out in the report of the case. The exceptions challenge the finding of his honor in favor of railroad's contention:

"(1) That the land occupied by North Main street is merely a part of the railroad right of way; that, not being a part of the streets of the city, it does not come within the constitutional amendment authorizing the city council to levy an assessment for its improvement against abutting property. (2) That the right to charge part of the costs of improving a street against abutting property does not apply to the property of a railroad company, consisting of right of way, tracks, station grounds, etc. (3) That an assessment upon the basis of feet frontage and without giving the railway company an opportunity to be heard is a taking of property without due process, and unconstitutional. (4) That, at the time of the passage of the ordinance authorizing the improvement of the streets and the levy of the assessment, no statute had been passed authorizing the city council of Easley to levy such assessments, and that the statute of February 21, 1919, purporting to ratify the action of the city council was inoperative."

As to the finding of his honor that the land occupied by North Main street and South Main street, respectively, is a part of the right of way of the railway company, and that, not being streets, the city council was without power to levy an assessment for their improvement.

[1] The proof clearly shows that, since the city of Easley has been incorporated for a period over 30 years, the streets have been there used by the public at large, worked by the city, and before the railroad was built one of the streets was a public highway; while it is true the right of way of railroad was originally 100 feet, yet these streets have been used by the public for over 30 years, storehouses and other houses have been built, and a use put to the right of way now claimed by the railway, inconsistent with their claim.

[2] The railroad has stood by, never claimed "their pound of flesh" until now, and their easement on these streets, under all the evidence in case unquestionable, has been lost and abandoned by them under the principles laid down by this court under the cases of Lorick v. Railway Co., 87 S. C. 74, 68 S. E. 931; Southern Railway Co. v. Howell, 89 S. C. 395, 71 S. E. 972, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 1070; Railway Co. v. Manufacturing Co., 93 S. C. 397, 76 S. E. 1091. The evidence shows that that portion used by the city of Easley and the public at large has been abandoned and lost by estoppel on the part of railroad, and that the easement acquired to these streets by the public at large is superior to the easement of the railroad. That part which was formerly a highway being there first, the railroad never did acquire an easement in it, other than what was necessary for its roadbed. Code Laws 1912, § 3300. The evidence does not warrant any other inference than that the city of Easley and the public at large have acquired by adverse possession for a statutory period and longer that defeats the title of the railroad company to these streets under their original claim of the easement. Matthews v. Railroad, 67 S. C. 506, 46 S. E. 335, 65 L. R. A. 286.

The evidence submitted in this case shows that for over 40 years the streets in controversy have been recognized and used in the town and by the public generally, and that the railroad company during all of that time has not questioned such use; has not complained or asserted its rights. During all of that time the public in general have uninterruptedly used these streets for the purpose of travel, continuous, uninterrupted, adverse, notorious, during all that time worked and kept in repair by the proper authorities. During all the time, 40 years, the streets have been used by the public generally, and the railroad has had knowledge of such use and acquiesced therein, has stood by and allowed storehouses and other buildings erected abutting these streets, and the business of the town has been built up, it is fair to assume, on the assumption that the streets were dedicated to the use of the public. To affirm his honor's decree would be destructive of the property rights of individuals, and destructive of the rights of the public. The claim of railroads to these streets comes too late. Southern Railway Co. v. Board of Commissioners of Union, S. C., 246 Fed. 386, 158 O. C. A. 447.

[3] As to the right to charge part of the costs of improving a street, it applies to abutting property of a railroad company used for its track, station, grounds, etc. The amendment to the Constitution, section 18, art. 10, declares the General Assembly may authorize the city of Easley to levy assessment upon abutting property holders to pay for streets immediately abutting such property, etc., provided certain conditions are complied with. The amendment authorized the assessment against abutting property. The railroad property occupied by its tracks and stations does not abut upon both streets. The railroads contend that it does not come within the constitutional amendment, because of the use to which it is put. This position is untenable. The railroad is entitled to no immunity other than any other owner of property abutting the streets. It does not make any difference as to what use the property is put; they are owners and users of the property if it abuts the streets, and there is nothing in the constitutional amendment making the exemption as to them.

The public has a right to a street to get to the stations of the railroad, and it would be unjust and unfair to make other abutting owners of property pay, and exempt the railroad. The railroad is not exempt from this assessment. Heman Construction Co. v. Wabash Railway Co., 206 Mo. 172, 104 S. W. 67, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 112, and authorities therein cited; Northern Pacific Railroad Co. v. Seattle, 46 Wash. 674, 91 Pac. 244, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 121, 123 Am. St. Rep. 955. In L. and N. R. R. v. Barber Asphalt Co., 197 U. S. 430, 435, 25 Sup. Ct. 466, 49 L. Ed. 819, it was held that an assessment for local improvements levied against property used for railroad purposes was valid. The court said:

"That, apart from specific use to which this land is devoted, land in a good sized city generally will get benefit from having the streets about it paved, and that this benefit generally will be more than the cost, are propositions which, as we already have implied, the Legislature is warranted in adopting."

The court further said:

"That the Legislature is warranted in going one step further and saying that on the question of benefit or no benefit the land shall be considered in its general relations and apart from its particular use."

In Branson v. Bush, 251 U. S. 182, 189, 40 Sup. Ct. 113, 116 (64 L. Ed. 215), the court on this question says:

"To this must be added the obvious fact that anything that develops the territory which the railroad serves must necessarily be of benefit to it, and that no agency for such development equals that of good roads."

[4] The railroad here transports passengers, freight, and commodities; the public travel to get to the station, they haul freight from the station; and it is now well known that good roads and good streets are a great factor in human happiness, as well as a great benefit to the territory in which they are, and, unquestionably, if these streets are good, facilities for transportation will be good, and the business of the railroad will be benefited.

[5] As to whether an assessment upon the basis of feet frontage without giving the railroad company an opportunity to be heard is a taking of property without due process of law, and unconstitutional: This must be answered in the negative under the authority of Tonawanda v. Lyon, 181 U. S. 389, 21 Sup. Ct. 609, 45 L. Ed. 908; Wagner v. Baltimore, 239 U. S. 217, 36 Sup. Ct. 66, 60 L. Ed. 230; Hancock v. City of Muscogee, 250 U. S. 454, 39 Sup. Ct. 528, 63 L. Ed. 1081; Branson v. Bush, 251 U. S. 182, 40 Sup. Ct. 113, 64 L. Ed. 215.

[6] As to plaintiff's claim that at the time of the passage of the ordinance authorizing the improvement and the levy of assessment, no statute had been passed authorizing the city council of Easley to levy such assessment, and that the statute of February 21, 1919, purporting to ratify the action of the city council, was inoperative: A sufficient answer to this is that, even if at the time the city council passed the ordinance there was no legislative authority for this action, yet this was cured by the Act of Legislature of February 21, 1919, wherein the Legislature ratified and confirmed the action of city council, declaring that—

"Such assessments so levied by said city council of * * * Easley are hereby declared of full force and effect and valid liens against the property assessed, bearing interest, as provided therein, from the date of levy." Acts 1919, p. 585.

The Legislature validated and sanctioned an act which it might have originally authorized. The defect in the ordinance levying the assessment for want of prior legislative sanction was cured. Duke v. County of Williamsburg, 21 S. C. 414; Hodge v. School District, 80 S. C. 518, 61 S. E. 1009; Dove v. Kirkland, 92 S. C. 313, 75 S. E. 503.

The exceptions are sustained, and judgment reversed.

BONNER v. STATE. (No. 2686.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 15, 1921.
Rehearing Denied Nov. 17, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law §789(2), 805(1), 1064(7)—Definition of reasonable doubt in charge held substantially correct; failure of charge on reasonable doubt to cover burden of proof did not render it defective; total failure to charge on burden of proof should have been made distinct ground of motion for new trial.

The court's definition of reasonable doubt, as given in his charge to the jury, was substantially correct.

2. Criminal law §828 — Defendant's statement held a confession, rendering charge on circumstantial evidence unnecessary in absence of request.

The statement of the accused to the sheriff in regard to the crime charged and the circumstances attending its commission amounted to a confession, and afforded direct evidence of his participation in the crime and of his guilt of the offense charged; and the court did not err, there being no written request to charge upon the subject of circumstantial evidence, in omitting to charge the jury upon that subject.

3. Criminal law §736(2)—Evidence as to whether confession was voluntary held to make question for jury.

Under the evidence as to the circumstances under which the confession of the accused was made, the court did not err in admitting it in evidence and in submitting to the jury, under proper instructions, the question as to whether it was voluntarily made.

4. Sufficiency of evidence.

There was sufficient evidence to authorize the verdict.

Error from Superior Court, Jones County; Jas. B. Park, Judge.

Joe Bonner was convicted of murder, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Paul Maynard and Edward S. Ragsdale, both of Macon, for plaintiff in error.

Doyle Campbell, Sol. Gen., and A. Y. Clement, both of Monticello, and Geo. M. Napier, Atty. Gen., Seward M. Smith, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BECK, P. J. Joe (Buster) Bonner was tried under an indictment charging him with the offense of the murder of A. S. Jones. Upon the trial he was found guilty; no recommentation of mercy being made. He made a motion for new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted.

[1] 1. The court in part charged the jury as follows:

"The court charges you, when the defendant files a plea of not guilty to this bill of indictment, it puts in issue every material allegation contained therein; and it devolves upon the state to satisfy the minds of the jury, by the evidence in the case, beyond a reasonable doubt, of the defendant's guilt. A reasonable doubt means exactly what it says. A reasonable doubt may grow out of the evidence, or the want of evidence, or be engendered by the defendant's statement. While the law requires the state to demonstrate the guilt of the defendant by the evidence in the case beyond a reasonable doubt before you would be authorized to convict him, the law does not require the state to demonstrate the guilt of the defendant to an absolute or mathematical certainty. A reasonable doubt does not mean a fanciful doubt; it does not mean a conjectural doubt; it does not mean an imaginative doubt; but, as I said to you, it means a doubt founded upon reason."

This charge was excepted to upon the ground that it does not properly define reasonable doubt, and because the court failed to charge that the burden of proof was upon the state of Georgia to prove every material allegation in the indictment. The exceptions to this charge show no ground for the grant of a new trial. The definition of reasonable doubt was substantially correct, and the fact that the judge did not, in this particular part of the charge, state to the jury that the burden was upon the state to prove the material allegations in the indictment does not render this part of the charge defective. This first ground of the amended motion for a new trial is an attack upon the charge of the court there set forth; and if the court failed altogether to charge upon the subject of the burden of proof, that should have been made a distinct ground of the motion, and the failure to charge upon that subject somewhere in the court's instructions to the jury affords no ground of criticism of the excerpt from the charge that is brought under review in the ground of the motion we are now dealing with.

[2] 2. Error is assigned upon the failure of the court to charge the jury on the law of circumstantial evidence, and to instruct them that to warrant a conviction on circumstantial evidence the facts proved must not only be consistent with the hypothesis of guilt, but must exclude every other hypothesis save that of the guilt of the accused. It is contended by counsel for the movant that the evidence required this charge upon circumstantial evidence. This criticism of the court's charge is not meritorious, unless the state's case was based entirely on circumstantial evidence. The plaintiff in error contends that it was such a case. This contention, however, is not sound if the testimony of the witness Middlebrooks, the sheriff of the county, in regard to a statement made to him by the accused, was for the consideration of the jury, under the court's instructions. The witness referred to testified that in company with other named parties he arrested the accused at the home of one Harrison Jones. Witness had heard that the accused had a pistol in his possession, said to be the same as that which the deceased had; he found the pistol on the accused, and it looked like the one described to witness as the one belonging to the deceased. Witness took the accused to the front porch of the house where he was arrested; and at this time Tucker, one of the parties accompanying witness, hit the accused over the head with a pistol. Witness further testified:

"I asked him [the accused] where he got the gun. He said from Sam Myrick on Monday morning. I asked him if it was not Mr. Jones' gun. He replied, 'If it is, I don't know it.' I then said, 'Buster, you know something about this killing; tell me about it;' and I said, 'Nobody is going to hurt you.' He said, 'If you will take me to where Mr. Jones was killed, I will tell you all about it.' * * * When he made the request I took him over there. * * * We reached his house at 10 o'clock in the morning, about a week after the homicide. When we got there Buster Bonner got out of the car and said, 'Come on, I will show you;' and he showed us how the door was latched. Buster Bonner is Joe Bonner. He told us how he called Mr. Jones; said that Jim Sims called him, saying, 'Sims, Sims;' and that Jones said, 'Knock 'em off;' and that Mr. Jones got up and opened the door, and Jim Sims struck him with the axe; that Jones was standing in the door when Sims struck him again two or three times with the axe and began to search his pockets, and got what money he had and a pistol out of the trunk."

The witness further testified:

"The house is in Jones county. Accused said that Mr. Jones was struck with an axe. I saw his body; he was killed in that room. He lived by himself. He was hit a blow with the eye of the axe."

On cross-examination the witness testified:

"Mr. Tucker has never been a deputy at all. He has worked for me around. He has gone with me lots of times. To the everyday person seeing him associated with the sheriff he would think he was a deputy. The statement made by Bonner was made after he was struck by Tucker. It was a pretty bad blow; it knocked the blood out; it bled some. * * * We made a thorough search the day we arrested Bonner and found a club axe, and a few days later found another axe that was not there the day we arrested Bonner. * * * As to there being a password, Bonner told me that when Sims came up he called to Mr. Jones and said, 'Mr. Jones, this is Sims, Sims;' and that Mr. Jones said, 'Knock 'em off.' Mr. Jones could not talk, that is, I could not understand what he said. He was paralyzed on one side. Some people in common touch with him claimed that they could understand him. Sims worked on the place with him. I saw the clothes that Bonner had on. Bonner could have struck the first lick from where he was standing. But where he was when Mr. Jones fell he could not have, unless he moved. There were four or five licks passed. There were splotches of blood on top of the house, some on the door and some on the walls. His feet were a foot from the door. I think that it was possible for Bonner to have struck the lick and to have gotten the blood on his clothes in the manner it was on them. I have made the statement that I thought Sims was in it. I have said that it looked like if Bonner used the axe he would have got more blood on his clothes than were on there."

Redirect:

"Bonner stated that Jim Sims got the axe at his (Jim Sims') house. He said Jim Sims went up there in the evening about sundown, and that he borrowed $4 from Jim Sims. He said Jim Sims told him Mr. Jones had some money, and he wanted to get it that night, and for [Bonner] to meet him back down there, so they would go and kill him and get it."

Considering all that Bonner, according to the testimony of the sheriff, said to the latter, the accused made a confession. It was not a mere incriminatory statement. His confession showed that the crime of murder was committed, and that he was present participating in the commission of the crime. Accepting the testimony of the sheriff as true, the defendant said that Jim Sims told him Mr. Jones had some money and he wanted to get it that night, and for defendant to meet him back down there, so they would go and kill him and get it. And the statement by the accused which we have quoted above shows that he was present at the time when Jones was killed. The language of the defendant in making the confession is not altogether clear, and is evidently that of an illiterate and ignorant man, but it contains the unequivocal statement that Sims had proposed to him that they should go to Jones' house that night, and for the defendant to meet him "back down there, so they would go and kill him and get it" (the money). It can scarcely be contended, in the face of this statement to the effect that defendant went "back down there," and from the place thus designated on to Jones' house that night, and stood there while Sims hit the deceased with an axe, that he was not fully aware of Sims' purpose in going to Jones' house. And if he joined Sims, as he himself admits that he did, and stood by while Jones was killed under those circumstances, whether he struck a blow himself or not, he was guilty of the crime of murder, and his statement in regard to it is a confession. And, regarded in that light, it affords direct evidence of the commission of the crime, and the case did not rest entirely upon circumstantial evidence; and consequently the court did not err in omitting to charge, in the absence of a request to do so, upon the law of circumstantial evidence.

[3] 3. Another ground of the motion for new trial raises the question as to the admissibility of this evidence, in view of our statute making the evidence of a confession inadmissible where it appears that it was made upon the remotest fear of punishment or the slightest hope of reward. The fact that a person by the name of Tucker, who was not a deputy sheriff, but who was with the sheriff at the time he went to where the accused was, struck the defendant on the head with the butt of a pistol, does not show that the confession was induced by the remotest fear of injury, as is claimed in the brief of counsel. The act of striking the prisoner was, of course, most reprehensible, but it does not appear that it was done in connection with any attempt to make the prisoner confess, or that he was threatened with injury if he did not confess. The prisoner did not then immediately make his confession; the sheriff intervened and prevented Tucker from making a further attack on the prisoner, and then the prisoner and one James and the sheriff went out behind another house, and the sheriff then said to the prisoner: "You know something about this killing; tell me about it. Nobody is going to hurt you." To which the accused replied, "If you will take me to where Mr. Jones was killed, I will tell you all about it;" the location of the crime being a mile and a quarter from the place at which this colloquy took place. The sheriff then carried the prisoner to the place of the crime. The sheriff and a party named Bauchomb went with him in an automobile; when they arrived at the house in which the crime was committed, without further colloquy, the prisoner made the statement which we have set forth above and held to be a confession. Under the circumstances narrated, the court did not err in admitting the evidence of confession and in submitting to the jury the question as to whether it was freely and voluntarily made.

WILSON v. MARTIN. (No. 12303.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Nov. 1, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Contracts \S 18—Contractual relation may be inferred from silence on acceptance of inquiry as to willingness to contract.

A communication from one person to another making inquiry as to the latter's willingness to contract may under the circumstances amount to an offer. Where such communication is reasonably susceptible to the construction that it amounts to an offer, and that it was intended as such by the party making it and is accepted as such by the party to whom it is made, when such acceptance is communicated to the party making the communication, and the latter remains silent and does not disclaim that such communication was an offer, such conduct of the parties is sufficient to warrant the inference that the minds of the parties have met and that a contractual relation has been created.

2. Evidence \S 71, 89—Inferred that letter mailed was received.

Where a communication by letter is properly addressed and deposited in the United States mail, and its receipt is not denied by the addressee, the inference is warranted that the communication was received. Hamilton v. Stewart, 108 Ga. 472, 476, 84 S. E. 123. Evidence by the addressee to the effect that another person in his employment opened his mail, and that the addressee had never seen or heard of the communication, and that the same cannot be found in his office after careful search, does not conclusively establish as a fact that he did not receive the communication, and does not as a matter of law rebut the inference of its receipt, authorized by its having been posted properly addressed.

3. Certiorari \S 70(8)—Finding of fact by municipal court not disturbed.

Whether or not a contract existed between the parties was a question of fact, and the judge of the municipal court, passing upon the facts without a jury, having determined in favor of the existence of a contract, the judgment of the superior court overruling the certiorari was not error.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; W. D. Ellis, Judge.

Action in a municipal court by Thomas Wilson against W. O. Martin. There was a judgment in favor of defendant, and plaintiff sought review in a superior court by certiorari, and from a judgment overruling the certiorari, brings error. Affirmed.

Thomas Wilson, as landlord, through his duly authorized agent, instituted proceedings to dispossess W. O. Martin as a tenant holding over beyond his term, to which proceedings the tenant filed his counter affidavit denying that his term had expired. The sole issue upon the trial was whether or not the lease contract between the parties which had expired had been renewed. The evidence showed that M. C. Kiser, the agent of the landlord, on June 24, 1920, made the following written communication to the defendant:

"If you wish to renew your lease for another year at a rental of $100.00 per month, kindly advise us by return mail or not later than the 1st of the month, as we would like to know who wish to remain in the apartment."

To which the defendant on June 28, 1920, replied as follows:

"Replying to yours of the 24th inst., beg to say that we have decided to retain apartment A for another year, although the increase (to $100.00) per month is much greater than I had expected."

There was also evidence as indicated in paragraph 2 of the syllabus. The judge of the municipal court without a jury rendered a judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff sued out a certiorari in the superior court, which on the hearing was overruled.

1. No error.

No error appears, and the verdict is fully supported by the evidence.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

2. Sheriffs and constables \S 84—Sheriff could sue on forthcoming bond after expiration of office.

The responsibility incident to the acceptance of a forthcoming bond is personal to the sheriff who takes it, and the bond is made payable to him alone and not to his successors in office, and consequently, upon a breach of the bond, the sheriff may institute a suit for use of the plaintiff in execution, notwithstanding that he has gone out of office.

3. Coroners \S 24—Sheriff, after going out of office, could sue on coroner's bond.

Though, as a general rule, bonds required of officials, such as sheriffs, coroners, etc., are considered as made to the office and pass to each incumbent without assignment, a sheriff after going out of office, could bring action on a coroner's bond by reason of the failure of the coroner to take a forthcoming bond in a suit brought by the sheriff upon a forthcoming bond, wherein an execution was placed in the hands of the coroner; the sheriff being the real plaintiff in execution and therefore the real party interested in the outcome of the suit against the sureties on the coroner's bond for the coroner's neglect of duty, under Civ. Code 1910, § 12, and it was immaterial that he brought the action for the use of another, whose interest did not appear from the pleading.

Error from City Court of Bainbridge; H. B. Spooner, Judge.

Suit by J. H. Emanuel, for the use of Jessie R. Williams, against W. G. Harrell and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and the defendants bring error. Affirmed.

W. V. Custer and J. C. Hale, both of Bainbridge, for plaintiffs in error.

A. E. Thornton, M. E. O'Neal, J. R. Wilson, and H. C. Harrison, all of Bainbridge, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. [1] Emanuel, sheriff, levied a certain mortgage fi. fa. in favor of M. C. Williams, issued on the foreclosure of a chattel mortgage in the city court of Bainbridge against Aaron Andrews, on certain personal property described in the levy. Artie Andrews, the wife of Aaron, filed a claim to the property levied upon, giving to the sheriff a forthcoming bond with P. L. Lane and Alexander Thomas as securities. On the trial of the claim case the property was found subject to the mortgage fi. fa., and, not being produced at the time and place of sale, the sheriff brought suit on the forthcoming bond against Artie Andrews and the securities, Lane and Thomas, and obtained a judgment against them. Being the plaintiff in fi. fa., he was not qualified to make a levy of the same, and therefore turned over the fi. fa. to Frederick, coroner, for the purpose of having the levy made. The coroner thereupon proceeded to levy the execution and seized sufficient property to pay off the amount of the execution. He left the property so levied upon in the possession of the defendant in execution, without taking any forthcoming bond. The coroner turned the execution, with his entry of levy, over to the sheriff, for the purpose of having the property advertised and sold according to law, but the property was not forthcoming at the time and place of sale, and there was a loss resulting from the failure of the coroner to take a forthcoming bond. In the meantime the sureties on the claim bond made by Artie Andrews, Thomas, and Lane were released as sureties on the forthcoming bond, on the ground that the coroner had left the property levied upon by him in the possession of the defendant without taking a forthcoming bond. See Thomas v. Emanuel, 20 Ga. App. 494, 93 S. E. 114.

Thereupon Emanuel, whose term of office had expired, brought the instant suit, on the coroner's bond, to recover damages resulting from the neglect of the coroner as above stated. By an amendment he added the allegation that the suit was for the use of Jessie R. Williams. It does not appear from the record in this case how Jessie R. Williams is related to the case except by the allegation that the suit by Emanuel was for her use. The original fi. fa., on which the proceedings commenced, was the foreclosure of a mortgage by M. C. Williams and the levy of the fi. fa. issued thereon. The coroner had died before the instant suit was brought, and it was brought against Harrell and Welch, as sureties on the coroner's bond. These defendants filed a general demurrer to the petition, on the specific ground that the allegations "were insufficient in law to authorize a recovery in favor of the plaintiff against the defendants." The court overruled the demurrer, and exceptions pendente lite were duly preserved and are before this court. The court proceeded to trial and a verdict was tendered for the plaintiff, and the defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled, to which judgment defendants excepted.

[2, 3] The plaintiffs in error insist, in support of their demurrer to the petition, that the plaintiff in the court below, Emanuel, having ceased to be sheriff, was not authorized as an individual to bring the suit on the coroner's bond, and that the suit should have been brought by the sheriff in office; this contention being based upon the principle that bonds required of officials, such as sheriffs, coroners, etc., are considered as made to the office, and pass to each incumbent without assignment. This has been held to be the law in Stephens v. Crawford, 1 Ga. 574, 44 Am. Dec. 680; Howard v. Crawford, 15 Ga. 433; Beckwith v. Rector, etc., 60 Ga. 575. And this is a general rule. Bonds of coroners in this state are made payable to the "ordinaries and their successors in office," and a copy of the bond in the present case shows that the law had been complied with in this respect. It therefore follows, from the decisions above cited, that unless there was some exception in the present case which brings it outside of this general rule, the proper plaintiff to bring this suit for the real party at interest would be the ordinary, the obligee in the bond, who was in office at the time the suit was filed.

Under the provisions of section 12 of the Civil Code of 1910, suits may also be brought by any person aggrieved through the misconduct of an officer on his official bond in his own name as the real plaintiff. In the instant case the allegations in the petition show that Emanuel may be regarded at least as something more than a mere nominal party. While sheriff, he made the levy of the mortgage fi. fa. and took the forthcoming bond of the claimant as against that levy, and, when the property was not forthcoming, as obligee in the forthcoming bond the sheriff sued thereon and obtained a judgment in his favor and had a fi. fa. issued thereon; this being the fi. fa. placed in the hands of the coroner for levy, the sheriff being a party and therefore disqualified. The responsibility incident to the acceptance of a forthcoming bond is personal to the officer who takes it; and hence the bond is made payable to him alone, and not also to his successors in office. Consequently, upon a breach of the bond, the obligee therein, for whose individual protection it was given, may institute suit on the instrument for the use of the plaintiff in execution; and this is so notwithstanding the fact that the plaintiff has, prior to the bringing of the action, gone out of office. O'Neill Mfg. Co. v. Harris, 120 Ga. 467, 47 S. E. 934.

The record in this case shows that the sheriff, who took the forthcoming bond following the levy of the execution in favor of Williams, upon the breach of that bond brought suit upon it, not in the name of Williams, but in his own name as obligee in the bond, and obtained a judgment thereon, followed by an execution which was placed in the hands of the coroner. This made the sheriff the real plaintiff in execution, and therefore the real party interested in the outcome of the suit against the sureties on the coroner's bond for the coroner's neglect of duty. For the reasons stated, it would seem to follow that he had a legal right to bring the suit on the coroner's bond, as being the person aggrieved by the coroner's neglect, either in his own name individually or for the use of any one that he might designate as the usee, and in this case, by amendment, he brought the suit for the use of Jessie R. Williams. Why he did so does not appear from the record, but this is immaterial as affecting his right to bring the suit, and we therefore think that the demurrer was very properly overruled by the learned trial judge.

The amended motion for a new trial contains numerous grounds of error in rulings on evidence, refusals to charge, and exceptions to instructions. Examination of each in connection with the record fails to disclose any material error, and the verdict is amply supported.

Judgment affirmed.

Nov. 1, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Sales \S 437(1)—Under defendant's pleadings admission of evidence and giving of instructions as to express warranty held error.

Where a defendant, by plea and answer to a suit on open account for goods sold, merely denied the indebtedness and set up that some of the articles furnished were worthless, and thus relied only upon a general implied warranty, without pleading any express warranty as to durability and quality, evidence as to such a special guaranty by plaintiff's selling agent was improperly admitted, and it was error for the court to charge thereon. Snowden v. Waterman, 100 Ga. 588(5), 591, 28 S. E. 121; Pound v. Williams, 119 Ga. 904, 908, 47 S. E. 218.

2. Evidence \S 91 — Pleading \S 374 — Trial \S 257—Burden on plaintiff except where defendant by plea or admission admits prima facie case; charge on shifting of burden not required unless timely requested when prima facie case not admitted.

Except in cases where the defendant by his plea admits a prima facie case as alleged in the petition, so that the plaintiff without more could recover the amount sued for, or where the defendant in open court makes such an admission and thereby assumes the burden of proof, the burden in all cases brought ex contractu lies upon the plaintiff, and it is incumbent upon him to establish all of the unadmitted material allegations as laid in the petition. Since the plea in the instant case does not admit a prima facie case, such as the plaintiff without more could recover on in the amount sued for, the general burden remained upon the plaintiff; and, in the absence of a timely request, it was not incumbent upon the court to charge upon the shifting of the burden under the development of the evidence. Western & Atlantic Ry. Co. v. Brown, 102 Ga. 13, 29 S. E. 130; Brunswick R. Co. v. Wiggins, 113 Ga. 842, 845, 39 S. E. 551, 61 L. R. A. 513; Askew v. Amos, 147 Ga. 613, 95 S. E. 5; Lazenby v. Citizens' Bank, 20 Ga. Nov. 1, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Courts ⇐91(1) — Decision of Supreme Court binding on Court of Appeals; error to direct verdict where Supreme Court in similar case had held question for jury.

Not only would this court be bound by the rulings of the Supreme Court on a principle of law as applicable to a certain state of facts under the doctrine of "stare decisis," but by express provision of the Constitution of this state the decisions of that court are made binding upon this court as precedents. In a suit by the same plaintiff on another policy of life insurance covering the same risk, where the issue as to fraud was the same, and the evidence on that issue was for the most part identical, and in its effect substantially the same, it was held by the Supreme Court that, "under the evidence introduced, it was for the jury to say whether the representations thus made were material to the risk." Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Mulkey, 142 Ga. 358, 82 S. E. 1054. It was therefore error in the instant case for the trial judge to direct a verdict for the defendant, but the issue of fraud should have been submitted to the jury.

2. Appeal and error ⇐1097(1), 1195(1,3) — Striking of allegations not error where law as to the defense determined previously adverse to defendant; law of the case includes every applicable proposition of law; law of the case binding on appellate and trial courts; rulings held law of the case though judgment might have been sustained on narrower ground.

Under the doctrine known as the "law of the case," the court did not err in striking certain portions of the original plea and certain amendments thereto, since, according to the rulings made by this court in Columbian National Life Insurance Co. v. Mulkey, 13 Ga. App. 508, 70 S. E. 482, and 19 Ga. App. 247, 91 S. E. 344, the law as to such a defense, so far as this case is concerned, has been fixed and determined by express rulings adverse to defendant; and by them not only the lower court, but this court, as well, is bound.

3. Appeal and error ⇐1056(1) — In action on insurance policy, exclusion of medical examiner's report held harmless.

The exclusion of the medical examiner's report, if error at all, was, under the facts of this case, harmless.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by Janie Stansall against the Columbian National Life Insurance Company.

Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error, and defendant files a cross-bill of exceptions. Reversed on the main bill of exceptions, and affirmed on the cross-bill.

The suit as originally brought in 1913 by Mrs. Mulkey, now Mrs. Stansall, against the defendant insurance company on a policy dated March 4, 1911, showed on the face of the petition itself that a portion of the premium was covered by two promissory notes which had never been paid, and that the notes provided by their terms that the policy would become null and void upon their nonpayment at maturity. The petition, despite such provision in the premium notes, claimed liability under the policy on two theories, one of which was that the stipulation as contained merely in the note could not cause the policy "to lapse," and, second, that the company by its duly authorized agents had moreover waived any such ground of defense by its acts and conduct subsequent to the maturity of the note which was due. A demurrer to the petition was filed, to the effect that it failed to set forth a cause of action, and upon the overruling of the demurrer the case was brought to this court, and the court held as follows:

"The failure to pay a promissory note, taken in payment of an insurance policy (although it is stipulated in the note that the nonpayment of the same at maturity will avoid the policy), will not forfeit the policy, where there is no condition in the policy itself providing for its forfeiture for the nonpayment of notes." "When the condition as to forfeiture for nonpayment on maturity of a note given for the premium is contained only in the note, the mere fact that the note is not paid at maturity does not of itself avoid the policy. Such a provision is a condition subsequent, of which the company must avail itself by clear and unequivocal acts." The decision in Arnold v. Empire Insurance Co., 3 Ga. App. 685, 60 S. E. 470, is controlling. There is no conflict between the decision in that case and the decision of the Supreme Court in Stephenson v. Empire Life Insurance Co., 139 Ga. 82 (76 S. E. 592). In the Stephenson Case the provision relating to forfeiture for nonpayment of premium notes was contained in the policy itself; in the Arnold Case it was in the premium note only; and in the instant case the condition was contained, not in the policy contract, but only in the note, and is therefore within the ruling in the Arnold Case. Joyce on Insurance, § 1211; May on Insurance, § 345e." Columbian Nat. Ins. Co. v. Mulkey, 13 Ga. App. 508, 70 S. E. 482.

Following this ruling, in form and substance as above set forth, was a brief statement of the pleadings. By the original plea, and by amendments filed November 1, 1913, and December 15, 1914, it was alleged both that the policy sued on was ad initio void, and that it "became null and void" by reason of the nonpayment of the premium note; and by the original plea, and by an amendment filed December 3, 1914, the policy was alleged to be void because obtained by fraudulent representations on the part of the insured. After the above decision by this court a verdict was directed for the plaintiff. The case was again brought to this court, and the question as to the necessity of the return of the premium by the company as a prerequisite to its defense was certified to the Supreme Court, and after a decision upon the question by the court (Columbian National Life Insurance Co. v. Mulkey, 146 Ga. 267, 91 S. E. 106), a judgment was rendered by this court (Columbian National Life Insurance Co. v. Mulkey, 19 Ga. App. 247, 91 S. E. 344) reversing the judgment of the court below, the second and third divisions of the syllabus being as follows:

"Where suit is brought on an insurance policy which contains a stipulation to the effect that the policy will be void if procured by fraud on the part of the insured, a defense by the insurer that the policy is avoided on account of willful and material misrepresentation, made by the insured in his application for the policy, is not an attempt to rescind the contract, but an attempt to have it declared void ab initio. In such a case it is not necessary for the insurer, before pleading that the policy was voided by such misrepresentations, to return the premiums paid or the notes given therefor. The provisions of section 4305 of the Civil Code of 1910 are not applicable to such an action, but the law governing it is found in sections 2479, 2480, 2481. In other words, the insurer has a right to retain the premiums already received on the policy, and to avoid the policy because of the fraud practiced upon the insurer by the insured, and to plead such fraud as a defense to the suit. Columbian National Life Insurance Co. v. Mulkey, 146 Ga. 267, 91 S. E. 106.

"Under the ruling of this court when this case was formerly before us (Columbian National Life Insurance Co. v. Mulkey, 13 Ga. App. 508, 79 S. E. 482), it was not error for the trial court to strike paragraphs 3, 5, 6, and 7 of the original answer, or to strike the whole of the amendment allowed and filed November 1, 1913, or to strike the whole of the amendment allowed and filed December 15, 1914. This court in its previous decision of the case, however, did not pass upon the question ruled upon in the preceding paragraph of this decision; and, under the decision of the Supreme Court in this case (supra), the trial judge erred in striking the paragraphs of the original answer, with the exception of those just mentioned, and in striking the amendment allowed and filed December 3, 1914, and in refusing to allow the defendant to sustain by proof the allegations therein made."

Subsequently, the Supreme Court passed upon another phase of the litigation. Columbian National Life Insurance Co. v. Mulkey, 150 Ga. 45, 102 S. E. 346. On the last trial of the case in the court below, the defendant sought to amend its plea by again setting up as a ground for defense the provision in the unpaid premium note already referred to, and sought to show that this provision was legal and binding as a part of the insurance contract, so as to forfeit the policy upon its nonpayment at maturity. On motion of plaintiff's counsel, the original pleas, save the defense setting up fraud, together with the amended pleas, were stricken; after which upon the trial of the case, a verdict was directed in favor of the defendant on the issue of fraud. Plaintiff now brings her exceptions to the action of the court in directing a verdict for the defendant, and in excluding from the testimony the medical examiner's report to the company; and the defendant files its cross-bill, excepting to the order of the court in striking the amended defenses referred to.

It appears that the insured in the policy sued on had taken out another policy in the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company, and that the litigation under that policy has been determined. It appears that the issue and the evidence in the instant case and in that case pertaining to the issue of fraud on account of the alleged false and fraudulent material representations by the insured, were substantially the same, including the documentary evidence, although in the application for the Connecticut Mutual Policy the applicant stated that he used no beer and no alcoholic stimulants, while the application for the policy in the instant case does not go to that full extent, but states that he drank beer, one or two bottles a week, and alcoholic stimulants once or twice a month. The documentary evidence as to the proof of death, occurring about 6 months subsequent to the issuing of the policy, and as to the verdict of the coroner's inquest that the insured had died of acute alcoholism, was the same in both cases; likewise the extracts from the testimony of the insured taken from his examination in bankruptcy in September, 1911. Pursuant to a stipulation between counsel in the trial of the instant case, the defendant read the depositions of one witness taken in the other case, and read the stenographic report of the evidence delivered on that trial by seven additional witnesses. Pursuant to this stipulation the plaintiff read in evidence the testimony of nine of her witnesses as delivered in the trial of the other case; also the evidence of one of the defendant's witnesses in the other case. Dr. J. H. Conway was a witness for the defendant on both trials, and his evidence was substantially the same on both. The evidence of the respective medical directors of the defendant companies was similar in the two cases. J. M. Davis testified for the plaintiff to like effect in both cases. Except as above indicated, there was only one witness for the defendant and only one witness for the plaintiff who did not testify in the other trial, but their evidence does not materially alter the state of the case as proved; the evidence for the plaintiff in the instant case is almost the same, and is fully as strong, as in the former case; and the evidence for the defendant is almost identical, and substantially the same in effect, as offered in the trial of the previous case. Upon a question subsequently certified by this court to the Supreme Court in another case that court held:

"A contract of life insurance, as expressed in the policy issued by a company to an individual, may be supplemented by a subsequent contract between the parties, expressed in a promissory note given by the insured to the insurer for a premium on the policy and providing for a termination of all rights under the policy for nonpayment of the note, although the policy contain no such provision." State Life Insurance Co. v. Tyler, 147 Ga. 287(1), 93 S. E. 415.

Horton Bros. and Anderson, Rountree & Crenshaw, all of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Colquitt & Conyers, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

JENKINS, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The ruling in the first head-note, when taken in connection with the above statement of facts, does not seem to require further elaboration. Something additional may properly be said in regard to the rulings in the second and third head-notes.

[2] It is the contention of learned counsel for the insurance company that neither of the rulings made by this court in Columbian National Life Insurance Co. v. Mulkey, 13 Ga. App. 508, 79 S. E. 482, and 19 Ga. App. 247, 91 S. E. 344, can properly be taken as the law of this case, so as to exclude the defense made by virtue of the stipulation contained in the premium notes, for the reason that the ruling on the demurrer as made in 13 Ga. App. 508, 79 S. E. 482, "went no further than the judgment of the trial court, which was that a declaration setting up all the waivers and facts heretofore enumerated could withstand a general demurrer to the petition." In other words, the contention is, as we understand it, that, since the petition might have been held to be good by virtue of the saving allegations therein contained with reference to a waiver by the company of its defense growing out of the stipulation contained in the premium notes, neither the trial court nor this court can be taken to have gone further in its ruling than to hold that the petition as brought was good in law; and consequently that this, as the only ruling, is all that has become settled as "the law of the case," to the exclusion of what might have been given by this court merely as reasons for its decision. If the proposition should be accepted as sound that this court in ruling upon questions of law, is limited in its power to fix and determine the law of the case by the scope and necessary legal effect of the judgment rendered in the trial court, then the contention as now made might be correct, since it has been held that a judgment by a trial judge on a demurrer does not conclude a party upon any question not necessarily involved in such a demurrer. McElmurray v. Blodgett, 120 Ga. 9 (3), 47 S. E. 531; Ga. Northern Ry. Co. v. Hutchins, 119 Ga. 504 (1, 2), 510, 46 S. E. 659; Atlanta Post Co. v. McHenry, 106 S. E. 324. But, while we agree with counsel that a decision or ruling by this court such as shall constitute the "law of the case" does not consist in the line of reasoning or arguments set forth in the opinion, we do think that it includes each and every applicable proposition of law actually applied to the facts or pleadings involved (Heldt v. Minor, 113 Cal. 385, 45 Pac. 700, 701); and that a rule when thus announced, in so far as it relates to the case in which it was rendered, is binding alike upon the trial court and the court rendering it, in all subsequent proceedings therein. As we understand it, not only the judgment rendered by the appellate court, but all applicable rules of law actually applied in the decision, become the law of the case. Continental Life Insurance Co. v. Houser, 111 Ind. 266, 268, 12 N. E. 479. While it is true that a judgment by an appellate court does not become the law of the case upon any proposition not expressly or impliedly applied by it in the decision, yet where a proposition of law is plainly stated and applied to its decision, the rule thus applied becomes the law of that particular case in all subsequent proceedings therein, and that to such an extent that the appellate court itself is powerless to depart therefrom. Thus, the proposition of law as stated by this court, and applied to this case in 13 Ga. App. 508, 79 S. E. 482, not only binds the trial court, but this court as well. It was there held that—

"The failure to pay a promissory note, taken in payment of an insurance policy (although it is stipulated in the note that the nonpayment of the same at maturity will avoid the policy), will not forfeit the policy, where there is no condition in the policy itself providing for its forfeiture for the nonpayment of notes."

The petition had admitted the nonpayment of the premium notes containing such a stipulation. The demurrer raised the question of law. In passing thereon the court specifically planted its decision on its statement of the legal rule, and the rule as thus stated and applied became the law of the case. Under the ruling as made, the question as to whether, under the allegations of the petition, the company had by the conduct of its agents waived such a ground of defense, became moot, as it were, since that question became merged into and was comprehended by the more far-reaching and controlling proposition actually applied. A right which did not exist need not and could not be waived. The court in its subsequent decision in 19 Ga. App. 247, 91 S. E. 344, itself treated this question of law as adjudicated. The action of the trial judge in striking the original and amended portions of the plea, which pertain to this matter of defense, was following not only the original ruling, but the subsequent one as well, the latter of which was itself based upon this doctrine known as "the law of the case." It appears that when the case was here last these pleas had not, as was then supposed, been actually stricken; but the subsequent action in striking them is in accord with both of the decisions of this court. So far as the ruling in 19 Ga. App. 247, 91 S. E. 344, which relates not to the demurrer to the petition, but to the pleas as amended, is concerned, counsel seek to draw a distinction, such as might prevent the application of the latter case under the doctrine of the law of the case. The point is that, up to the time of the holding in 19 Ga. App. 247, 91 S. E. 344, the plea had sought to set up that the policy was void ab initio, whereas the recent amendment offered at the time of the last trial sought to show that the policy lapsed or became forfeited upon the nonpayment of the premium notes.

As already intimated, this contention is not urged with reference to the decision in 13 Ga. App. 508, 79 S. E. 482, since that decision was upon the overruling of the defendant's demurrer to the petition, and both the petition and the decision clearly had reference to a lapse or forfeiture. But even as to the point made with reference to the later decision, it would seem that the original plea, and certainly the plea filed December 15, 1914, sought to set up as a defense the lapse or forfeiture of the policy by reason of the nonpayment of the premium note on its maturity. In the original plea and answer it is set up, not only that the policy was void ab initio by reason of the nonpayment of the premium note, but "became, was, and is null and void by reason of the failure to pay the first premium thereon," and that "by the failure of the said William M. Mulkey to pay the notes, both the notes and the policy became null and void and of no force and effect whatsoever." In the amendment to the previous plea, filed December 15, 1914, it is stated that, by reason of the provision in the premium notes, the policy of insurance "lapsed and became null and void by the failure to pay the second of said notes at its maturity," and that, after receiving notice of such nonpayment, it took action upon said notes "by canceling and entering canceled said notes, and by lapsing and entering as lapsed said policy." This latter amendment, as well as the paragraphs in the earlier pleas containing the averments quoted, was specifically referred to in the opinion in 19 Ga. App. 247 (3), 248, 91 S. E. 344.

[3] The only other question involved relates to the exclusion of the special report to the defendant of the physician who examined the insured; which report appears to have been printed and written on the same pages as part II of the application, and which was signed by the medical examiner, but not by the applicant. This physician testified orally for the plaintiff in the trial; and the court, in excluding the report as independent evidence of itself, ruled that it was admissible "as a memorandum which the witness used." Plaintiff contends that it was admissible because it "is a part of the application written and printed on the same sheet, and it is likewise a part of the contract of insurance," that "this report was before the company when the application for insurance was considered, and it thus acquired direct knowledge and notice of every statement in the application," and that the knowledge of the medical examiner "will be imputed to the company." Since an examination of the report discloses nothing whatever to indicate any knowledge on the part of the examiner as to any fact conflicting with the statements made by the insured, and since it fails to disclose any statements from which any such knowledge might be deduced, the exclusion of such report was necessarily harmless to the defendant, as showing either actual or imputed knowledge by the company relating to the previous use of alcoholic stimulants by the insured. Thus, since the report could not have any probative value upon the sole issue to be determined, its exclusion could not in any event have been harmful to the defendant; and it therefore becomes unnecessary to determine whether or not it in fact constituted a part of the contract of insurance and for that reason was admissible. Moreover, it appears that the examiner as a witness for the plaintiff, testified to substantially everything treated in that report, and, while so testifying, was permitted, under the ruling of the court, to use the report as a memorandum to refresh his recollection: and by the ruling of the court the report was declared admissible for such purpose.

Judgment reversed on main bill of exceptions; affirmed on cross-bill.

HARRELL v. SOUTER. (No. 12155.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Nov. 1, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

4. Landlord and tenant \S 120(2)—Term of tenant at will does not terminate for two months after notice.

The term of a tenant at will does not expire at the instance of the landlord until after the expiration of two months after notice from his landlord to terminate the tenancy. Civil Code 1910, § 3709.

2. Landlord and tenant \S 291(11)—Tenant's counter affidavit held to make issue as to giving of notice requiring proof by plaintiff.

Where the landlord seeks by summary process to dispossess his tenant upon the ground that the latter was a tenant at will, holding over after the expiration of his term, and where the tenant in his counter affidavit arresting the proceedings alleges that his term has not expired, there is presented an issue as to whether the requisite two months' notice to vacate has been given to the tenant by the landlord; and where the evidence is silent upon this issue, the plaintiff cannot prevail. It follows, therefore, that a verdict for the defendant cannot be set aside upon the ground that it was contrary to law, and without evidence to support it.

FIRST STATE BANK OF MONROE v. CONNOLEY.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Nov. 17, 1921.)

1. Bailment \S 12—Person, given draft to take to another, who cashed it himself, held liable for loss of money irrespective of due care.

Where plaintiff asked defendant to take a draft to a bank in L. and bring back the money, without compensation, but, upon learning that defendant was not coming back from L. until in the night, told him to give it to H. and tell H. to send the draft by some responsible person, and H. told him to give the draft to M., but, upon learning that M. was not going to L., defendant took the draft to L. himself and cashed it, he exceeded his authority, and violated his duty as bailee, and was liable for the loss of the money, irrespective of any want of due care on his part.

2. Bailment \S 12—Gratuitous bailee subject to same obligations as others except as to degree of care required.

Except as to the degree of diligence and care required of him, the general obligation of a gratuitous bailee is the same as if he had assumed the trust upon the promise or with the expectation of reward.

3. Appeal and error \S 1175(5)—Judgment entered for plaintiff on reversal of judgment for defendant in accordance with uncontroverted facts.

On reversal of a judgment for defendant, where the facts seem to be fully before the court and are uncontroverted, and entitle plaintiff to final judgment for the amount sued for, the appellate court will enter judgment accordingly.

Error to Circuit Court, Amherst County.

Action by the First State Bank of Monroe against Charles Connoley. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed, and judgment entered for plaintiff.

This is an action of trespass on the case in assumpsit brought by the plaintiff in error bank, as plaintiff in the court below, against the defendant in error Connoley, as defendant in the court below, to recover the sum of $1,000, the amount of a draft belonging to the bank intrusted to and received by Connoley under certain instructions which did not authorize him to cash the draft, but which Connoley, in excess or in disregard of his instructions and authority, took to the bank on which it was drawn, cashed into money, and subsequently lost the money out of his pocket; the result being the loss to the bank of the amount of the draft which is sued for.

There was a trial by jury and a verdict and judgment accordingly in favor of the defendant.

There is no conflict in the evidence as to the material facts in the case, and they are as follows:

The defendant, Connoley, happened to be in the plaintiff's bank at Monroe on a certain day, and was asked to take a draft in an envelope to the First National Bank of Lynchburg, in Lynchburg, which was about seven miles from Monroe, and bring back the money which was called for by the draft, being the sum of $1,000. Connoley informed the bank that he did not expect to come back until in the night. He then started to leave the bank, and was called back and asked to take the draft to a Mr. Hicks at Monroe, and to tell Mr. Hicks to send the draft by some responsible person. The evidence, however, is express that the bank gave Connoley no authority whatever to himself take the draft to Lynchburg after Connoley stated that he did not expect to come back until in the night. Connoley took the envelope with the draft in it to Mr. Hicks, who said he was busy, and asked Connoley why Connoley did not take it. Connoley replied that he was not coming back till in the night. Hicks then told Connoley to take the draft over to the depot and give it to a Mr. McIvor to take to Lynchburg. Connoley took the draft to McIvor, but found that McIvor was not going to Lynchburg. Thereupon Connoley took the draft on to Lynchburg himself, went to the bank, got the money, done up into a package, and put it in his inside coat pocket. It was about 2 p. m. when Connoley cashed the draft. He had nothing in particular to do that afternoon, so he bought a pint of whisky in Lynchburg (just where or from whom he declined to tell), went to a picture show and other public places mentioned in his testimony, and left Lynchburg for Monroe that night about 10 o'clock, in a jitney, with four others. As he got in the jitney Connoley felt in his pocket and was confident he had the money at that time. Connoley was on the back seat of the automobile coming back to Monroe, with two of the other passengers on that seat. When they got to a watering trough, just outside of Lynchburg, the engine began to heat, and Connoley got out and put some water in the radiator. He did not miss the money until he got in his room at Monroe. He then went out and told a person, who was a witness in the case, that he had lost the money, got this person to take him back to the watering trough, where they both looked for but could not find the money. They afterwards looked in the jitney for the money, but failed to find it there. The next morning Connoley went to the bank, and told the cashier that he had lost the money. The pint bottle of whisky was only half full when one of the witnesses saw it when the stop was made to put water in the radiator as aforesaid. Connoley had been drinking while in Lynchburg and on his return to Monroe, but, as several witnesses testified, was at no time drunk. The money was never found. Connoley was not promised any compensation for his services in connection with the matter and received none; his action being wholly gratuitous and for the sole benefit of the bank.

The instructions given by the court assumed that the defendant, Connoley, had the implied authority to take the draft to Lynchburg, etc., and were to the effect that if the jury believed that the defendant was a gratuitous bailee for the sole benefit of the bank, the law required of him only a slight degree of care, and made him answerable only for gross negligence.

And the court refused to give the following instruction asked for by the plaintiff, namely:

"(2) The court instructs the jury that if you believe from the evidence that the defendant had no authority from the plaintiff's cashier to take the draft in question to Lynchburg and collect same himself, and that he did so in violation of his instructions, and thereby exceeded or disregarded his instructions given him at the time he received said draft, and that by reason of his exceeding or disregarding his instructions plaintiff's money became lost, the defendant is liable in the action, irrespective of any question of negligence on his part."

The action of the court in refusing to give the last-named instruction is one of the assignments of error.

B. B. Campbell, of Lynchburg, for plaintiff in error.

Whitehead & Shroder, of Amherst, for defendant in error.

SIMS, J., after making the foregoing statement delivered the following opinion of the court:

[1] In the view we take of the case, the sole question presented by the assignments of error which we need to decide is the following:

1. Is the defendant, Connoley, liable to the plaintiff bank for the money which was lost by him while he was acting in disregard of his instructions from the bank in accordance with which he accepted the undertaking confided to him.

This question must be answered in the affirmative.

The defendant, Connoley, was undoubtedly-ly in the inception of the transaction which was the basis of this action, a gratuitous bailee or mandatory, acting for the sole benefit of the bank, the bailor; and if the defendant had not exceeded or disregarded his instructions the law of the case would have been in accordance with the instructions which were given by the trial court. For all of the authorities lay it down that a gratuitous bailee can be held liable for gross negligence only. 5 Cyc. 186; Carrington v. Ficklin's Ex'rs, 73 Va. (32 Grat.) 677; and numerous other Virginia cases and other authorities. What is gross negligence in a given case is a matter not always easy to determine, as it will depend upon all the circumstances of the particular case. However, that question does not arise in the case before us, for the reason that the uncontroverted evidence plainly shows that the defendant disregarded and exceeded his instructions in accordance with which he had accepted the undertaking confided to him, when he took the draft to Lynchburg and cashed it. When he took that action he did so outside of the authority conferred upon him as bailee. That authority extended no further than his taking the draft in the first instance to Hicks, and subsequently, under Hicks' direction, to McIvor. He had no authority from any one to take the draft any further. He should have left the draft with McIvor or have brought it back to and have left it with Hicks, according to his instructions from the bank. When he went further, and took the draft on to Lynchburg, he assumed an authority which had not been conferred upon him, and, in truth, acted, in so doing, not as bailee, but as a wrongdoer, and became personally responsible to the owner for the loss occasioned by such conduct, irrespective of any want of due care on his part. See note to 4 A. L. R. 1225 et seq. and authorities cited.

As said in the note supra (4 A. L. R. 1225):

"If a gratuitous bailee undertakes to deal with the subject of the bailment in a manner not warranted by his instructions, expressed or implied, * * * and the property is lost, he is liable therefor, irrespective of any want of due care on his part, unless his act is ratified by the bailor with full knowledge of the circumstances"—citing a number of authorities, among which is a Supreme Court decision, in the case of Walker v. Smith, 4 Dall. 389, 1 L. Ed. 878, 879.

In that case the defendant was a gratuitous bailee of certain goods, which the plaintiffs by letter requested him to hold at the disposal of one B., but not to deliver them to B. without being paid for the amount of the goods, or having such security given therefor as was satisfactory to the defendant, bailee. The defendant received the goods, but delivered them to B. without receiving payment or exacting any security.

Held: The defendant was liable for the value of the goods.

[2] As said of a bailee, who receives a deposit gratuitously, in Jenkins v. Bacon, 111 Mass. 373, 15 Am. Rep. 33:

"Except as to the degree of diligence and care required of him, his general obligation is the same as if he had assumed the trust upon the promise or with the expectation of reward"—citing numerous authorities.

So too, if a bailee for hire makes an unauthorized use of the subject of the bailment, he is liable for any resulting loss or damage irrespective of whether he is or is not negligent. Spencer v. Pilcher, 35 Va. (8 Leigh) 565; Harvey v. Epps, 53 Va. (12 Grat.) 153.

The uncontroverted evidence in the case before us is express that the bank gave the defendant no authority to take the draft to Lynchburg after his statement that he would not return until in the night; nor was there any evidence whatsoever before the jury to support a finding that the defendant had the implied authority to do so.

[3] We feel constrained, therefore, to set aside the verdict and judgment under review, because of the refusal of the trial court to give instruction No. 2, quoted above, asked for by the plaintiff; and, as the facts of the case seem to be fully before us and are uncontroverted, and are such that we feel compelled to say that the plaintiff is entitled to final judgment against the defendant for the sum of $1,000, the amount sued for, we will enter judgment accordingly for that sum, with interest from the date of the entry of the order, and for the costs of the plaintiff in this court and in the court below.

Reversed and final judgment.

NORFOLK & W. RY. CO. et al. v. ARRINGTON.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Railroads §5½. New, vol. 6A Key-No. Series — Companies not liable for injuries caused during federal control.

The companies owning the railroads are not liable for injuries caused by the operation thereof under the control of the Director General of Railroads.

2. Appeal and error §1173(1) — Erroneous judgment against railroad company does not require reversal as against Director General.

The fact that a judgment for the death of an employee rendered against both the railroad company and the Director General of Railroads was erroneous as against the company does not affect the liability of the Director General, under Code 1919, § 6365.

3. Witnesses ¶281 — Cross-question should not impute to witness a statement not made by him.

Counsel in cross-examining an adverse witness should not ask a question imputing to the witness a statement which he had not made.

4. Appeal and error ¶1048(5) — Permitting improper question immediately corrected held harmless.

Error in overruling an objection to a question asked defendant's engineer, which imputed to him a statement made by the fireman and not by the engineer, was not prejudicial to defendant, where the witness denied making such statement and the court immediately corrected its ruling and sustained the objection.

5. Railroads ¶390—Last clear chance held applicable to killing of licensee.

In an action for the death of licensee working on a railroad grade for an independent contractor, where there was ample evidence that the fireman saw deceased on the track with his back to the train and notified the engineer, but that the engineer took no measures to warn deceased or stop the train until he could see deceased after the engine had rounded a curve and just before it struck deceased, the doctrine of last clear chance was applicable.

Error to Circuit Court, Montgomery County.

Action by Cora Arrington, administratrix of the estate of G. C. Arrington, deceased, against the Norfolk & Western Railway Company and Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads. Judgment for the plaintiff against both defendants, and they bring error. Reversed and remanded as to the Railway Company, and affirmed as to the Director General.

Jordan, Roop & Sowder, of Christianburg, F. M. Rivinus, of Philadelphia, Pa., and H. J. Phlegar, of Christianburg, for plaintiffs in error.

Harless & Calhoun, of Christianburg, for defendant in error.

PRENTIS, J. G. C. Arrington was killed by a train of the Norfolk & Western Railway Company, in August, 1918, while the system was being operated by the Director General of Railroads. His administratrix sued both the company and the Director General of Railroads, and recovered against both. Both defendants complain of the judgment, and three of the errors assigned are relied upon in this court.

1. The first assignment is that the court erred in overruling the motion of the Norfolk & Western Railway Company to dismiss the action against it, relying upon General Orders Nos. 50 and 50A, United States Railway Administration.

[1] The question thus raised has been much discussed in the state and federal courts recently. It is unnecessary for us to treat it at any length, because by a recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, handed down June 1, 1921, the question must be regarded as definitely settled. Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Ault, 256 U. S. —, 41 Sup. Ct. 593, 85 L. Ed. —.

It is there said, with reference to this identical point:

"The company is clearly not answerable in the present action if the ordinary principles of common-law liability are to be applied. The Railroad Administration established by the President in December, 1917, did not exercise its control through supervision of the owner-companies, but by means of a Director General through 'one control, one administration, one power for the accomplishment of the one purpose, the complete possession by governmental authority to replace for the period provided the private ownership theretofore existing.' Northern Pac. Ry. Co. v. North Dakota, 250 U. S. 135, 148, 63 L. Ed. 897, 902, P. U. R. 1919D, 706, 39 Sup. Ct. 502. This authority was confirmed by the Federal Control Act of March 21, 1918, c. 25, 40 Stat. at L. 451, and the ensuing proclamation of March 29, 1918, 40 Stat. at L. 1763. By the establishment of the Railroad Administration and subsequent orders of the Director General, the carrier companies were completely separated from the control and management of their systems. Managing officials were 'required to sever their relations with the particular companies and to become exclusive representatives of the United States Railroad Administration.' U. S. R. R. Adm. Bulletin, No. 4, pp. 113, 114, 313. The railway employees were under its direction and were in no way controlled by their former employers. See Bulletin No. 4, p. 168, § 5, page 198 et seq., page 330 et seq. It is obvious, therefore, that no liability arising out of the operation of these systems was imposed by the common law upon the owner companies, as their interest in and control over the systems were completely suspended."

The opinion handed down by Mr. Justice Brandeis proceeds with convincing reasoning to show the soundness of the conclusion that the motion of the Missouri Pacific Railway Company in that case to dismiss the action against it should have been sustained.

The very great weight of authority in the inferior federal courts as well as in the state courts supports this view, and the question is no longer open.

[2] The motion of the Norfolk & Western Railway Company should have been sustained, because the injury to the plaintiff's intestate occurred while the system was being operated by the Director General, and the court committed error in overruling it. This conclusion, however, does not affect the liability of the Director General of Railroads (Code 1919, § 6365), and we will proceed to consider the other assignments of error.

2. On cross-examination of the engineman, Douthat, counsel for the plaintiff asked the following question:

"Q. Then you did not blow it until you got to the straight track, although you acknowledge the man was oblivious to his danger and standing on the west-bound track?"

To this question the attorneys for the defendants objected, the objection was overruled, and exception duly taken, but immediately thereafter the court ruled that the question was improper, and sustained the objection thereto.

[3, 4] As the engineer had not acknowledged that the deceased was oblivious to his danger, the question was manifestly improper. There was, however, evidence in the case from the fireman and others that the deceased appeared to be oblivious to his danger for an appreciable time before he was struck. It is, however, not fair, even upon cross-examination, for attorneys to assume that a witness has made a statement which he has not made, and such a practice should be firmly restrained by the trial courts. Inasmuch as in this case the court immediately reversed its ruling, we find nothing in the occurrence which would justify a reversal of this case. The jury had heard the evidence of the witness, and knew that he had not acknowledged that the deceased was oblivious of his danger; indeed, the answer to this objectionable question by the witness himself was that he had no such knowledge, and then the prompt reversal of the ruling by the trial judge emphasized to the jury the fact that the witness had not so testified. It is thus perfectly clear that the error so quickly and completely corrected was not prejudicial; indeed, the incident in its close was altogether beneficial to the defendants, for the fact that the engineer claimed that he had no such knowledge was made obvious.

3. The other assignment of error here relied upon is that the court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial upon the ground that the verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence. The determination of this question depends upon whether under the evidence the defendant could be held liable under the doctrine of the last clear chance, or discovered peril.

[5] There were numerous instructions given at the instance of the litigants. It is conceded in the briefs that the jury were fully and properly instructed, and of the eight instructions given at the instance of the defendant, six recognized that doctrine as applicable to the evidence in this case. Under the evidence, this question was fairly referable to the jury, and of this there can be no doubt whatever. The unquestioned facts are that the deceased was a licensee, being a servant of an independent contractor who was engaged in grading work on the railway line. He was a foreman, having charge of a large number of hands. The line was double-tracked at that point, and after attending to some of his duties on the south of the east-bound track he recrossed that track and nearly crossed the west-bound track, but stood on the end of one of the ties. A train going east passed about that time, and he was struck by a train going west on the west-bound track while thus standing. The defendants had knowledge of the fact that the grading work was proceeding, and had issued an order that the trains were to go slowly at that point. The fireman on the train which struck the deceased first observed him when 431 feet away, thereafter noted his change of position, saw that he was looking west with his back toward the approaching west-bound train, and perceived that he was apparently oblivious of his danger. The fireman promptly notified the engineman, who, according to his own testimony, then looked out of the window on his side in order to satisfy himself as to the facts. As the engineman was on the outside of the curve on which the train was then running, he did not see the deceased. Then as the train rounded the curve he could see for a distance of 214 feet on a straight track, but, inasmuch as the length of the engine was ahead, it was within 164 feet at the time he might with due care have seen the deceased and realized his peril. The engineman testifies, however, that he was within 50 feet of the deceased when he first saw, or could have seen, him, and that he did everything that could have been done to save him by endeavoring to slacken the speed of the train and by sounding danger signals. There is, however, abundant testimony to the effect that the speed of the train was not slackened until just at the time of the casualty, and that no warning whistle was sounded until immediately before the deceased was struck. The admitted facts that the trainmen had notice to operate the trains at that point with caution, that before the occurrence of the casualty the fireman appreciated the danger and notified the engineman of the fact, and that according to the testimony of many witnesses, notwithstanding the discovered peril of the deceased, the train was not brought under control, and that no warning signal was given until it was too late, make a case in which the issue of fact must be submitted to a jury. The instructions, which are unobjectionable, show that this was the view of the defendants at the time the case was tried. If the jury had ignored all of the physical facts and the testimony of all of the other witnesses except that of the engineman, they might have found in favor of the defendant; but they also had the right to discredit his testimony and to accept the weight of the evidence to the effect that under the doctrine of discovered peril the plaintiff was entitled to recover notwithstanding the contributory negligence of the deceased.

Among the recent cases in this state which apply the doctrine are Wilson's Adm'r v. Va. Portland R. Co., 122 Va. 160, 94 S. E. 347; Roaring Fork R. Co. v. Ledford, 126 Va. 97, 101 S. E. 141, 871; Gunter's Adm'r v. Southern Ry. Co., 126 Va. 535, 101 S. E. 885; Gordon's Adm'r v. Director General, 128 Va. 426, 104 S. E. 796.

GARBER v. SAUFLEY et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Nov. 17, 1921.)

1. Wills \S 524(8), 614(8)—Legatee held to take only life estate with remainder to descendants.

A will, "I give to E. the balance of my property, * * * her lifetime, and if she should die without leaving an heir, then I want all that I have given her divided into three parts," etc., held to give E. a life estate in the residue, with remainder to her descendants living at the time of her death, whether occurring before or after the death of the testator.

2. Wills \S 104 — Limitation over held not void for uncertainty.

A will giving to a daughter a life estate in the residue, "and if she should die without leaving an heir, then I want all that I have given her divided into three equal parts, and put on interest for the benefit of my grandchildren, to be given to them after they reach the age of 21. If R.'s children should not live to that age, I want their shares to be given to L.'s," etc., held not void for uncertainty as to the limitation over.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Augusta County.

Suit by Sandy S. Saufley, executor of Ada B. C. Hollar, deceased, against E. Orvetta Garber and others. From a decree, the named defendant appeals. Amended and affirmed.

Rudolph Bumgardner, of Staunton, for appellant.

J. A. Alexander, of Staunton, for appellees.

SAUNDERS, J. This appeal presents for construction the fifth clause of the will of Mrs. A. B. C. Hollar.

This lady was twice married. By her first husband, Saufley, she had three children, Ressie W., the wife of one Neff, who has two children; Sandy S. Saufley, who has four children; and Lena L., the wife of one McAllister, who is childless. By her second husband, one Hollar, the testatrix had a child, E. Orvetta, who married Charles P. Garber, and by him has two children.

The testatrix appointed her son, Sandy S. Saufley, executor of her estate, and asked that he be allowed to qualify without security.

The executor found some difficulty in construing paragraph 5 of testatrix's will, and brought a suit in the circuit court of Augusta county, asking the "aid and assistance" of the court in this respect. The paragraph to be construed is the following:

"Fifth. I give to E. Orvetta Garber the balance of my property, all real estate and personal property that I may own at the time of my death I want Orvetta to have, her lifetime, and if she should die without leaving an heir, then I want all that I have given her divided into three equal parts, and put on interest for the benefit of my grandchildren, to be given to them as they reach the age of twenty-one. If Ressie's children should not live to reach that age, I want their shares given to Lena's, and Sandy's children when they reach that age, if they have any children."

It is stated in the will that it was written by the testatrix.

E. Orvetta Garber answered the bill of the executor, Saufley, asserting that according to the true construction of the will, supra, she took "a fee-simple estate in the realty, and an absolute estate in the personalty remaining after the payment of the funeral expenses, and the three legacies of $5.00 each, given to the three daughters."

The trial court construed the will as follows:

"Orvetta takes a life estate. Remainder to her children, if she has any surviving her. If she dies without leaving children surviving her, then the estate is to be divided into three parts for the benefit of the children of Mrs. Neff, Sandy Saufley, a son, and Lena McAllister, a daughter. If none of Mrs. Neff's children reach the age of 21, their third goes to Lena's, and Sandy's children. If Lena leaves no children, that third goes to the other grandchildren."

A decree embodying the foregoing interpretation of the will in question was entered by the circuit court. From this decree an appeal was taken by E. Orvetta Garber, bringing the controversy before this court for determination.

The following errors are assigned by the appellant.

"First. Because the trial court did not hold that the limitation over to the grandchildren was void for uncertainty, and, if not, fails by reason of the fulfillment of the condition annexed to the previous estate.

"Second. Because the court did not hold that E. Orvetta Garber took a fee-simple estate in the land, and an absolute estate in the personalty; or limiting her to a life estate, did not hold that her children took a vested estate in remainder at her death."

[1] The phrasing of the will is inartificial and in some degree redundant, but on the whole the testamentary scheme of Mrs. Hollar is fairly apparent from the language employed. The contention of the appellant that she takes a fee simple in the real estate, and an absolute estate in the personality, rests upon a highly artificial, if not distorted, construction of the first sentence of item 5. This sentence would give Orvetta a fee if a period was placed after the word "property," and the remainder of the sentence as well as the succeeding provisions of the paragraph were eliminated. But this action would do violence to the obvious intent of the testatrix. Plainly she intends to give Orvetta a life estate in the residuum. Not only do the words used with reference to Orvetta indicate such intention, but that indication is strengthened by the precise arrangements made for the testatrix's grandchildren. These provisions are entirely intelligible, and easy of execution. If the testatrix had intended to give Orvetta a fee, the fifth item could have been reduced to the opening sentence, as follows: "I give to E. Orvetta Garber the balance of my property, all real estate and personal property that I may own at the time of my death I want Orvetta to have;" or in even shorter terms: "I give to E. Orvetta Garber the balance of my property." The language, "I give to E. Orvetta Garber the balance of my property," etc., "her lifetime, and if she should die without leaving an heir," by plain implication confers upon the heirs of Orvetta Garber, i. e., the descendants living at the time of her death, the life estate devised to the mother. Such descendants are the tenants in remainder of the life estate of the ancestor. See Wine v. Markwood, 31 Grat. (72 Va.) 48. In this case one Sampson Pelter, a son of the testator, was devised a life estate. In the same connection the testator used this language: "Should my son, Sampson, die without issue, I direct," etc. Construing this language, the court held that by necessary implication it was intended by the testator that "the issue of Sampson Pelter living at his death" should take the remainder.

A further contention of the appellant, E. Orvetta Garber, is that the reference to death, contained in the will of the testatrix, namely, "if she (i. e., Orvetta) should die without leaving an heir," is to the death of Orvetta before the death of the testatrix. In that connection Peyton v. Perkinson, 98 Va. 215, 35 S. E. 450, and cases following same, are cited. It is true that in the case ubi supra the court construed the words, "If any of my children should depart this life leaving a child or children, such child or children are to be entitled to," etc., to refer to the death of the devisees prior to the death of the testator. But the court in construing this language, which was a part of an elaborate and entire instrument, reached the conclusion that the testator intended by said language, which occurred in the twelfth item of his will, "only to cover the period between the execution of his will and his own death," in view of the fact that the testator had been at too great pains in other portions of his will "to use appropriate words for creating an absolute estate in the items or clauses" * * * in which he makes provision for his children, if by the twelfth item he intended to cut down the estate conferred upon them, respectively, from an absolute or fee simple estate to a life estate, should they die at any time [italics supplied], leaving a child or children surviving them." Hence the conclusion that the testator intended by the twelfth item "to cover only the period between the execution of his will and his own death."

In the instant case the estate conferred upon Orvetta Garber is a life estate, not a fee. Moreover, the provisions of the two instruments are entirely dissimilar. It has been often said that precedents involving the construction of wills are of but little aid in the interpretation of a specific testament. Even in respect of individual words and phrases, there is no strict uniformity of construction. Under the compelling force of the context, a word may be given one meaning in one will, and a different meaning in another. We are satisfied that the will in the instant case refers to the death of the devisee, Orvetta Garber, at any time, and not to her death prior to the death of the testatrix. We are aided to reach this conclusion by the provisions made for the children of Ressie Neff and Sandy Saufley, and the possible children of Lena McAllister, which repel the theory that the testatrix intended by the words, "if she should die without leaving an heir," to cover only the period between the execution of her will and her own death. Having provided for Orvetta Garber during her lifetime, and for her descendants living at her death, the testatrix contemplated and provided for the contingency that her daughter Orvetta might die without issue. In that event the will provides that the corpus of the estate should be "divided into three equal parts, and put on interest for the benefit of my grandchildren, to be given to them as they reach the age of twenty-one. If Ressie's children should not live to reach that age, I want their shares given to Lena's and Sandy's children when they reach that age, if they have any children."

[2] Appellant attacks this provision for testatrix's grandchildren in vigorous fashion, alleging that this limitation over fails either for uncertainty, or the discharge of the condition. In the view of the appellant this condition was discharged when the testatrix died leaving Orvetta and the latter's children living. But we have already considered and rejected the contention that in the instant case the words "if she should die without leaving an heir" refer to the death of Orvetta prior to the death of the testatrix. In support of the contention that Orvetta takes a fee on the ground that the limitation over is void for uncertainty, appellant cites Early v. Arnold, 119 Va. 500, 89 S. E. 900. In that case the devise was as follows:

"I want my son, William Stewart Kinnaman, to have my entire interest in the estate of my father, James T. Early. If Stewart should die without heirs, I want it to go to whoever has been his best friend."

Plainly, this limitation over "to whoever has been the best friend," of W. Stewart Kinnaman, was void for uncertainty, and Kinnaman took a fee simple in the real estate, and an absolute estate in the personal property passing by his mother's will.

But this decision is not pertinent to, much less decisive of, the instant case. There is no uncertainty in the provisions of Mrs. Hollar's will relating to her grandchildren. The will clearly provides that in the event Orvetta dies without issue, the estate is to be divided into three parts, and put at interest to be given to the grandchildren as they respectively reach the age of 21. It is altogether possible that at Orvetta Garber's death, should she die without issue, all of the indicated beneficiaries may be of age and capable to take. The trial court in the main correctly construed the provisions of the will relating to the grandchildren when it said:

"If she (i. e., Orvetta) dies without leaving children surviving her, then the estate is to be divided into three parts for the benefit of the children of Mrs. Neff, a daughter, Sandy Saufey, a son, and Lena McAllister, another daughter. If none of Mrs. Neff's children reach the age of 21, their third goes to Lena and Sandy's children. If Lena leaves no children, that third goes to the other grandchildren."

But in one respect the decree of the circuit court is erroneous. It interprets the word "heir" in the sentence, "if Orvetta should die without leaving an heir," to mean child. Evidently the word "heir" in this connection has a broader significance, and means "descendant."

The decree complained of will be amended in this respect, substituting the word "descendants" for the word "children," and as amended will be affirmed.

Affirmed.

FITZGERALD v. CAMPBELL

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Nov. 17, 1921.)

1. Judgment \Leftrightarrow 631—Payment to sheriff held not "satisfaction" of judgment so as to bar suit against joint tort-feasor.

Where plaintiff instituted two suits against joint tort-feasor in commission of identical wrong, and the court, without knowledge or consent of the plaintiff, ordered execution to issue under judgment obtained in first action tried, pursuant to Code 1919, § 6500, and plaintiff refused to accept the money from the sheriff and directed that it might be returned to the parties who paid it, there was no payment or "satisfaction" of the judgment within the meaning of section 6264 so as to bar plaintiff's action in the other case.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Satisfaction—Satisfy.]

2. Judgment \Leftrightarrow 630—Judgment for plaintiff against joint tort-feasor no bar to action against other joint tort-feasor.

Under Code 1919, § 6264, judgment against several joint tort-feasors does not bar the prosecution of an action by plaintiff against other joint wrongdoers, and he may await the trial and result of the latter action before deciding whether or not he will prosecute the first judgment by suing out execution thereon.

3. Execution \Leftrightarrow 60—Clerk at common law had no right to issue without direction.

At common law clerk of court has no right to issue any execution without the direction of the plaintiff or his attorney.

Error to Circuit Court, Augusta County.

Action by J. W. Fitzgerald against James Campbell. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed and remanded.

This is an action of trespass brought by plaintiff in error, as plaintiff in the court below, against the defendant in error, as defendant in the court below, seeking to recover damages for an assault and battery committed upon the plaintiff by the defendant as alleged in the declaration.

The defense interposed by the defendant in the court below by special plea was that at the same time at which this action was instituted the plaintiff also brought another action against one C. P. McClure and five others, as joint tort-feasors with the said defendant, Campbell, in the commission of the identical wrong, to wit, the said assault and battery, alleged in the declaration in the instant case; that the plaintiff elected to try the action against McClure and others first, and on December 2, 1920, recovered a judgment against McClure and others in the said action against them at the term of court then being held; that no direction was given to the clerk by the plaintiff or his attorney when or after such judgment was recovered not to issue execution thereon, nor did the plaintiff or his attorney at any time request the clerk to issue execution on such judgment; that pursuant, however, to an established custom of the court, the court below, acting under section 6500 of the Code, on December 16, 1920, more than 15 days from the beginning of the current term, entered the following order, to wit: "Ordered that execution may issue on all judgments and decrees rendered during the present term of the court after ten days from this date"—that execution on said judgment was accordingly issued by the clerk of the court below, bearing date December 21, 1920, and went into the hands of the sheriff to be executed, and afterwards, and before the instant case was called for trial, the amount of the execution was paid to the sheriff by the several execution debtors; that the court did not adjourn for the term until some time in the following January; that at the time this payment was so made neither the sheriff nor the execution debtors had any actual knowledge of the fact that the plaintiff did not desire that payment should be so made and received. And such payment was, by such special plea, pleaded and relied on as payment in full and in discharge of the said execution and judgment and as satisfaction thus received by the plaintiff for the damages occasioned him by the alleged wrong committed upon him, and in bar of any recovery against the defendant in the instant action.

It was and is a fact, however, that neither the plaintiff nor his counsel intended to accept any payment from the said judgment debtors or any of them, or that execution should issue on the judgment, before the instant case had been tried and determined; nor did the plaintiff or his counsel know that the execution had issued until it was paid as aforesaid. Further, the plaintiff thereupon refused to accept said payment, and the money was left in the hands of the sheriff, with the direction from counsel for plaintiff that it might be returned to the parties who paid it.

The foregoing are conceded to be the facts in the case.

There being no controversy as to the facts, by pleadings which were somewhat irregular, but as to which all objections before us have been waived, the case was submitted to the court below for decision upon the point of law involved. Whereupon the court, in substance, decided that the payment to the sheriff was to one authorized to receive it, and was therefore, in contemplation of law, a payment and satisfaction of the judgment, within the meaning of section 6264 of the Code, and hence that upon the special plea and upon the facts aforesaid the law was for the defendant, and entered judgment accordingly, dismissing the plaintiff's action, with costs, however, to the plaintiff as the statute provides; and the plaintiff brings error.

Hugh A. White, of Staunton, and Chas. A. Hammer, of Harrisonburg, for plaintiff in error.

Curry & Curry and Timberlake & Nelson, all of Staunton, for defendant in error.

SIMS, J., after making the foregoing statement, delivered the following opinion of the court:

[1] The case turns upon the decision of the following question, namely:

(1) Was the execution issued by the clerk without the direction of the plaintiff, under the general order of court, such an execution that the payment of it to the sheriff by the execution debtors, without the express or implied actual consent of the plaintiff, can be considered as, in contemplation of law, a payment or satisfaction of the judgment within the meaning of section 6264 of the Code, so as to bar the plaintiff's action in the instant case?

This question must be answered in the negative.

Section 6264 of the Code, so far as material, is as follows:

"A judgment against one of several joint wrongdoers shall not bar the prosecution of an action against any or all the others, but the injured party may bring separate actions against the wrongdoers and proceed to judgment in each, * * * and no bar shall arise as to any of them by reason of a judgment against another, or others, until the judgment has been satisfied. If there be separate judgments against different defendants for a joint wrong, the plaintiff shall elect which of them he will prosecute, but the payment or satisfaction of any one of such judgments shall be a discharge of all, except as to the costs."

Prior to this statute the rule on the subject in Virginia was the same as that in England, being that a judgment against one of several joint wrongdoers, whether satisfied or not, was a bar to any action against the others. Petticolas v. City of Richmond, 95 Va. 456, 28 S. E. 566, 64 Am. St. Rep. 811. The revisors' note to section 6264 of the Code contains this statement:

"This section is new, and overturns Petticolas v. City of Richmond. * * * It is said, however, that the great weight of authority in the United States is otherwise (Burks' Pl. & Pr. p. 10), and the new section makes this view statutory in Virginia, the revisors being of opinion that the bar should not fall until there has been a satisfaction of the wrong done."

The rule in the United States in accordance with the great weight of authority and that now made statutory in Virginia, as stated by the revisors of the Code, as aforesaid, is thus enunciated in 1 Cooley on Torts (3d Ed.) p. 232:

"The rule laid down by that eminent jurist [Chief Justice Kent of New York], and which has been since generally followed in this country, is that the party injured may bring separate suits against the wrongdoers, and proceed to judgment in each, and that no bar arises as to any of them until satisfaction is received. * * * But he [the plaintiff] can claim or enforce only one satisfaction for the same injury; he must elect against which of the several he will proceed to execution for the satisfaction of his damages. * * * And such election, followed by actual satisfaction of that particular judgment, will preclude the plaintiff from proceeding against either of the other defendants upon the judgments recovered against them, except for the costs of the respective cases, which he may enforce the collection of by execution."

See to same effect note 11 Am. St. Rep. 906.

[2] We are of opinion that under this rule, and by the very terms of the statute above quoted, the plaintiff had the right to elect whether he would or would not prosecute the judgment he obtained against the wrongdoers other than Campbell, and therefore had the right to await the trial and the result of the instant case before deciding whether he would prosecute the judgment aforesaid, by suing out execution thereon. And whatever may be the effect of the action of a clerk in issuing executions in other cases, under a general order of court such as that involved in the instant case, prior to the adjournment of the court for the term (as to which we are not called upon in this case to decide, and therefore express no opinion), we hold that such an order of court cannot be held to have the effect of authorizing the clerk to exercise the said right of election for the plaintiff, which would be the result if the execution issued by the clerk under the circumstances of the instant case could be held to be such an execution that the payment of it to the sheriff by the execution debtors, without the consent of the plaintiff, was in contemplation of law the payment or satisfaction of the judgment within the meaning of section 6264 of the Code.

[3] At common law the clerk has no right to issue any execution without the direction of the plaintiff or his attorney. Herman on Executions, pp. 64, 66, 79; 23 O. J. p. 364; 17 Cyc. 986.

As said in Herman on Executions, supra, p. 66:

"In the absence of statutory provisions to the contrary, a clerk has no right to issue executions without the direction of the plaintiff or his attorney. * * * The property in the judgment is in the plaintiff therein, and he alone or those acting for him, have the exclusive right to order execution. * * *"

In 23 C. J. p. 364, this is said:

"In the absence of statutory regulation the clerk has no authority to issue an execution without the direction of the judgment creditor or his attorney. * * * A party is not bound by a proceeding under an execution issued without his authority or that of his attorney, even though it is the custom of the clerk to issue executions without such authority."

Section 6480 of the Code does authorize the clerk after the adjournment of the term of court at which a judgment is rendered to issue execution thereon without any direction so to do, by providing that—

"It shall be the duty of the clerk * * * to issue a writ of fieri facias as soon as practicable after the adjournment of the term of the court * * * and place the same in the hands of the proper officer of such court to be executed * * * unless he [the clerk] be otherwise directed by writing by the beneficiary of such judgment, his agent or attorney."

The learned judge of the court below gave to section 6500 of the Code, under which the general order of court involved in the case before us was entered, and to such general order itself, the same meaning as that of section 6480. The language of section 6500 and of the general order of court aforesaid is very different from that of section 6480. Section 6500, so far as material, is as follows:

"Any court after the fifteenth day of its term, may make a general order allowing executions to issue on judgments and decrees after ten days from their date, although the term at which they are rendered be not ended." (Italics supplied.)

And the general order of court aforesaid provided:

"That executions may issue on all judgments and decrees rendered during the present term of the court after ten days from their date." (Italics supplied.)

Hence, without deciding what would have been the effect of the action of the clerk if it had been under section 6480 aforesaid, we have no hesitancy in holding that the action of the clerk in the instant case, without the direction of the plaintiff or his attorney, cannot be regarded as authorized by the plaintiff, or by law, so as to give to it the effect of an exercise of the plaintiff's right of election aforesaid. Without some affirmative action on the part of the plaintiff, such as suing out the execution, or receiving the money collected by the sheriff under it, or the like, actually accepting or in some way binding the plaintiff to accept such money, "in satisfaction of the wrong done" (to quote the language aforesaid of the revisors of the Code), the plaintiff cannot be said to have ever exercised his right of election given him by the statute (section 6264 of the Code) as aforesaid. Until such right of election was actually exercised by the plaintiff in some way, it remained unaffected by whatsoever else may have occurred.

In Iowa a defendant has the statutory right to pay to the clerk of the court in which it is rendered the amount of any judgment against him in discharge of the judgment. In the case of McDonald v. Nugen, 118 Iowa, 512, 92 N. W. 675, 96 Am. St. Rep. 407, the plaintiff sued separately and recovered a judgment against one joint tortfeasor, which was paid to the clerk of the court by the other tortfeasor, without authority in fact from the plaintiff to such clerk to accept payment for him, nor did the plaintiff in fact accept such payment. The authority of the clerk to receive payment was purely statutory. The joint tort-feasor who paid such judgment pleaded such payment in bar of the plaintiff's action against him. The court in the opinion, after referring to the majority rule above mentioned as prevailing in that state, said this:

"This brings us to the question of what is the legal satisfaction contemplated by the rule above noticed. The authorities generally hold that the plaintiff may prosecute separate actions against joint wrongdoers to final judgments, if in the meantime he has not received satisfaction for the injury from any source (Cooley on Torts, 138), and that he may elect which judgment he will enforce for his satisfaction. Putney v. O'Brien, 53 Iowa, 117, 4 N. W. 891; Cooley on Torts, 138. Following these rules to their final analysis, it is evident that the satisfaction which the law says shall bar further recovery must be such as shall be voluntarily accepted by the plaintiff. Otherwise one joint wrongdoer, or all of them acting in concert through the one, or the clerk, might in fact exercise the election which the law says the plaintiff has the right to make, and thus defeat the very object of the rule giving the plaintiff the right to maintain separate actions, and to prosecute them to final judgments [citing Blann v. Crocheron, 20 Ala. 320, in which the judgment debtor paid the amount of the judgment to the clerk].

"It is well said in the last case cited: 'Were the law otherwise, it would enable joint trespassers who were sued separately to hasten the trial of the one lesser guilty among them, and, by satisfying in the clerk's office the damages against him, to free themselves from all responsibility for their own greater guilt. In fact, it would change the rule which gives the right of election in such actions to the plaintiff, and bestow it upon the defendant. To determine the plaintiff's right to elect, he must act.' * * *

"The satisfaction must be such as is acceptable to the plaintiff as the final determination of his right of action against all of the * * * wrongdoers, and it must of necessity be a satisfaction to which he has agreed, either expressly or impliedly. * * * In other words, he cannot be deprived of his right of election against the wrongdoers, except on account of some act of his own."

And the court held that the payment to the clerk, which was not in fact authorized by the plaintiff, or in fact accepted by the latter, was not such a satisfaction of the judgment as would constitute the accord and satisfaction which is essential to bar proceedings against the other wrongdoer.

See to same effect, where there was payment into court and satisfaction of judgment entered of record by the clerk, Power v. Baker (C. C.) 27 Fed. 396.

The court in McDonald v. Nugen deals with the effect of the payment to the clerk under the purely statutory authority therefor, and in that connection says:

"It is true that the payment * * * to the clerk of the court in which it is rendered is authorized, and that such payment will be a satisfaction thereof, so far as the judgment debtor is concerned; but there is a wide difference between the satisfaction of a judgment of record, which operates to bar further proceedings against the judgment debtor, and the accord and satisfaction which will bar proceedings against his joint wrongdoer. In the first case the defendant has done no more than the law requires him to do, though it may have been done without the solicitation of the plaintiff; nor was such consent on the part of the plaintiff necessary to the protection of the defendant. In the latter case the satisfaction must be such as is acceptable to the plaintiff. * * *

It is urged in argument for the defendant that the payment of the execution by the execution debtors was not voluntary in the case before us, but enforced by the sheriff under the authority conferred upon him by law as incident to the having the execution lawfully in his hands. If that were conceded to be true, still it would be immaterial in so far as the question we have under consideration is concerned. The payment thus enforced could not be considered as enforced at the instance of the plaintiff by any voluntary act of his, but only as the involuntary result of the operation of the general order of the court entered under the statute on the subject of the issue of executions. For the reasons aforesaid, we are of opinion that it was not the intention nor the effect of such statute, in any view of it, to deprive the plaintiff of his right of voluntary election aforesaid in the case of a judgment in tort against one or more, but not all, of the wrongdoers.

The case must therefore be reversed; and we will enter an order remanding the case to the court below, with direction to dismiss the special plea of the defendant filed therein and to proceed with the further trial of the case, in a manner not inconsistent with the views expressed in this opinion.

Reversed and remanded.

SMITH v. STATE HIGHWAY COMMISSION OF VIRGINIA et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Nov. 21, 1921.)

1. Master and servant ⇐364—State Highway Commission is not "employer" within Compensation Act.

The State Highway Commission of Virginia is not the employer of those working under it within Workmen's Compensation Act, §§ 2a, 8, providing that employers shall include the state, any municipal corporation within the state, or any political division thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Employer.]

2. Master and servant ⇐364—State liable for compensation as employer of Highway Commission's employee.

Within Workmen's Compensation Act, § 2a, defining employers, the state is the employer of those working for the State Highway Commission.

3. States ⇐130—Appropriation necessary for payment of workmen's compensation by state.

Since the Legislature, though it has provided by the Workmen's Compensation Act for compensation for injuries to state employees, has made no provision for the payment of claims for such injuries, and Code 1919, § 2582, provides that no judgment or decree, unless otherwise provided, shall be paid without special appropriation, the Industrial Commission cannot direct the payment of compensation for the death of the state employee working under the Highway Commission from any fund, but the payment must be provided for by special appropriation by the Legislature.

Certified from Industrial Commission.

Claim by Grace Lillard Smith before the Industrial Commission against the State Highway Commission of Virginia and the Commonwealth of Virginia to recover compensation for the death of claimant's husband employed by the Highway Commission. On questions of law certified by the Industrial Commission. Claimant held entitled to compensation from the Commonwealth, but not from the State Highway Commission.

PER CURIAM. This case is before us upon the following certificate:

"The Industrial Commission of Virginia, pursuant to the provisions of section 61 of the Workmen's Compensation Act (Acts 1918, p. 637) beg leave to certify to this honorable court for its decision and determination a question of law arising in the above-entitled proceedings, now pending before said Industrial Commission of Virginia.

"The claimant, Grace Lillard Smith, in her own right and in behalf of her infant child, had filed her application for hearing before the Industrial Commission of Virginia, setting up the claim of herself and infant child as dependents of her husband, William Oscar Smith, a quarry foreman in the direct employment of the State Highway Commission of Virginia, who died as result of an injury which arose out of and in the course of his employment with the said State Highway Commission, on the 30th day of June, 1920.

"In said application claimant asks that the compensation be paid as provided by the statute, either by the State Highway Commission of Virginia or the Commonwealth of Virginia, as liability under the statute may be determined.

"The State Highway Commission of Virginia now comes by counsel, and moves the Industrial Commission of Virginia to dismiss the above-entitled proceedings as to the said State Highway Commission and make the commonwealth of Virginia party defendant, stating that if any claim at all can be asserted in the above-entitled proceedings it must be asserted against the commonwealth of Virginia, section 2 (a) Workmen's Compensation Act of Virginia (Acts 1918, p. 637), whereupon the commonwealth of Virginia, by consent of the Attorney General of Virginia, was made a party defendant to the above-entitled proceedings.

"The question of law which is here respectfully certified to this honorable court for its decision and determination is:

"Was the State Highway Commission the employer of William Oscar Smith, at the time of his death, and therefore the proper party defendant, and is it, as such, liable to pay compensation to the claimants in the act provided? or,

"Was the commonwealth of Virginia the employer at said time and, as such, liable to pay said compensation; if so, in what manner and against what funds should the Industrial Commission of Virginia direct an award for the payment of compensation to the claimants in the above-entitled proceedings?"

[1] 1. Taking up the two questions thus submitted to us in their order, we answer that the State Highway Commission was not the employer of William Oscar Smith within the contemplation of the Workmen's Compensation Act, because the commission does not fall within the definition of an employer contained in section 2 thereof. The act provides (section 2a) that—

"'Employers' shall include the state and any municipal corporation within the state or any political division thereof, and any individual, firm, association or corporation, or the receiver or trustee of the same, or the legal representative of a deceased employer, using the service of another for pay."

A counterpart of this provision is found in section 8 of the act as follows:

"Neither the state, nor any municipal corporation within the state, nor any political subdivision thereof, nor any employee of the state or of any such corporation or subdivision shall have the right to reject the provisions of this act relative to payment and acceptance of compensation; and the provisions of sections 5, 6, 16, 17 and 18 shall not apply to them."

It is clear that the State Highway Commission is neither a municipal corporation nor a political division thereof, nor is it an individual, firm, association, or corporation, receiver or trustee of the same, or the legal representative of a deceased employer.

Not falling within the terms of the definition to be found in the act, we have no hesitancy in saying that the State Highway Commission cannot be regarded as the employer of the deceased.

[2] 2. (a) We think it is equally clear, however, that the deceased was an employee of the state, that if there be nothing in the facts of the case concerning the circumstances of the accident which would defeat the right of his estate to compensation for his death, the state is liable for the compensation allowed.

The definition above quoted brings the state within the operation of the act, and the act, and the organization and duties of the State Highway Commission make those employed by it employees of the state. It is manifest, for example, that if an employee of the State Corporation Commission, or of the Industrial Commission of Virginia, should be injured by accidental means, he would be entitled to the benefit of the provisions of the act, but the proceeding could not be against either commission, and would have to be brought against the state.

[3] (b) As to the manner in which and the funds from which the compensation awarded by the Industrial Commission in such a case should be paid, no order can be made directing the payment, but the same must be provided for by special appropriation to be made by the Legislature.

While it is true that the Compensation Act contemplates employees of the state, and expressly provides that they shall have the benefit of the same, no provision has yet been made for the payment of claims against the state, and section 2582 of the Code provides that no judgment or decree, unless otherwise provided, shall be paid without a special appropriation by law. Neither the court nor the Industrial Commission can require the Legislature to make an appropriation for cases of this character, but it is not to be doubted for a moment that such appropriation will be made in every case in which an order against it is made by the commission. The state will not provide that its employees shall have the right to claim compensation under the Workmen's Act, and then decline to give them any means whereby they may collect the compensation allowed them thereunder.

We have been referred to the case of Woodcock v. Board of Education, decided by the Supreme Court of Utah January 13, 1920, and reported in 55 Utah, 458, 187 Pac. 181, 10 A. L. R. 181. In that case a school-teacher had presented her claim for injuries sustained in her usual duties, and the Industrial Commission made an award in her favor against the board of education of Salt Lake City. The board resisted the payment of the award on the ground that there were no funds in their hands applicable to such allowances, and the court held that the judgment should be paid from the funds provided for the support and maintenance of schools. The case has no application here, because the Utah statute expressly made each school district an "employer," and as such liable for the compensation.

BEAR'S ADM'X v. BEAR.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Nov. 17, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error \Leftarrow 1170(3)—Permitting at trial inclusion of defense previously asserted held not prejudicial.

Where defendant stated the grounds of his defense under plea of nil debet as infancy, and that the note was without consideration and not intended to be collected, but the latter grounds were apparently overlooked, plaintiff, under Code 1919, § 6104, was not prejudiced by the court's action in permitting defendant at the trial to amend his statement of defense by adding those grounds thereto.

2. Evidence \Leftarrow 437 — Infant can show there was no intention that note was to be paid.

The rule excluding parol evidence to contradict a written instrument does not prevent an infant from testifying that a note given by him, claimed by plaintiff to have been for necessities, was not intended to be paid, since the infant is liable only for the reasonable value of necessities furnished, not on the contract therefor.

3. Pleading \Leftarrow 339—Conduct of judge held not refusal of leave to withdraw plea of infancy.

Where defendant stated on cross-examination that he did not rely on his plea of infancy, it was not error for the trial court, after informing him he could withdraw such plea if he chose, to permit him to leave the stand and confer with his counsel, and, on the counsel's announcement in the defendant's presence that the plea should stand, to refuse to consider it withdrawn.

4. Trial \Leftarrow 194(12)—Instructing that sending infant to academy was not necessary invades province of jury.

In an action on a note given by an infant for money advanced by a brother to send him to a boarding academy, an instruction that sending him to the academy was not a necessary, if public schools which he could attend while at home were available, was an erroneous invasion of the province of the jury.

5. Infants ⇨102 — Whether things of class which might be necessities were such held for the jury.

In an action for money advanced to an infant, claimed to have been for necessities, the court must determine whether the purpose was within the class of things which might be claimed as necessities, and whether there was any evidence to sustain a finding that they were such, but if it determines those questions in the affirmative, whether the things were actually necessary under the circumstances is for the jury.

6. Infants ⇨50 — Advancement as gift by brother for schooling is not a necessary.

Where a mother intended to advance her son money to attend a boarding school, but a brother proposed to make the gift himself, and did so, such advancement was not a necessary.

7. Evidence ⇨276—Admission against interest by decedent is receivable against administratrix.

In an action by the administratrix of a decedent's estate, admissions by plaintiff's intestate against his interest are receivable in evidence for defendant.

8. Infants ⇨98—Evidence that neither parent requested advancement to send infant to academy admissible on issue as to whether it was a necessary.

In an action for money advanced by a brother to an infant, to send him to a boarding academy, evidence that neither of the infant's parents requested such advancement is admissible on the infant's behalf on the issue whether such advancement was a necessary.

Error to Circuit Court, Rockingham County.

Action of debt by J. D. Bear's administratrix against Eugene F. Bear. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

Edward C. Martz, of Harrisonburg, for plaintiff in error.

E. D. Ott, of Harrisonburg, for defendant in error.

BURKS, J. This is an action of debt upon a note for $265, executed by the defendant Eugene F. Bear to the plaintiff's intestate for board and tuition of the defendant one session at Randolph Macon Academy at Front Royal. The defendant pleaded nil debet, and when called upon by the plaintiff to state the grounds of his defense under this plea, he stated infancy, and "that the note was without consideration and was not intended to be collected." There was a trial by jury, and a verdict for the defendant, which the trial court refused to set aside, and the case is here on a writ of error awarded to the plaintiff.

[1] According to the record the above grounds of defense were stated, and the issues made up in September, 1917. Proceedings, however, were stayed because the defendant was in the military service of the United States, and the trial was not had until July, 1920. At the trial the defense that "the note was without consideration and was not intended to be collected" seems to have been overlooked, and the parties went to trial apparently solely on the statement that the defendant was an infant when the note was given. The mother of the defendant and of the plaintiff's intestate was the first witness offered for the defendant, and pending her cross-examination, defendant's counsel asked leave "to amend his statement of defense so as to say the note sued on was without consideration," which motion was granted over the objection of the plaintiff, "and later, during the redirect examination of said witness, the court stated to counsel for defendant that he might add to the ground of defense that the note was without consideration the further words, 'and was not intended to be collected'; the defendant having previously, both before the commencement of the trial and during the trial, offered as a ground of defense the statement that the note was not intended to be collected, and the court * * * having excluded the same as an independent defense," but subsequently permitted it. The ruling of the trial court permitting the amendment was duly excepted to by the plaintiff, but the bill of exception does not show the ground of exception, nor that any motion was made to defer the trial or grant a continuance. The record fails to disclose any error prejudicial to the plaintiff. See Code, § 6104.

[2] The further objection is made that to permit the defendant to show that the note was not to be paid is "in the teeth of the defendant's written promise to pay," and hence forbidden by the parol evidence rule. If this rule applied to the contracts of infants, the defense of infancy would be of little avail to infants dealing with the crafty. Even in contracts for necessities, the infant is not bound on the express contract, but on the implied contract to pay what they are reasonably worth. On this subject the fullest investigation is allowed, and, although it is said that an action may be brought on the contract, evidence is receivable as to the actual value of the goods furnished. 14 R. C. L. 254, § 33; 18 Am. St. Rep. 643. He is not bound by an express contract to pay for necessities for any more than their actual value, nor is he bound by a statement in the contract that the consideration thereof was necessities, when such was not the fact.

The defendant was 18 years of age when the note was executed and 26 at the trial. He was examined as a witness in his own behalf, and on cross-examination he stated that he was not relying on the defense of infancy, and knew nothing about the plea being filed. He was then asked the following questions: (1) "You personally would not have filed any such plea?" and (2) "Do you want to withdraw the plea of infancy in this case?" Answers to these questions were excluded on motion of his counsel, and the plaintiff excepted. The bills of exception show that the answer to question 1 was "that he would not have filed such plea," and to question 2 was "that he wanted to withdraw the plea of infancy." The trial judge seems to have been satisfied that the witness did not understand the meaning and effect of withdrawing the defense of infancy; that he meant to insist that the amount advanced was a gift and not a loan, and that payment was never to be enforced, but did not understand that the withdrawal of the defense of infancy would cut him off from making this defense. Hence the following colloquy between the court and the witness:

"The Court: Your counsel has put in this case a plea that this transaction is not binding and should not be enforced because you were under age when it was given. Do you want to put that plea out of the case and abandon it?"
 "Witness: I do not thoroughly understand this.

"The Court: Do you stand by the action of your counsel as to your case here and to manage it for you?"

"A. Yes, sir.

"The Court: He is authorized to act for you and put in any defense that he thinks proper?"

"Witness: Yes, sir."

The trial court was of opinion that the defendant had the right to withdraw his defense of infancy, if he so desired, but that this right should be exercised understandingly and in the regular way, and not by cross-examination, when the witness could not consult his counsel and have the subject fully explained to him, and hence determined to give him this opportunity. This phase of the case is presented in the record as follows:

"The Court: The jury may disregard that statement of the witness, that he did not rely on the plea of infancy. As a matter of fact that plea has been filed here, but if he wants to withdraw it and instructs the court to withdraw it from the case, the court will allow it to be stricken out. Until he does that the court will not.

"X. Do you want to withdraw the plea of infancy in this case?"

"The Court (to the defendant): You may retire with your counsel and see whether you want to continue your case or to abandon it, after you have conferred with him.

"Memo.: The defendant leaves the witness stand, and, in company with his counsel, mother, and brother, Warfield, retired to the judge's room, and in a few minutes returned into court.

"The Court: Is the plea to go out or to stay in, Mr. Ott?"

"Mr. Ott: The plea stays in.

"The Court: Yes, sir."

(Mr. Ott was counsel for the plaintiff.)

The witness was then told to stand aside. The foregoing action of the trial court is excepted to on the ground that the plea of infancy is personal to the defendant, and that the court had refused to permit the defendant to withdraw his defense of infancy, although he desired to do so.

[3] The court fully recognized the right of the defendant to withdraw the defense of infancy, and to control the action of his counsel in this respect, but simply gave him the opportunity to confer with his counsel on the subject so as to act advisedly, and after such conference his counsel, in open court and in his presence, announced that the "plea stays in," and the trial proceeded on this issue.

There was no error in this action of the trial court.

One of the pivotal points in the case was whether the board and tuition which the plaintiff's intestate had furnished the defendant were necessities, and whether the defendant was already sufficiently supplied. Much evidence on this subject was introduced by the defendant, and there was ample room for different conclusions to be drawn therefrom by reasonable men. Under these circumstances the court gave to the jury, on the motion of the defendant, and over the objection of the plaintiff, the following instruction:

"The court instructs the jury that, generally speaking, a minor is not liable on his contracts. This rule is subject to the exception that he is personally liable for a debt created for necessities, but that while the expense of a common school education would be recognized in most cases as a necessary expense, yet the sending of a boy to a distant academy, or boarding school, when there was a good public school and high school convenient to his home, could not be so regarded under the evidence in this case; and, therefore, if the jury believe from the evidence that the note in suit was given for money laid out or expended by John D. Bear in sending the defendant to the Randolph Macon Academy, a boarding school * * * at Front Royal, the Elkton graded and high school being convenient to his home, they cannot consider such expenditure by John D. Bear as one made for necessities, and they must find for the defendant."

[4, 5] This instruction is plainly wrong. It expresses the opinion of the court on the weight of the evidence, and took away from the jury the consideration and determination of an important question of fact upon which different conclusions might have been reached by reasonable men upon the evidence introduced. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Poole, 100 Va. 148, 40 S. E. 627; Burk's Pl. & Pr. (2d Ed.) §§ 256, 264, and cases cited. We have italicized the objectionable part of the instruction. The law on this subject is well expressed in a note in 18 Am. St. Rep. at page 652 as follows:

"The province of the court and of the jury in solving the question of necessities involves a proposition of considerable nicety, and one which is not always as clearly and definitely stated as it might be. The rule, having regard particularly to the latest cases, seems to be this: It is for the court to determine, as a matter of law, in the first place, whether the things supplied may fall within the general classes of necessities, and, if so, whether there is sufficient evidence to warrant the jury in finding that they were necessary. If either of these preliminary inquiries be decided in the negative, it is the duty of the court to nonsuit the plaintiff who seeks to recover from the infant. If they be decided in the affirmative, it is then for the jury to determine whether, under all the circumstances, the things furnished were actually necessary to the position and condition of the infant, as well as their reasonable value, and whether the infant was already sufficiently supplied."

The statement of the note is abundantly supported by authority, both English and American, and also commends itself to our judgment as a correct statement of the law. Under the instruction given, the jury was left no discretion in the matter, but were obliged to find a verdict for the defendant.

[6, 7] The trial court committed no error in refusing the instructions tendered by the plaintiff. It would not be of future value to quote them in full, but they will be referred to by number for guidance of counsel and the court upon another trial, if one should be had. Instruction No. 1 is broader than is warranted by the statute (Code, § 6209). Instruction No. 2 leaves out of consideration the question of "necessaries," which was an essential element of the defendant's liability on the note. Instruction No. 3 is not a correct statement of the law. If the payment by the plaintiff's intestate was to be a gift by him to the defendant, then it was not necessary for his mother to make the gift. If she was able and willing to make the gift, and simply yielded to the proposal of the plaintiff's intestate to make the gift, then the advancement by him was not a necessary. Instruction No. 4 is not a correct statement of the law. If the jury believed the statements attributed to the plaintiff's intestate, they were admissions against his pecuniary interest and receivable as such.

[8] There was no error in permitting the defendant to show that neither his father nor mother requested the plaintiff's intestate to send the defendant to Randolph Macon Academy.

For the error in defendant's instruction hereinbefore discussed, the judgment of the trial court will be reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial, not in conflict with the views hereinbefore expressed.

Reversed.

STANDARD OIL CO. v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Nov. 17, 1921.)

1. Highways \Leftarrow 158—Municipalities may maintain necessary actions to abate obstructions and other nuisances.

The general rule is that municipalities have power to maintain such actions at law or in equity as may be appropriate to prevent and abate nuisances obstructing highways or rendering them useless.

2. Criminal law \Leftarrow 13—Statute defining offense sufficient if it supplies standard of guilt when fairly construed with reference to common law.

A penal statute, to be valid, must by its language, fairly construed and with reference to common-law definitions, if the act denounced as a crime was punishable at common law, supply the standard by which the guilt of the accused person is to be determined, and if it does not thus supply such standard, it is invalid for vagueness and uncertainty, but if it does it is valid.

3. Highways \Leftarrow 153—Obstructions or encroachments are public nuisances.

Obstructions or encroachments on a highway or anything which interferes unreasonably or unnecessarily with the use of the highway by the public, or which makes the highway more dangerous for travelers thereon, constitute a public nuisance per se, even when they do not actually operate as an obstruction to travel.

4. Highways \Leftarrow 153—Statute authorizing legislation by boards of supervisors regarding use of roads and bridges held valid.

Code 1919, § 2013, authorizing boards of supervisors to enact special legislation to protect roads and bridges from encroachment or obstruction or from any improper or exceptionally injurious use, is valid under Const. 1902, § 65.

5. Highways \Leftarrow 166—Statute and resolution of board of supervisors as to injurious use held to supply sufficient standards to establish violation.

Code 1919, § 2013, authorizing boards of supervisors to enact legislation to protect highways from any improper or exceptionally injurious use, and a resolution thereunder prohibiting the operation on the highways of any engine, threshing machine, logging or lumber wagons, heavy machinery, wagons, or tanks, automobile trucks, and all heavily laden wagons or trucks, at any time when the roads are so wet as to be materially damaged by such hauling or use, affords sufficiently definite standards by which the guilt or innocence of the person charged with a violation may be determined.

6. Highways \Leftarrow 186—Resolution of board of supervisors as to use of vehicles materially damaging roads when wet construed.

A resolution of a board of supervisors under Code 1919, § 2013, forbidding the operation on the highways of certain heavy vehicles and all heavily laden wagons or trucks when the roads are so wet as to be "materially damaged" thereby, only prohibits an improper and exceptionally injurious use of the highway under the circumstances indicated.

7. Criminal law — 829(18)—Refusal of instruction as to elements of offense held properly denied in view of other instructions.

In a prosecution for operating a heavily loaded truck so as to materially damage the highway in violation of a resolution of the board of supervisors, the refusal of instructions that the mere use of the roads while they were wet or muddy was not sufficient to convict, but that the jury must believe beyond a reasonable doubt that they were in such condition that they would be materially damaged, and that, if other reasonable persons used the road at the same time with similar wagons or trucks, defendant had a right to assume that its use was proper, was harmless, where other instructions fully protected every right of defendant to be acquitted if there was any reasonable doubt of its guilt.

8. Highways — 186—Guilty of using heavy vehicles so as to materially damage highway not dependent on whether other persons were using highway.

Under a resolution of the board of supervisors prohibiting the operation on the highways of heavy vehicles and heavily laden wagons or trucks when the roads were wet so as to be materially damaged thereby, the guilt or innocence of one charged with a violation did not depend upon whether reasonable persons were using the roads with similar wagons or trucks, and he was bound at his peril to determine for himself whether he would use the road.

Error to Circuit Court, Rockbridge County.

The Standard Oil Company was convicted of an offense, and it brings error. Affirmed.

Hugh A. White, of Lexington, and Eppa Hunton, Jr., of Richmond, for plaintiff in error.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., and Leon M. Bazile, Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

PRENTIS, J. By an act approved March 13, 1912 (Acts 1912, p. 503), Code 1919, § 2013, it is provided that—"The boards of supervisors of the several counties of the commonwealth shall have power to enact such special and local legislation in their respective counties, not in conflict with the Constitution and the general laws of the commonwealth, as they may deem expedient to protect the public roads, ways and bridges of the such county from encroachment or obstruction, or from any improper or exceptionally injurious use thereof."

By authority of that statute the board of supervisors of Rockbridge county adopted a resolution declaring that—

"It shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to operate or cause to be operated over the highways of Rockbridge county any engine, threshing machine, logging or lumber wagons, heavy machinery, wagons or tanks, automobile trucks and all heavily laden wagons or trucks, at any time at which the said roads are wet to a sufficient extent to be materially damaged by such hauling or use: Provided, however, that this enactment shall not be construed to prevent the hauling of farm produce."

The Standard Oil Company was charged with a violation of this resolution, in that it operated a heavily loaded truck over a certain road while it was so wet as to cause the highway to be materially damaged by such hauling or use. After a conviction before a justice of the peace, an appeal was taken to the circuit court of Rockbridge county, and upon a jury trial the accused was again convicted, and subjected to a fine of $50, of which it is here complaining.

The point chiefly relied on was in the trial court first raised upon the demurrer of the defendant and its motion to dismiss the warrant, upon the ground that the resolution of the board of supervisors upon which the prosecution was based was unconstitutional and void for uncertainty in its description and definition of the alleged crime. This contention is based upon the general rule that an ordinance of a regulatory nature must be clear, certain, and definite, so that the average man may, with due care, after reading the same, understand whether he will incur a penalty for his action or not, and, if not of this character, it is void for uncertainty.

Many cases may be cited to support this rule, and we do not question its validity where it is properly applicable. It may be also conceded that there are instances in which it has been applied by the courts to statutes bearing some resemblance to that here involved. It is, however, also easy to cite cases in which other courts have refused to apply it to statutes equally indefinite as that here criticized.

It has long been held that to obstruct or unlawfully injure a public highway is a nuisance—a serious encroachment upon the public right.

In 3 Salk. 183, we find this precedent in Egerly's Case:

"Information against a common carrier, setting forth that no waggon ought to carry more than 2,000 weight, and that the defendant used a waggon with four wheels, and cum inusitato numero equorum, in which he carried 3,000 or 4,000 weight at one time, by which he spoiled the highway leading from Oxford to London (viz.) at Lobb lane, in the parish of Hosely. This was adjudged good, though it was laid generally at Lobb lane, without shewing how many perches in length, because the nuisance was alleged, for all the way leading from Oxford to London, and Lobb lane was mentioned only for the venue; and though there was no particular measure expressed how much of the way was spoiled, it shall be intended all Lobb lane was spoiled. Likewise, though it said that he went inusitato numero equorum without setting forth what number, yet the information is good, because it was the excessive weight which he carried that made the nuisance."

In Congreve v. Smith, 18 N. Y. 79, it is said, incidentally, that the general doctrine is that the public are entitled to the use of a highway in the condition in which they placed it, and whoever without sufficient authority materially obstructs it is guilty of a nuisance.

[1] The general rule is that municipalities have the power to maintain such actions at law or in equity as may be appropriate to prevent and abate nuisances obstructive of highways, or rendering them useless. Stearns County v. St. Cloud, M. & A. R. Co., 38 Minn. 425, 32 N. W. 91; Hooksett v. Amoskeag Mfg. Co., 44 N. H. 105; Troy v. Cheshire R. Co., 23 N. H. 83, 55 Am. Dec. 177; Springfield v. Connecticut River R. Co., 4 Cush. (Mass.) 63; Easton & A. R. Co. v. Greenwich Tp., 25 N. J. Eq. 565; Rio Grande R. Co. v. Brownsville, 45 Tex. 88; Philadelphia v. Thirteenth & Fifteenth Sts. Pass. R. Co., 8 Phila. (Pa.) 648; 39 L. R. A. 650, note.

These cases, relating to statutes which were attacked upon the ground that they were vague and indefinite, are pertinent:

In State v. Ayers, 49 Ore. 61, 88 Pac. 653, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 992, 124 Am. St. Rep. 1036, it is held that naming the offense is not necessary to warrant its punishment, where it is described by statute sufficiently to justify a resort to the common law for its definition, although no common-law offenses are recognized in that particular state. There, under a statute which provided for the punishment of any act which grossly disturbs the public peace or health, or which openly outrages the public decency and is injurious to the public morals, it is held that the court was competent to determine what acts come within the description. The particular offense charged in that case was the habitual sale of pools on horse races, at a track where many persons were assembled to witness the races, and this was construed to be an act which grossly disturbed the public peace and openly outraged public decency, within the meaning of the statute referred to, and the accused was convicted.

Katzman v. Commonwealth, 140 Ky. 124, 130 S. W. 990, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 519, 140 Am. St. Rep. 359, holds that a statute forbidding druggists to sell poisons at retail, except under certain conditions, one of which is that they shall satisfy themselves that they are to be used for legitimate purposes, is not invalid for not defining the meaning of the words "retail" and "legitimate purposes." Whether or not a druggist, in selling opium without a prescription, used reasonable care to satisfy himself that it was obtained for a legitimate purpose, as required by statute, was held to be a question for the jury. In that case, in reply to the same argument which is made here, we find this:

"In the argument in support of the objection mentioned, it is said that the Legislature should have defined the meaning of the words 'retail' and 'legitimate purposes,' so that a druggist might know what quantity would constitute a sale by retail, and what would or would not be considered a sale for legitimate purposes; and so, that there could not be two opinions as to what these words mean when different courts or juries came to pass upon questions involving a violation of the statute. It may be admitted that although the meaning of the words 'retail' and 'legitimate purposes,' as used in the statute, are reasonably well understood, it is nevertheless possible that there might be difference of opinion as to whether in a given state of case the sale of a drug was by retail or for a legitimate purpose, and it is possible that in administering this statute it may occasionally happen that a druggist will be accused who claims not to know what constitutes a sale by retail or what is a legitimate use of opium; and it is also possible that different trial courts and juries may not always be harmonious in the conclusions reached upon this point. But the fact that there may be occasional doubt or want of agreement on this question cannot be allowed to invalidate the statute. If this rule obtained, many penal statutes that have stood unquestioned for years and have been often enforced would be held invalid. There are numerous statutes in existence, creating and describing offenses the enforcement of which often brings into prominent notice a question concerning the meaning of words in the law about which different persons might reach a different conclusion. In the trial of many criminal cases there are of necessity submitted to the jury issues involving the meaning of certain words upon which depends the guilt or innocence of the accused; and with the court or jury as the case may be, is left the decision whether or not the law under which the prosecution is pending has been violated. It would, of course, be extremely desirable if every penal statute could be made so plain as not to leave any doubt as to its meaning, and so intelligible as that every person could by reading it at once decide what he might with safety do under it. But this ideal condition is not attainable. It would not be at all practicable to define in every statute the meaning of controlling words in it, that there may be difference of opinion concerning, when it is attempted to apply them to a given state of facts. To do this would extend to unreasonable length almost every statute that creates and describes an offense, and would also complicate and confuse the administration of the criminal law, as the definitions would often be as uncertain as the thing defined. Every penal statute should be given a reasonable construction, one that will effectuate the legislative intent in its enactment; and if it describes the offense in language that can be understood by persons of ordinary intelligence, it will not be declared invalid on the ground of uncertainty. * * *

A little common sense, as well as legal learning, must be used in the practical administration of the law; and it is not essential that a statute shall be so elaborate in its details as to attempt to meet every possible state of fact that may arise under it."

In Stewart v. State, 4 Okl. Cr. 564, 109 Pac. 243, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 505, it is held that a statute, which provided that "every person who wilfully and wrongfully commits any act * * * which grossly disturbs the public peace or health, * * * although no punishment is expressly prescribed therefor by this Code, is guilty of a misdemeanor," is not void for uncertainty; and that whooping and yelling and uttering loud and vociferous language are acts prohibited thereby, if they grossly disturb the public peace; and it is said that the Legislature, in creating an offense, may define it by a particular description of the act or acts constituting it, or it may define it as any act which produces, or is reasonably calculated to produce, a certain defined or described result. There being no common-law crimes in Oklahoma, it is held that where the Legislature creates without defining an offense which was a crime under the common law, the common-law definition of the crime will be adopted.

Several recent cases in the Supreme Court of the United States illustrate and follow the same liberal rule of construction.

In Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Texas, 212 U. S. 108, 29 Sup. Ct. 226, 53 L. Ed. 429, this is said with reference to the Texas statute relating to monopolies and combinations in restraint of trade:

"It is further insisted that the acts in question are so vague, indefinite and uncertain as to deprive them of their constitutionality, in that they punish by forfeiture of the right to do business, and the imposition of penalties, under provisions of an act which do not advise a citizen or corporation, prosecuted under them, of the nature and character of the acts constituting a violation of the law. These objections are found in the words of the act of 1899, denouncing contracts and arrangements 'reasonably calculated' to fix and regulate the price of commodities, etc. And in the act of 1903 acts are prohibited which 'tend' to accomplish the prohibited results. It is insisted that these laws are so indefinite that no one can tell what acts are embraced within their provisions. In support of this contention it is argued that laws of this nature ought to be so explicit that all persons subject to their penalties may know what they can do, and what it is their duty to avoid. And reference is made to decisions which have held that criminal statutes should be so definite as to enable those included in its terms to know in advance whether the act is criminal or not. [Citing cases.] * * * But the Texas statutes in question do not give the broad power to a court or jury to determine the criminal character of the act in accordance with their belief as to whether it is reasonable or unreasonable, as do the statutes condemned in the cases cited."

The statutes are held to be valid as sufficiently definite and certain in their definition of the crime denounced.

Nash v. United States, 229 U. S. 373, 33 Sup. Ct. 780, 57 L. Ed. 1232, was a prosecution for a criminal violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, and it was held that there is no such vagueness in the Anti-Trust act of July 2, 1890 (26 Stat. at L. 209, c. 647, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3200 [U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8820-8823, 8827-8830]), as to render it inoperative on its criminal side, because only such contracts and combinations are within the act as, by reason of intent, or of the inherent nature of the contemplated acts, prejudice the public interests by unduly restricting competition, or unduly obstructing the course of trade.

In Fox v. Washington, 236 U. S. 273, 35 Sup. Ct. 383, 59 L. Ed. 574, it is held that a statute of the state of Washington (Code, § 2564) which makes criminal the editing of printed matter tending to encourage and advocate disrespect for law, does not violate the United States Constitution, Fourteenth Amendment, as being an unjustifiable restriction of liberty, and too indefinite for a criminal statute, where the highest state court, by implication at least, reads the statute as confined to encouraging an actual breach of the law, and in the case at bar has merely construed it as embracing an article encouraging and inciting a persistence in what would be a breach of the state laws against indecent exposure.

In Miller v. Strahl, 239 U. S. 426, 36 Sup. Ct. 147, 60 L. Ed. 364, it is held that there is no uncertainty in the requirement of the Nebraska law (Rev. Stat. 1913, § 3104) that innkeepers, in case of fire, shall give notice of the same to all guests and inmates at once, and shall do all in their power to save such guests and inmates, as to render the statute invalid under the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution as wanting in due process of law, and this is said:

"The argument is that the requirement 'to do all in one's power' fails to inform a man of ordinary intelligence what he must or must not do under given circumstances.

"Rules of conduct must necessarily be expressed in general terms and depend for their application upon circumstances, and circumstances vary. It may be true, as counsel says, that 'men are differently constituted,' some being 'abject cowards, and few only are real heroes'; that the brains of some people work 'rapidly and normally in the face of danger while other people lose all control over their actions.' It is manifest that rules could not be prescribed to meet these varying qualities. Yet all must be brought to judgment. And what better test could be devised than the doing of 'all in one's power' as determined by the circumstances."

And it is said that the case falls within the rule stated in Nash v. United States, supra.

In Omaechevarria v. Idaho, 246 U. S. 346, 38 Sup. Ct. 323, 62 L. Ed. 763, under a statute making criminal the grazing of sheep on the federal public domain upon ranges previously occupied by cattle, or usually occupied by cattle raisers, it was held that the provisions are not so indefinite as to render the statute repugnant to the constitutional guaranty of due process of law, although it fails to provide for the ascertainment of the boundaries of a range, or for determining what length of time is necessary to constitute a prior occupation, a usual one within the meaning of the statute, especially since it is provided by section 6314 that in any crime or public offense there must exist a union or joint operation of act and intent, or criminal negligence.

The recent case of United States v. Cohen Grocery Co., 255 U. S. 81, 41 Sup. Ct. 300, 65 L. Ed. —, is relied upon by the plaintiff in error here as sustaining a contrary view; but the opinion in that case expressly refers to the previous cases just cited herein, and their authority is conceded. The Cohen Case held Lever Act of August 10, 1917, § 4 (U. S. Comp. St. 1918, U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, § 3115½ff), as re-enacted by the act of October 22, 1919, § 2 (41 Stat. 298), which undertook to punish criminally any person who willfully makes "any unjust or unreasonable rate or charge in handling or dealing in or with any necessities," violative of the Fifth and Sixth Amendments of the United States Constitution, which require an ascertainable standard of guilt fixed by Congress rather than by courts and juries, and secure to accused persons the right to be informed of the nature and cause of accusations against them. A careful reading of the opinion demonstrates that the court had no intention of impairing the weight of its previous decisions upon this subject.

[2] The true test, as we understand it, may be thus expressed: The statute, to be valid, must by its language, fairly construed and with reference to common-law definitions (if the act denounced as a crime was punishable at common law), supply the standard by which the guilt of the accused person is to be determined. If the statute does not thus supply such standard, it is invalid for vagueness and uncertainty, but if it does, it is valid. Mr. Chief Justice White said, with reference to the section of the Lever Act considered in the case of United States v. Cohen, supra:

"The sole remaining inquiry, therefore, is the certainty or uncertainty of the text in question, that is, whether the words, 'That it is hereby made unlawful for any person willfully * * * to make any unjust or unreasonable rate or charge in handling or dealing in or with any necessities,' constituted a fixing by Congress of an ascertainable standard of guilt, and are adequate to inform persons accused of violation thereof of the nature and cause of the accusation against them. That they are not, we are of opinion so clearly results from their mere statement as to render elaboration on the subject wholly unnecessary. Observe that the section forbids no specific or definite act. It confines the subject-matter of the investigation which it authorizes to no element essentially inhering in the transaction as to which it provides. It leaves open, therefore, the widest conceivable inquiry, the scope of which no one can foresee and the result of which no one can foreshadow or adequately guard against. In fact, we see no reason to doubt the soundness of the observation of the court below in its opinion to the effect that, to attempt to enforce the section would be the exact equivalent of an effort to carry out a statute which in terms merely penalized and punished all acts detrimental to the public interest when unjust and unreasonable in the estimation of the court and jury. And that this is not a mere abstraction finds abundant demonstration in the cases now before us, since in the briefs in these cases the conflicting results which have arisen from the painstaking attempts of enlightened judges in seeking to carry out the statute in cases brought before them are vividly portrayed."

[3] Applying this test to the statute and resolution here involved, we are of opinion that they are valid. That obstructions or encroachments upon a highway per se constitute a public nuisance, even when they do not actually operate as an obstruction to travel, is well settled, and it follows that the same is true of anything which interferes unreasonably or unnecessarily with its use by the public, or which makes the highway more dangerous for travelers thereon. 13 R. C. L. 186; Commonwealth v. Stodder, 2 Cush. (Mass.) 562, 48 Am. Dec. 679.

[4] That the act here involved, authorizing boards of supervisors to enact special legislation deemed expedient to protect the highways from encroachment or obstruction, or from any improper or exceptionally injurious use thereof, is valid, cannot be doubted. It is authorized by the Constitution, section 65, and the statute based thereon was reviewed by this court in Polglaise's Case, 114 Va. 850, 76 S. E. 897. In the course of the opinion in that case it is said:

"Upon reason and authority, the matter of regulating the amount of loads to be hauled over the public highways is generally recognized as properly within the discretion of the authorities charged by law with the care and maintenance of the public highways; and it is likewise settled that when any such regulation, within the scope of the authority of the lawmaking power, has been passed, the prima facie presumption is that the regulation is reasonable and proper, and in order to warrant the court in coming to a different conclusion there must be evidence introduced showing that in the particular case the discretion granted to the legislative body has been abused, and the rights of individuals taken from them."

Other recent and instructive cases from other jurisdictions relating to the general power of public authorities to restrict the use of highways and to exclude certain classes of vehicles therefrom are: State v. Mayo, 106 Me. 62, 75 Atl. 295, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 502, 20 Ann. Cas. 512; Fifth Ave. Coach Co. v. New York, 194 N. Y. 19, 86 N. E. 824, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 744, 16 Ann. Cas. 695; Commonwealth v. Kingsbury, 199 Mass. 542, 85 N. E. 848, L. R. A. 1915E, 264, 127 Am. St. Rep. 513; Commonwealth v. Nolan, 169 Ky. 34, 224 S. W. 506, 11 A. L. R. 203.

[5] We must look to the statute and the resolution based thereon then to ascertain whether they afford the standard by which the guilt or the innocence of the person charged with the offense is to be determined. We find therefrom that certain specified heavy vehicles, and all heavily laden wagons or trucks, are forbidden the use of the roads under certain conditions. There is certainly nothing indefinite about the resolution in so far as it designated the prohibited vehicles. The question presented to the court or jury in a given case is whether or not the accused person has operated such a vehicle. This is a question of fact to be determined from the evidence like any other fact, not resting in the varying discretion or opinion of the jury, but depending upon the evidence. In order to convict, the vehicle must be of the character described and prohibited.

[6] Then, the time and circumstance under which such use is prohibited is clearly indicated; that is, to justify conviction, it must be shown that the road was wet to a sufficient extent to make such use at that time exceptionally injurious to the highway, and hence improper. Thus the statute and resolution clearly point out the other essential fact which must be established by evidence before there can be a conviction thereunder. The words "materially damaged," used in the resolution of the board, are in instruction 5 construed properly by the court to be equivalent to the words used in the statute, so that in order to convict it must be shown by the evidence that there was an improper and exceptionally injurious use of the highway under the circumstances indicated.

So that we have in the statute itself and in the resolution the standards by which the guilt or the innocence of accused persons is to be determined. Thus construed, they are not as indefinite as are those ordinances which provide penalties for disorderly conduct. While it is said that disorderly conduct has a common-law meaning, this meaning is so indefinite as to require the submission of the evidence to the jury in order to determine the facts. So in homicide the question is not whether the accused person thought he knew whether he was committing the crime of involuntary manslaughter or of murder in the first or second degree. If he commits a homicide, he must take his chances with the jury. The jury determines the degree of his guilt, although he may feel very sure that they are mistaken. So here, the accused person who uses the prohibited vehicle upon a clay road which is wet must determine at his peril whether it is so wet as to make his use of it then exceptionally injurious to the highway, and thereafter he must accept the judgment of the jury as to whether he is innocent or guilty of the offense charged. There is nothing unusual in all this, and the language of the resolution, thus construed, sufficiently fixes the standard. The jury are not left free to exercise their own untrammelled judgment, but must determine the issue presented to them from the evidence. Like any other case, if the evidence fails, the accused is acquitted. The criminality of the act here denounced does not depend upon whether a jury may think it reasonable or unreasonable. The statute describes the misdemeanor with reasonable definiteness and certainty, though in a given case it may be difficult to show the guilt of the accused beyond a reasonable doubt, because from the evidence there may be fair differences as to whether the essential facts necessary to constitute the crime have been proved. There is no fair doubt, however, as to the misdemeanor which is prohibited.

It follows from what we have said that we think the judgment of the trial court overruling the demurrer and motion to dismiss is without error.

[7] The defendant in error complains of the failure of the court to give instructions 2 and 4.

Instruction 2 reads thus:

"The jury is further instructed that the mere use of the roads while they are wet or muddy is not sufficient, but you must further believe that the roads were in such condition that beyond a reasonable doubt they would be materially damaged as mentioned in instruction No. 1."

It is sufficient to say as to this that the three instructions given by the court fully protected every right of the defendant to be acquitted if there was any reasonable doubt of its guilt, and it was unnecessary to repeat that doctrine in the instruction which was refused. The error, if any, was harmless.

[8] Instruction 4 was to the effect that if the jury believed from the evidence that other reasonable persons subject to the law involved used the roads at the time the defendant was charged with using them, and with wagons or trucks of similar kind and weight as used by the defendant, then the defendant had the right to assume that its use was proper and would not be guilty. This instruction was properly refused, because the jury had been sufficiently instructed ed already in the other three instructions which were given, and for the additional reason that it is not true that under such circumstances the defendant's guilt or innocence depends upon what other reasonable persons do. He must at his peril determine for himself whether or not he will use the road when it is wet with his heavy or heavily loaded vehicle, and the jury must in each case determine whether or not such use was improper and exceptionally injurious in violation of the resolution; and the fact that other reasonable persons may have also violated the law at the same time does not entitle the accused to an acquittal.

The evidence introduced by the commonwealth is sufficient to support the verdict, and the trial court committed no error in refusing to set it aside.

Affirmed.

GLASSCOCK et al. v. SOUTH MORGANTOWN TRACTION CO. et al. (No. 4312.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Oct. 25, 1921.)

1. Receivers ¶162—Railway company's creditor whose claim was secured along with others held not entitled to preference for furnishing labor and materials.

The claim of a creditor of a railway company, secured along with its other general debts, by a deed assigning all of its property to trustees to secure ratable payment of all of its debts, and not otherwise expressly secured, is not entitled to priority or preference over such other debts in the distribution of a fund arising from sale of such property, even though such claim may have arisen out of the furnishing of labor and materials for necessary use in the operation of the company's railway, in the absence of establishment of a diversion and payment of net earnings of the company to such other creditors or the holder of some other lien on such property.

2. Receivers ¶154(1)—Railway company's prior operation debt is not part of receivership expenses.

A debt so incurred by a railway company, before the appointment of a receiver in a suit brought to wind up its business, is not a part of the expenses of the receivership.

3. Appeal and error ¶266(1)—Chancery commissioner's findings not excepted to below cannot be assailed on appeal.

A finding of a commissioner in chancery, set forth in his report and not excepted to in the court below, cannot be assailed in the appellate court by an assignment of error, unless the report is erroneous on its face as to it.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Monongalia County.

Suit by William E. Glasscock and others, trustees, against the South Morgantown

Traction Company and others, for ascertainment of liens, administration of trust, and appointment of receiver for the defendant. Exceptions to the commissioner's report sustained, and a decree of preference awarded in favor of the city of Morgantown, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed in part, and affirmed as modified.

Cox & Baker, of Morgantown, for appellants.

T. D. Stewart and C. B. Dille, both of Morgantown, for appellee.

POFFENBARGER, J. This appeal involves only a question of priority of liens, the appellants denying the right of preference accorded the city of Morgantown by the decree complained of. They contend that the city must take its place among the general creditors of the South Morgantown Traction Company, whose debts are all secured on a pro rata basis and without preference, by a deed of general assignment for their benefit. Before the assignment, there was but one admitted lien on any of the company's property, and that was a vendor's lien for $1,000 on a certain piece of real estate. The entire indebtedness amounted to $176,848.57. By the decree complained of, the debt of $2,495.43 due the city of Morgantown, and secured by the assignment, was given priority over the other creditors secured by it, on the theory of right in those furnishing labor and materials to a railroad company, to a preference over secured creditors, in the distribution of a fund arising from the sale of the corpus of its property, not from its net earnings.

The assignment was made March 29, 1919. This suit for ascertainment of liens, administration of the trust, and appointment of a receiver was commenced in October, 1919.

Incurrence of the preferred debt antedates both transactions, but it was not secured by an express lien of any kind. It arose under a contract between the city and the traction company, dated September 24, 1918, and substantially performed in December, 1918. Under it, the city did certain street grading and paving the traction company was obligated to do by a provision of its franchise, in consideration of the agreement of the latter to pay the cost thereof, immediately upon the completion of the work.

In his report, the commissioner to whom the cause was referred denied the preference claimed by the city, but the court sustaining an exception to the report, based upon disallowance thereof, awarded it by the decree, as has been stated. By the decree entered July 19, 1920, modifying the report and confirming it as modified, sale of the traction company's property by the trustees was ordered, and it was subsequently sold for $40,100.

[1] From November 3, 1919, until sold, the property was managed and operated by a receiver who, under authority duly conferred, borrowed $2,500 on a receiver's certificate, for operating expenses. Under his administration, the income was insufficient to pay the taxes, necessary current expenses, and the receiver's certificate. Conceding nonexistence of any net earnings, either in hand or diverted, upon which the debt due the city could be a lien, its counsel insist, nevertheless, that it is entitled to preference over the other general creditors secured by the deed of assignment, in the distribution of the fund created by sale of the property of the company.

The authorities invoked for this right of preference do not sustain it. There is no pretension that either Fosdick v. Schall, 99 U. S. 235, 25 L. Ed. 339, or Hale v. Frost, 99 U. S. 389, 25 L. Ed. 419, in which the doctrine of preference in respect of net earnings was originally asserted, goes beyond such earnings; and, manifestly, neither of them does. It is insisted, however, that the decision in Southern Railway Co. v. Carnegie Steel Co., 176 U. S. 257, 20 Sup. Ct. 347, 44 L. Ed. 458, extends the principle to the corpus of the property of the corporation as against mortgage creditors; but this position is wholly inconsistent with the conclusion announced in the case. The trial court had ascertained that net earnings of the railway, upon which the steel company was entitled to a preferential lien, had been diverted and paid to the mortgage creditors, and its decree had, in effect, required restoration of the amount so diverted and paid, to satisfy the claim of the steel company. This decree was affirmed by the appellate court. Not a word found in the opinion purports to extend the preferential right of a laborer or materialman beyond the net earnings; nor has any other decision purporting to do so been cited or found. Most assuredly Virginia & Alabama Coal Co. v. Central R. & B. Co., 170 U. S. 355, 18 Sup. Ct. 657, 42 L. Ed. 1068, does not, for the terms of the opinion very carefully and explicitly limit it. Moreover, the discretionary power of a court of equity to allow such a preference is uniformly held to be limited, and it is not allowed except in clear cases. Kneeland v. American Loan Co., 136 U. S. 89, 10 Sup. Ct. 950, 34 L. Ed. 379; Union Trust Co. v. Ill. Mid. R. Co., 117 U. S. 434, 6 Sup. Ct. 809, 29 L. Ed. 963; Addison v. Lewis, 75 Va. 701; Huldekoper v. Locomotive Works, 99 U. S. 258, 25 L. Ed. 344; Burnham v. Bowen, 111 U. S. 776, 4 Sup. Ct. 675, 28 L. Ed. 596; Wood v. Guarantee Trust Co., 128 U. S. 416, 9 Sup. Ct. 131, 32 L. Ed. 472.

Though there is no specific objection to award of the balance in the hands of the receiver, $1,390.25, to the holder of an unpaid receiver's certificate for $2,500, it is proper to observe that no valid objection could be urged against it, if issuance of the certificate was duly authorized, as presumptively it was, no complaint of the appointment of the receiver, or the order authorizing him to borrow money, having been made. Union Trust Co. v. Ill. Mid. Ry. Co., 117 U. S. 434, 6 Sup. Ct. 809, 29 L. Ed. 963.

[2] The city's debt does not represent an expense of operation under the receivership, because it accrued long before the receiver was appointed. Its representation of an expense necessarily incurred by the debtor itself does not legally nor equitably differentiate it from other debts which, presumptively, were necessarily incurred. Nor is it material that immediate payment for the work was to be made on completion thereof. Time of payment does not affect the question of priority.

[3] Allowance of a mechanic's lien in favor of Joseph H. Stevens, for $186.75 was not excepted to in the court below, and, as no error in the allowance thereof appears on the face of the report, no complaint of it can be originally interposed here. Bank of Union v. Nickell, 57 W. Va. 57, 49 S. E. 1003; Long v. Willis, 50 W. Va. 341, 40 S. E. 340.

In so far as the decrees complained of sustain the exception of the city of Morgantown to the report of the commissioner, accord preference and priority of the debt due said city, over the claims of other creditors secured by the deed of assignment, exclusively accord to said city the fourth place in the distribution of the assets of the traction company, and postpone to its claim those of such other creditors, they will be reversed, and then so modified as to make the debt of said city and such other creditors stand fourth in such distribution and share therein pro rata, and, as so modified, they will be affirmed, with an award of costs in this court to the appellants.

BRYAN v. FAIRFAX FOREST MIN. & MFG. CO. et al. (No. 4233.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Oct. 25, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Equity ⇐24—May extend time of performing contract, where other party delays performance.

It is within the power of a court of equity to extend the time for the performance of a contract, where either party unduly obstructs or delays the other in its performance.

2. Equity ⇐24—Party seeking extension for other party's obstruction or delay must show diligence and sufficient cause.

To authorize such extension, the party so obstructed or delayed must have been diligent in performing the contract within the time stipulated therein for its performance, and must also show sufficient cause for the extension sought by him.

3. Equity ¶24—Party seeking extension has burden of showing cause therefor.

Upon him who asserts the right to such an extension rests the burden of showing cause therefor.

4. Equity ¶24—Where there were two agreed extensions, party seeking further extension for other party's obstruction or delay should show ample and satisfactory proof.

Where the contract whose extension is sought was to be performed within five years from its date, but, not being so performed within that time, the party not at fault voluntarily granted two years additional time for its performance, and subsequently by a written agreement granted another like period upon a cash consideration, or a total time limit of nine years, the proof should be ample and satisfactory, in order to warrant still further indulgence.

5. Equity ¶24—Idle rumors of delayed party's financial inability, in absence of proof thereof, held insufficient in suit for extension of time.

Mere idle rumors of the financial inability of the party delayed to pay, and his tardiness in payment of wages earned by his employees, are not substantial cause for such extension, in the absence of proof of his dereliction in that respect.

6. Equity ¶24—Circulation of rumors by party's agent as to other party's inability to pay employees held insufficient to warrant extension of time for performing contract.

The circulation of such rumors by an agent of a corporation, when not engaged in the course of his employment as custodian of its property, and without its authorization, knowledge, or consent, and which, when informed of such circulation, directs him to desist therefrom, and he does desist, is not sufficient to warrant the extension.

7. Corporations ¶182—Acts of agent in charge of corporation's property do not affect right of owners of its stock.

The acts and conduct of a corporation's agent, a custodian of its property, whose duty it is to protect the property from trespassers and to collect rents from its tenants, do not affect the right of the owners of the corporation's capital stock, as its agent is not their agent, and his acts are not theirs, unless they authorized or ratified such acts and conduct on his part.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Grant County.

Bill by Jonathan Bryan against the Fairfax Forest Mining & Manufacturing Company and others, for enforcement of liens created by decrees in a former suit. From a decree for plaintiff, defendant William C. Bond appeals. Decree affirmed, and cause remanded.

Q. O. Strieby, of Elkins, for appellant.

L. J. Forman, of Petersburg, and Charles McH. Howard and John B. Deming, both of Baltimore, Md., for appellees.

LYNCH, J. The bill and amended bill, though called petitions, had for their object enforcement of liens created by decrees in a former suit in favor of plaintiff's intestate and some of the defendants against the real estate of Fairfax Forest Mining & Manufacturing Company, a corporation, consisting of 2,309 acres. The decree entered in this cause after the report of the commissioner, to whom it was referred, was filed and confirmed, established and co-ordinated the former decrees as such liens, adjudicated the rights claimed by Davis Coal & Coke Company under coal-mining leases covering parts of the land, and the claim of Theodore G. Lurman for commissions for services rendered by him in procuring the leasehold contracts, and directed a sale of the land to satisfy the liens thus ascertained and determined, but denied William C. Bond, the purchaser of the timber on the land, a further extension of the right to remove it beyond the five-year period provided in the original contract, dated April 17, 1911, and two extensions of the time limit, one oral, the other written, the last postponing the date to April 17, 1920. The written extension agreement bears date, November 27, 1917. The whole contract period, therefore, was nine years, or from April 17, 1911, to April 17, 1920.

[4] The timber contract was a cash transaction and Bond entered upon the tract, installed all the equipment by him deemed necessary or sufficient to manufacture the timber into lumber and market the product, and to exercise the rights and privileges accorded to him by the contract, but did not succeed in the accomplishment of the purpose of the grant within the original five-year period, or the period covered by the oral and written extension agreements, the latter expiring ten days before the institution of this suit, April 27, 1920. In his answer, also called a petition, to the bill, Bond claims the right to a further enlargement of the time to complete the timber removal and lumber operations on the land and assigns as reasons for this enlarged opportunity the interference by J. E. Grimes, agent of defendant, Fairfax Forest Mining & Manufacturing Company, alleging that, but for such interference, he would have succeeded in completing the contract within the time so prescribed.

The so-called interference consisted in the use by Grimes on various occasions in the presence of Bond's employees of language reflecting upon the financial ability and integrity of Bond, and his disposition to delay payment of his contract obligations, until such payment was compelled by legal proceedings, the ultimate effect of which derogatory remarks and aspersions was to create, and he contends did create, doubt in the minds of the employees as to the receipt of their wages when due; also by way of other alleged acts and conduct of Grimes creative of dissatisfaction among the employees relative to the collection of rents from such of them as occupied some of the houses on the land. These rents, however, Grimes apparently had authority to collect and did collect, pursuant to such authority, before the date of the last extension agreement, as other agreements are silent as to the right of Bond to the use of the houses, the contract of November 27, 1917, having for the first time conferred upon him the right to use the houses rent free, except the one occupied by Grimes; and although he continued to exact and collect rents thereafter due and payable, he did so without knowledge of the contract terms, and when advised by Howard of the terms he ceased to require and collect rents from the occupants. He may have been, and perhaps was, indiscreet in dealing with the occupants, as he seems to have been somewhat irascible and petulant, and apparently there was enmity or lack of cordiality between him and Bond.

[5, 6] Because of such remarks and the creation of such doubt, and the acts and conduct relative to rents, Bond's contention is that he lost the services of men employed by him, and for that reason was unable to cut and manufacture the timber into lumber when and as so required, but could do so within three or four months, if the time was extended that long, and Grimes compelled to cease interference with his working force.

Grimes defines his relation to the Fairfax Forest Mining & Manufacturing Company as "custodian of the property, with authority to rent and collect rents and to protect the property." He did negotiate the sale of the timber to Bond, subject, however, to the company's approval, and received, but did not collect, Bond's check, delivered to him as payment for the lumber contract. He took it to the bank on which it was drawn, requested the cashier to certify it, and, when certified, transmitted it to William Bowly Wilson, a resident of Baltimore, and then president and owner of a large part of the capital stock of Fairfax Forest Mining & Manufacturing Company, but now deceased; Charles McH. Howard having succeeded him in that capacity since his death.

There was doubt whether, because of his delay in the timber operation on the land, whatever the cause may have been, Bond would be able to secure the extension of the time of performance, finally granted, and

Grimes so informed Pace and "a gentleman" with him, who contemplated an agreement to cut the timber and stock the mill, but did not secure the agreement, perhaps, but not certainly, because of such doubt, Grimes at that time believed the extension improbable, although without his knowledge, negotiations therefor were then pending, perhaps consummated.

Grimes does not deny, but admits making the remarks, proved by other witnesses, and as charged in Bond's answer, but what he said, he contends, was a matter of common knowledge in the community; and as to the generality of the rumor several of Bond's employees corroborated him, and they heard it mentioned and discussed, when assembled at the railroad station and elsewhere, when Grimes may or may not have been present, or, if he was, they were not aware of his presence, as they were not acquainted with him at that time.

[2, 3] But conceding, as we must concede, as the proof sufficiently shows that Grimes, both before and since the last extension, did discuss Bond's dereliction in the payment of wages earned by his men, and that a few of them did cease to labor for him on account of the impression thus created, still no proof shows failure on the part of any of them to receive wages earned by them, when due and payable, though some did quit the employment, in part because of the derogatory remarks heard by them, and for other reasons.

An active business man, as Bond has shown himself to be, is to be judged by his acts, rather than by idle reports of his want of financial integrity, and it is hardly conceivable that his lumber operations were delayed because of such reports. Other reasons must have been responsible for the delay. He had nine years to manufacture the timber, and he had cause to suspect that he could not obtain further indulgence in that behalf, and even if now, as noted, he deems three or four months ample time to complete the contract, the lower court evidently concluded that he was not entitled to that relief.

[7] But Grimes was not the agent of the lien creditors. Whatever authority he had, he did not derive it from them, and although the company of which they were stockholders may have been cognizant of the unfavorable comments, there is no proof that it authorized, ratified, or condoned them. On the contrary, whenever informed of their utterance, and of the attempted molestation of the right of the occupants of the dwellings to occupy and use them rent free, or of the wrongful creation of dissatisfaction among the employees, the officers of the company, notably Howard, admonished him to desist, and he did desist, at least in so far as the quiet use and enjoyment of the houses were concerned. But the evidence does not trace such knowledge home to the lien creditors. That they, or some of them, were and yet are owners of the company's capital stock, does not necessarily imply notice to them. But if they had such knowledge, yet if Grimes' acts and conversation were not authorized by them or by the company, and if such obnoxious treatment was not within the scope of the agency, neither was responsible for what Grimes said or did, except as to the right to collect rent for the houses, and his acts and conduct would not affect the stockholders, who did not directly or impliedly authorize or ratify them. His agency was not general, but limited, that of a custodian whose principal duty was to protect the property in his care against unauthorized invasion. It did not confer the right to slander, and the company's officers sought to suppress that, when informed of it. Replying, April 2, 1918, to a letter of Mr. Strieby, Bond's counsel, dated March 30, referring to annoyance by Grimes, as reported to him by Bond, Mr. Howard told Grimes not to obstruct in any way Mr. Bond's use of the property, and for the first time notified him of the extension of the contract to April 17, 1920; he having theretofore inadvertently omitted to impart to him that information. Instead of authorizing such conduct, or treating it as within the actual or implied scope of the agency, the principal repudiated it.

The act of a servant may, it is true, be within the scope of the employment, if the act done is necessary to accomplish the purpose of the employment, and the servant so intends, even if in doing the act he exceeds the power conferred upon him by the master. The master or principal may also be civilly liable for the slander or libel published or circulated by his servant or employee, provided he is at the time acting within the scope of the employment. The purpose contemplated by the act done or the slander circulated, rather than the method of doing it, is the test whether it is within the scope of the employment. 26 Cyc. 1533, 1534; 2 C. J. 848, 849; 25 Cyc. 427; 2 Mech. Agency, §§ 1926, 1957, 1981. There is in the evidence nothing even tending to show that, while Grimes was uttering the terms of reproach or slanderous words, he was engaged in the active service of his principal, Fairfax Forest Mining & Manufacturing Company, although it was during the agency. Generally, if not exclusively, the conversations, in which the words were used, occurred at the railway station, where the laborers were awaiting the arrival of trains to carry them home, or on their way to resume work upon the property. At no time does it appear that Grimes was doing anything for the company at the time, or was advancing the interests of his employer in any way, or for any purpose connected with the duties assigned to him, or that what he did or said was beneficial to the company or in the furtherance of its corporate affairs. His conversation with Pace and his companion was as to the improbability of an extension of the lumber contract. That was at his house during the noon hour, probably during the noon meal, in which the three participated.

[1] Courts of equity can and will, when the facts and circumstances of a case warrant it, grant relief by an extension of a contract. But there are present in this case no facts and no circumstances justifying such an extension. Such relief has been granted in oil and gas litigation, where the lessor by his conduct and acceptance of benefits induces "the lessee [or operator] to believe that he will not insist upon the production of oil in paying quantities" within the time specified in the lease. Ohio Fuel Oil Co. v. Greenleaf, 84 W. Va. 67, 90 S. E. 274, and cases cited.

Our conclusion therefore, is to affirm the decree and remand the cause.

STATE v. STAFFORD. (No. 4265.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Oct. 25, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Grand Jury \S 7—Indictment not quashed where grand jurors were selected as statute required at levy term.

Prior to the Legislature of 1919, the county court was required to prepare annually a list of grand jurors and deliver same to the clerk of the circuit court at its levy term, which begins on the second Tuesday in August and by operation of law is adjourned until the fourth Tuesday in that month, at which the levy must be laid as provided in section 2, c. 28A, Barnes' Code, 1918 (Code 1913, sec. 875); and an indictment found and returned by grand jurors properly selected from such list so prepared, either at the session begun on the second Tuesday in August or at the adjourned session begun on the fourth Tuesday of that month, should not be quashed for the alleged reason that such list was not prepared and delivered at the levy term.

2. Homicide \S 305—In prosecution for attempt to murder, instruction as to guilt of party watching to prevent surprise of those doing the shooting held sufficient.

An instruction, given in a trial on an indictment for felonious attempt to kill, instructing the jury, in effect, that if they believe from the evidence that the defendant, and others jointly indicted with him, all or any of them being armed with guns, went within shooting distance of a mine tippie and cage then used for bringing men out of the mine, and did, on a day named, lie in wait until certain persons named in the indictment came out of the mine in such cage, and that such other persons jointly indicted with defendant, or any of them, did then and there shoot with such guns at the persons coming out of the mine in such cage, with felonious intent then and there to kill them, or any of them, and that defendant was then and there present or within about 300 yards of such persons jointly indicted, and watching to prevent surprise while such other persons were committing the offense, or with intention of giving assistance, should occasion arise, to such other persons and was near enough to do so, then the defendant would be guilty of an attempt to commit murder in the first degree, sufficiently states a concerted design between defendant and those actually doing the shooting, and sufficiently states that defendant, by "watching to prevent surprise," was participating in the murderous intent.

3. Criminal law §813, 1172(6)—Abstract instruction improper, but will not require reversal unless it has misled jury.

An instruction which propounds an abstract proposition of law should not be given, but, if given, and there be evidence to which it is applicable, the appellate court will not reverse for that cause, unless it is clear that the jury has been misled.

4. Criminal law §761(2)—Instruction correctly defining statutory offense is not reversible on theory of assuming facts not proven.

The giving of an instruction which correctly states a definition of a statutory offense for the violation of which defendant is indicted and being tried is not reversible error on the theory that it assumes facts not proven, and thereby invades the province of the jury.

5. Homicide §307(3)—Instruction that verdict must be guilty of attempt to murder or not guilty, proper, where lesser offenses barred by limitation.

An instruction, given in the trial of an indictment charging defendant with a felonious attempt to kill, "that under the law and the evidence in this case that they [the jury] can return only one of two verdicts, guilty of an attempt to commit murder in the first degree, or not guilty," is properly given, where the evidence is conclusive and uncontradicted that the offense, if any, was committed on the 18th day of November, 1917, and the indictment was not found and returned until the March, 1919, term of the court; as all offenses lesser than attempt to commit murder in the first degree have been barred by limitation before the finding of the indictment.

6. Criminal law §840—Court may permit attorneys employed to assist prosecutor to continue trial in absence of prosecutor.

Under section 7, c. 120, Code 1918 (Code Supp. 1918, sec. 4719), competent attorneys may be employed by any person to assist the prosecuting attorney in the prosecution of any person charged with crime; and if in the progress of a trial the prosecuting attorney is compelled by sickness or other valid cause to be absent from the trial, it is not error for the court, without objection on the part of defendant, to permit the attorneys so employed to proceed with the trial and prosecute the same to conclusion, unless it clearly appears that defendant was prejudiced thereby.

7. Jury §97(4)—Juror held competent, although stating that he did not think much of labor unions, where defendant belonged to one.

A juror who on his voir dire says that he has no bias or prejudice against defendant because such defendant is an Italian, or is and was a member and officer of a labor organization at the time of the alleged offense, and that he could render a fair and impartial verdict from the evidence, regardless of the nationality of defendant or of the fact that he did or did not belong to a labor union, is a competent juror, although he also says that he "didn't think much of labor unions," and did not believe that labor unions were very conducive to law and order.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

8. Homicide §256—Evidence held to sustain conviction of attempted murder.

In a prosecution for attempt to murder, where the whole defense rested upon alibi, evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction.

Error to Circuit Court, Raleigh County.

Tony Stafford was convicted of attempting to kill by shooting, and he brings error. Affirmed.

C. M. Ward, of Beckley, and John M. McGrath, of Princeton, for plaintiff in error.

E. T. England, Atty. Gen., R. Dennis Steed, Asst. Atty. Gen., and S. B. Avis, of Charleston, for the State.

LIVELY, J. Defendant prosecutes this writ of error from a judgment of the criminal court entered on the 6th day of April, 1920, sentencing him to confinement in the penitentiary for five years.

At the March term in 1919, defendant, George Lucas, Tom McGinnis, Dorr Snuffer, Tom Murphy, Ed Hornick, Will Owens, Tom Lethco, Tony Sorazzo, and Carl Crim were jointly indicted for a felony, the indictment charging them with unlawfully and feloniously attempting to maliciously, deliberately, and unlawfully kill John Ranson and others by shooting at them with guns on the 16th day of November, 1917. Some of the defendants demanded separate trials, and the state elected to try Tony Stafford.

In October, 1917, the E. E. White Coal Company had a controversy with some of its employees, at the Glen White mines, who were members of the United Mine Workers of America, and a strike resulted, the company's employees who were not members of the union remaining at work. The dispute was decided against the strikers by the United States mediators, and thereafter occurred the shooting for which defendant and the persons named above were indicted. The state's evidence was to the effect that Tony Stafford, who was an organizer of the United Mine Workers, suggested to Tom McGinnis, the secretary of the miners' local at Glen White, after the decision of the mediators had been rendered, that some radical means would have to be employed to win the strike; that Stafford later proposed that he furnish the guns and McGinnis the men to shoot at the nonunion miners when the cage, in which they were carried up the mine shaft at the close of the day's work, appeared at the surface; that in pursuance of this arrangement Stafford did furnish a number of high-powered guns and ammunition; and that on the afternoon of November 18, 1917, defendant Stafford, together with Tom McGinnis, George Lucas, Dorr Snuffer, Carl Crim, Tom Murphy, Will Owens, and others, assembled on the mountain side, where the guns and ammunition had previously been hid, and lay in wait within shooting distance until the men at work came up in a cage; that from 50 to 300 shots from high-powered rifles were fired at a cage containing, among others, John Ranson, John Spears, and H. E. Nuckolls; the bullets striking all around the men, but hitting no one. Witnesses testified that Tony Stafford, defendant, was armed with a shotgun, and stationed about 300 yards behind the other men for the purpose of watching to prevent surprise and to give assistance if needed. There was no direct proof that he fired any shots, but witnesses stated that he was the only one armed with a shotgun and that buckshot had been fired, also that paper shells were found on the mountain side the day after the shooting. Tom McGinnis, Dorr Snuffer, George Lucas, and Carl Crim, as witnesses for the state, confessed their participation in the shooting, admitted that they shot at the men in the cage to kill them, and stated that such was the advice given to them by defendant, Stafford. They also testified as to Stafford's connection with the plans which resulted in the shooting. Stafford denied that he had anything to do with the arrangements leading up to the shooting, and testified that he was in the town of Beckley, about seven miles distant, when it occurred. Several witnesses for defendant testified that Stafford was seen by them in Beckley at different hours during the day of the shooting, and others stated that they did not see him at the meeting hall of the Glen White local union on that day.

Many assignments of error are made, but six only are urged, and to these we will confine our consideration.

[1] On October 6, 1919, defendant filed two pleas in abatement to the indictment, averring that the grand jury which had found and returned the indictment had not been selected from a list of grand jurors prepared by the county court in the manner prescribed by law. The court, without objection or exception, proceeded to try the issue joined on these two pleas, and found in favor of the state. Error is assigned because the court so decided. The state objected to the filing of these pleas on the ground that they were tendered by defendant alone, and were not sworn to by him, but by one Lawrence Dwyer, citing Rader v. Adamson, 37 W. Va. 582, 16 S. E. 808. It is not necessary to decide this contention, in view of the disposition we make of this assignment of error. Section 2, c. 157, Code 1918 (Code 1913, sec. 5538), directs that the county court shall at its levy term annually prepare a list of not less than 100 nor more than 150 freeholders, qualified to serve as grand jurors, and deliver the list so prepared to the clerk of the circuit court, from which grand jurors shall be drawn at the time and in the manner therein set out. Defendant alleged and sought to prove that the grand jury which found and returned the indictment was not selected from the list so prepared; that the county court did not prepare such list at its levy term; that, on the contrary, it prepared such list and delivered the same to the circuit clerk on September 4, 1918, at a special term of the county court. When is the levy term of the county court? This is the controlling question raised by these pleas. Section 1 of chapter 28A, Code 1918 (the chapter on tax levies [Code 1913, sec. 874]), requires the county court to hold a session on the second Tuesday in August in each year, then make up its budget and ascertain the total amount necessary to be raised by the levy for the current year, the assessed value of the property subject to taxation, and the rate of levy proposed on the property as a whole, and publish the statement in two newspapers. The session shall then stand adjourned until the 4th Tuesday in August, at which time it shall convene, hear objections to the estimate and proposed levy, if any, and lay the levy. It appears that the court did meet, as required, on the 2d Tuesday in August, 1918; that it was in special session on August 21, when it called a special session to meet on the 27th day of August, 1918, for the purpose of transacting certain items of business named in the call, and, in pursuance thereof, did meet on the 27th and continued in session from day to day until the 4th of September, and during which time it laid the county levies, and on which last-named day it prepared a list of grand jurors, and delivered the same to the circuit clerk in strict accordance with section 2, c. 157, Code 1918. It is clear that the session directed to be held on the second Tuesday in August, with adjournment over until the fourth Tuesday in the same month, constitutes the levy term, within the meaning of the requirement that the list of grand jurors shall be prepared at the "levy term." The beginning of the levy term is on the second Tuesday in August, and by operation of law continues (with the adjournment) until such time after the fourth Tuesday as the business shall have been finished and the session closed. A list of jurors prepared and delivered on any day of this session so beginning and ending would be "at the levy term." It does not make any difference that a special term was called for "Monday, the 27th day of August" ("the 27th" is apparently an inadvertence); the court was in session on the day following, the fourth Tuesday, as required by statute, and considered and laid the county and district levies. Nor is it of importance that the purposes for which the special session was called to meet on Monday did not include the item of preparation of the grand jury list, nor that the call was improperly or properly posted. The court could not make the regularly adjourned session held on the fourth Tuesday (the 27th) a special session by naming it such; nor prevent it from being the levy session by giving it any other name. The statute governs in that.

[2] Defendant's second assignment of error relates to the giving of the state's instruction No. 5, which is as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that on the 16th day of November, 1917, Tony Stafford, Carl Crim, Dorr Snuffer, Tom McGinnis, Tom Murphy, Tony Sorazzo, George Lucas, Will Owens, Ed Hornick, Tom Lethco, or either, or all, or any, of them armed with rifles, guns, and pistols loaded with powder and leaden and steel balls and bullets, did go within range and shooting distance of the tippie of the Glen White mines, in which was the cage that is used for bringing men up out of said mine, and the said Carl Crim, Dorr Snuffer, Tom Murphy, Tony Sorazzo, George Lucas, Will Owens, Ed Hornick, and Tom Lethco did then and there lie in wait until John Ranson and the other persons mentioned in the indictment in this case came up on said cage, and did then and there shoot at the said John Ranson and said other persons mentioned in the indictment, or either, or any, or all of them, with said rifles, guns, and pistols, loaded as aforesaid, with intent then and there to kill them, or either, or any, or all, of them; and if the jury believes from the evidence that the said Tony Stafford was then and there present or within about 300 yards of the said Carl Crim, Dorr Snuffer, Tom Murphy, Tony Sorazzo, George Lucas, Will Owens, Ed Hornick, and Tom Lethco, and watching to prevent surprise whilst said Carl Crim, Dorr Snuffer, Tom Murphy, Tony Sorazzo, George Lucas, Will Owens, Ed Hornick, and Tom Lethco were on the hillside committing said offense or with the intention of giving assistance, should occasion arise, to the said Carl Crim, Dorr Snuffer, Tom Murphy, Tony Sorazzo, George Lucas, Will Owens, Ed Hornick, and Tom Lethco and was near enough to afford it should the occasion arise, then the court instructs the jury that the defendant, Tony Stafford, would be guilty of an attempt to commit murder of the first degree."

It is claimed that this instruction makes the defendant guilty if he was present or near and watching to prevent surprise or with the intention of giving assistance, regardless of whether those who did the shooting knew of his presence or purpose. The mere presence of one at the scene where there is an attempt to kill by another or others is not sufficient to make him a principal in the act; there must be some conduct on his part by which he encourages, incites, or abets the attempt to kill. A mere negative acquiescence in the act, unknown to the principal, is not sufficient. But if there is preconcert and design, then his presence, although not accompanied by any overt act, would make him equally guilty with the person committing the act. His presence with preconcert would incite and encourage the commission of the offense, as the actual perpetrator would likely rely upon active assistance if it should become necessary. But this instruction is based on active participation by defendant in the commission of the crime. If he was "watching to prevent surprise" or with the intention of giving assistance, and was near enough to do so, he was an actual participant. If the others were lying in wait to do the shooting, he was also lying in wait to prevent surprise, and was thus actively aiding, abetting and participating in the crime. Can it be questioned that defendant did not know the intent and design of those who did the shooting? If, under this instruction, the jury believed that defendant was present or within 300 yards of the others, who were firing high-powered guns at men emerging from a mine, with intent of killing them, and was there for the purpose of preventing surprise or giving aid, would it not irresistibly follow that he knew the purpose of the shooting, the intent and design of those participating therein? If he was there for the object set out in this instruction he was a participant in the murderous design. Moreover, the instruction includes defendant as one of the number who, being armed with loaded guns, went within shooting distance of the mine on the 16th of November, 1917, and while it does not in terms state preconcerted action, or knowledge of defendant's presence when the shooting began (if that should be necessary where he actually participated), the inference of common design and action is so apparent that the jury could not have been misled. Where two or more persons, acting with a common intent, jointly engage in a common undertaking and jointly commit an unlawful act, each is guilty of the offense committed to the same extent as if he were the sole offender. Each is responsible for the acts of the others. 16 C. J. p. 128, title, "Criminal Intent and Community of Unlawful Purpose." Where the accused commits any act which facilitates the commission of the offense, it is not necessary that the perpetrator should know that the accused intended to render or had rendered assistance. State v. Tally, 102 Ala. 25, 15 South. 722. In order to show a community of unlawful purpose, it is not necessary to show an express agreement or an understanding between the parties. Gibson v. State, 89 Ala. 121, 8 South. 98, 18 Am. St. Rep. 96; Howard v. Commonwealth, 96 Ky. 19, 27 S. W. 854. A conspiracy or common purpose may be inferred from the circumstances. Preconcert may be shown by circumstances as well as by direct evidence.

[3, 4] The giving of the state's instruction No. 6 is objected to on the ground that it states an abstract proposition of law, and was calculated to lead the jury into the belief that the trial court believed the defendant guilty of an attempt to commit murder in the first degree. It is in the following words:

"The court further instructs the jury that under the law of this state any willful, deliberate and premeditated killing of a human being by another is murder of the first degree, and that any felonious, willful, malicious, deliberate, and unlawful attempt by one human being to take the life of another is an attempt to commit murder in the first degree."

It is well settled that abstract propositions of law should not be given when there is no evidence on which they can be predicated; but where they are given, and there is evidence in the case to which they are applicable, but no particular reference is made to the evidence in such instructions, it will be presumed that the jury made the proper application. State v. Long, 108 S. E. 279; Blashfield's Inst. to Juries, § 432, p. 973. There was sufficient evidence in this case to support the verdict. To support the contention that the instruction would lead the jury into believing that the trial court believed the defendant guilty of an attempt to commit murder in the first degree, an instruction given in State v. Allen, 45 W. Va. 65, 30 S. E. 209, is relied upon, and is as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that previous threats or acts of hostility, however violent they may be, will not justify a person in seeking and slaying his adversary."

This instruction was held bad because it assumed certain things as facts, namely, the seeking and slaying of deceased by defendant, and intimated to the jury what the judge believed the evidence to be touching those facts. A comparison of the two instructions shows that the objectionable elements in the instruction in the Allen Case are not found in the instruction now under consideration. In no portion of the instruction does the court single out any fact peculiar to this case, as was done in the Allen Case, and in People v. Strong, 30 Cal. 151, and Whitely v. State, 38 Ga. 50, cases cited to support the opinion in the Allen Case. The first portion of the instruction gives in substance the statute relating to first degree murder as found in section 1, c. 144, of the Code (Code 1913, sec. 5152), as far as that statute has any application to this case, and the latter part merely defines an attempt to commit murder in the first degree. Taken as a whole, the instruction is proper as one defining the crime of an attempt to commit murder in the first degree. State v. Clark, 64 W. Va. 637, 63 S. E. 402; Longley v. Comm., 99 Va. 807, 37 S. E. 339; 16 C. J. § 2362; State v. Ireland, 72 Kan. 265, 83 Pac. 1036. It cannot be construed as indicative of belief in the guilt of the accused by the trial judge. Shall we say that a correct definition of a crime indicates that the trial judge who gives it in an instruction believes the defendant is guilty, where it assumes no facts as proven?

[6] Assignment of error is based on the giving of instruction No. 8 for the state, which reads:

"The court instructs the jury that under the law and the evidence in this case that they can return only one of two verdicts, guilty of an attempt to commit murder in the first degree, or not guilty."

Ordinarily this instruction would be incorrect and compel reversal. When there is a verdict for murder, the jury must fix the degree thereof. Section 19, c. 159, Code 1918 (Code 1913, sec. 5595); Burton v. Commonwealth, 108 Va. 892, 62 S. E. 376; State v. May, 62 W. Va. 129, 57 S. E. 366. It is argued that if the intention was to kill, then the crime would be an attempt to commit murder in the first degree, no one having been killed; but that if the intention was to cripple, the crime would be attempt at murder in the second degree; and, if simply to scare, then the attempt would be to commit an assault. This is correct, but when we turn to the punishment for attempts we find that if the offense attempted be punishable with death, then the person making such attempt shall be guilty of a felony, and confined in the penitentiary not less than one nor more than five years; but if the offense be punishable with confinement in the penitentiary, then the person attempting shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. Section 9, c. 152, Code (Code 1913, sec. 5466). The evidence is conclusive and uncontradicted that the attempt was committed on November 16, 1917, and the indictment was found and returned at the March term, 1919, more than one year from the time of the commission of the offense; hence the misdemeanors under this indictment had been barred by limitation; and a verdict for less than an attempt to commit murder in the first degree would have been equivalent to a verdict of not guilty. It would have discharged the prisoner. Under this indictment and the law and evidence, it was not error to give this instruction.

[6] Error is assigned because, it is asserted, the prosecution was inspired, managed, and controlled by employed counsel; and that neither the prosecuting attorney nor his assistant were present or participated in the trial. The record does not bear out this assignment. M. L. Painter, the prosecuting attorney, appeared at the preliminary examination of defendant before a justice of the peace, summoned witnesses before the grand jury, and examined them, participated in and controlled the preparation of the indictment, was present and actively engaged in the conduct of the first trial, which resulted in a hung jury; was present at the beginning of this trial, struck from the jury of 20 those jurors required to be struck off by the prosecution, and was present and giving active attention to the trial up to the time when he received a telegram which called him to Richmond, Va., to attend the fatal illness of his wife in a hospital in that city. We think the record shows sufficient participation of the prosecution in the inception, preparation, conduct, and trial of the case to fully overcome this assignment of error; and that the court committed no prejudicial error in permitting the trial to proceed under the management of special counsel after the prosecuting attorney was called away to attend his dying wife. Jackson v. Commonwealth, 96 Va. 107, 30 S. E. 452. We find no objection made to the absence of the state's attorney, or to the participation of employed counsel in the case, until after the verdict, and we cannot see wherein the defendant has been prejudiced. The objection should have been made when the prosecuting attorney was called away.

[7] The remaining assignment of error is predicated on the refusal of the court to sustain a peremptory challenge of defendant to Howard O'Neal, a juror selected on his voir dire on the panel of 20. Upon an extended and thorough examination of this juror, both by the prosecution and defense, it developed that he had no bias or prejudice against defendant, either on account of his nationality or because he was a member of the United Mine Workers, a labor union, and had no bias or prejudice against him for any other cause, and that he could go upon the jury and render a fair and impartial verdict according to the evidence. However, he stated that he "didn't think much of labor unions," and did not think such unions very conducive to law and order. This juror was at that time loading coal at another coal operation at Pemberton, several miles distant from the Glen White mine, at which first-named coal operation a strike had been in progress a year or so before, when he had continued to work, being a nonunion workman and not knowing what the strike was about. The court, upon objection, refused to permit him to answer two questions, both of which asked, in substance, that if it developed upon the trial that there was a strike at the Glen White mines at the time of the offense, and that the union miners, including defendant, who was an officer in the union, were not working, and the nonunion members were working, would these facts influence his mind to some perceptible degree in arriving at the innocence or guilt of the accused? It was evident that these questions, in substance, had been repeatedly answered in the negative by the juror, and the court desired to put an end to repetition. To illustrate, he was asked:

"Would you have any bias or prejudice against this defendant, Tony Stafford, by reason of the fact that he was a member and an officer of the United Mine Workers of America, at Glen White, at the time of this strike, and during the time of the shooting? Answer: Well, I don't know as it would. Question: Mr. O'Neal, if you were selected as a juror in this case, do you feel that you could go into the jury box, and would do so, and render a fair and impartial verdict from the evidence, regardless of the nationality of the person on trial, or whether they belonged to a union or did not belong to a union? Answer: According to the evidence, I believe I could."

The only criticism, if any, which could be made of this juror is that he did not have a high regard for labor unions as conducive to law and order. The judge aptly remarked that it would be difficult to find a man in the county who did not believe or did believe in labor unions, and if that rule was adopted as a basis of selection it would be impossible to obtain a jury. The labor union was not on trial, simply one of its officers and members who had been indicted for the alleged commission of a crime. It would be difficult to obtain a jury to try a person charged with exhibiting and operating a gambling device, if all who did not believe such operations were conducive to law and order were excluded. It is not meant to compare labor unions with the gambling fraternity, but only to illustrate. We pause here to say that labor unions are lawful organizations, and, where properly conducted, have been of great benefit to their members, and have accomplished beneficent designs. Defendant was entitled to a panel of 20 jurors, free from bias and prejudice, with minds free to render an impartial verdict. It does not make any difference that this particular juror was struck off and was not one of the 12 who returned the verdict. Dowdy v. Commonwealth, 9 Gratt. (Va.) 727, 60 Am. Dec. 314. But upon a careful review of the questions propounded to, and answers given by, this juror upon his voir dire, we concur with the trial judge in the conclusion that he was a competent juror.

[8] The general assignment that the court erred in refusing to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial impels us to examine the evidence. It is enough to say that defendant's whole defense rested upon an alibi. Four witnesses, Tom McGinnis, George Lucas, Carl Crim, and Dorr Snuffer, jointly indicted with defendant, and who participated in the shooting, testified that defendant had originated the plan, was present at its execution and directing its progress. There were circumstances and other evidence tending to corroborate them. Eight witnesses, and perhaps more, testified that defendant was at Beckley on the day of the shooting, and could not have participated in the actual execution of the crime. Upon this question of fact the jury has passed judgment, and we will not disturb its finding.

Perceiving no error, we affirm the judgment and sentence of the lower court.

Affirmed.

STATE v. EVANS et al. (No. 4012.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 1, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Witnesses \S 370(1)—Absent proof of arresting officer's other acts, malice will not be inferred from use of reasonable force.

In the absence of proof of other acts of malice or hostility on the part of an arresting officer, such motives are not to be inferred from the employment of reasonable physical force in effecting the apprehension of an offender.

2. Criminal law \S 368(3)—Evidence of physical force to overcome resistance in arresting for unlawful transportation is not ordinarily admissible as a part of the res gestæ.

In a trial under an indictment charging two defendants with the statutory offense of carrying more than one quart of liquor from one point to another within the state within 30 consecutive days, evidence of the use of physical force to overcome resistance in making the arrest ordinarily is not admissible as part of the res gestæ.

3. Criminal law \S 363—"Res gestæ" defined.

The term res gestæ means the acts, declarations, and circumstances which stand in causal connection with, and are illustrative of, the principal transaction undergoing investigation.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Res Gestæ.]

4. Criminal law \S 793, 877—One of two co-defendants may be convicted; instruction held confusing as to finding one or both defendants guilty of unlawful transportation.

In the joint trial of two defendants for carrying more than one quart of liquor from one point to another within the state within 30 consecutive days, an instruction which charges the jury that, although they may believe from the preponderance of the evidence that the liquor belonged to or was in the possession of the defendants, yet "unless it has been shown from the evidence beyond all reasonable doubt as to which one of the defendants the liquor belonged, or was in possession of, if only one of them, then you shall find the defendants not guilty," serves only to confuse the jury, as section 24, c. 159, Code 1913 (sec. 5600) enables them in such cases to find either one or both of the defendants innocent of the offense charged.

5. Criminal law \S 814(3)—Refusal of instruction not warranted by proof is not error.

Where, as in this case, no proof warranted such an instruction, its refusal was not erroneous.

Error to Circuit Court, McDowell County.

Wiley Evans and another were convicted of unlawfully transporting more than one quart of liquor within 30 consecutive days, and they bring error. Affirmed.

Litz & Harman and Joseph M. Crockett, all of Welch, for plaintiffs in error.

El T. England, Atty. Gen., and R. Dennis Steed, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

LYNCH, J. Defendants having been tried, convicted, and sentenced by the criminal court of McDowell county, upon the second count of an indictment charging them with carrying from one point to another within the state more than one quart of liquor within 30 consecutive days, and their application to the circuit court of the same county for a writ of error having been refused, they obtained the writ from this court. The errors now assigned are the refusal to admit certain evidence offered by them, and heard by the criminal court in the jury's absence, and now a part of the record, and to give the only instruction offered by them.

[1] The testimony so rejected consisted of statements by defendants and witness Harliss that Cal Houchins, the deputy sheriff who made the arrest, while effecting defendants' capture, without cause or provocation, assaulted and beat defendant Evans, with the butt of his pistol, knocking him down and inflicting severe bodily injuries upon him. Houchins and the two men who were with him, and who assisted in making the arrest, were witnesses in the case, but the questions directed to them, and their answers, related principally to the condition of the defendants as to intoxication at the time of the arrest, and to their possession of the suit case, containing nearly three gallons of liquor, which under the indictment was the real issue involved. They were asked no questions, and volunteered no information concerning the injuries, if any, inflicted upon Evans.

As to defendants' disclaimer of ownership of the suit case of liquor, which they claim to have just discovered lying upon the railroad tracks, when and where deputy Houchins came upon them, and the equally insistent statements of Houchins and those with him that defendants were walking down the tracks carrying the suit case, and that they admitted the nature of its contents before the arrest. These are all facts and circumstances which are to be, and presumably were, weighed and considered by the jury; and, unless the testimony excluded was material to these issues, or would have been, if admitted, useful in determining the value of other evidence properly admitted, it is difficult to perceive in what way defendants, because of its rejection, suffered such substantial prejudice as the law requires to warrant a reversal. State v. Farley, 78 W. Va. 471, 89 S. E. 733.

Defendants' counsel earnestly insists that Houchins' alleged unwarranted maltreatment of defendants was indicative of malice, hatred, and enmity, which the prosecuting witnesses bore towards his clients, and that as such it was highly relevant, either for the purpose of minimizing the probative value of their testimony, or for establishing proof of an ulterior motive in prosecuting the trial.

Hostility of a witness towards the defendant may, it is true, have some bearing upon the evidentiary quality of his testimony, but it scarcely follows that in the absence of proof of other kindred circumstances, such a motive is to be ascribed to an officer of the law, from the mere employment of physical force in the apprehension of an offender, who resists the arrest. It is the duty of all persons to submit to and not oppose the efforts of a proper prosecuting officer, and when resistance is offered, whether it be an act of aggression or an attempt at escape, it is the officer's duty to employ reasonable force to accomplish his purpose. State v. Weisengoff, 85 W. Va. 271, 284, 101 S. E. 450. It is of further significance that the circumstances surrounding the case do not seem to bear out defendants' view of this issue. Though defendants by a general statement deny any resistance of the arrest, it appears from the testimony of the state's witnesses that the defendants not only violently denied Houchins' authority to take them without a warrant, but that defendant Williams backed away with the suit case and said that no

"s— of a b— could stop him." Such conduct, if it occurred, savors strongly of opposition. Defendants also sought to show some connection between the employment of Houchins and the Baldwin-Felts Detective Agency, but, it does not appear in what manner this association would affect his relations to Evans, a school-teacher.

[2, 3] Influenced, perhaps, by a premonition of a failure of the court to perceive such causal connection between the evidence of the alleged assault and the offense charged against defendants as would render rejection of the evidence ground for reversal, defendants' counsel invokes the doctrine of res gestæ, arguing that the conduct of Houchins was an immediate integral circumstance of the act in question, and therefore relevant and essential. As to this contention, it is only necessary to recall the limitations of that doctrine.

"The res gestæ may be therefore defined as those circumstances which are the undesigned incidents of a particular litigated act, and which are * * * illustrative of such act. * * * Their sole distinguishing feature is that they should be the necessary incidents of the litigated act; necessary in this sense, that they are part of the immediate preparations for or emanations of such act, and are not produced by the calculating policy of the actors. In other words, they must stand in immediate causal relation to the act—a relation not broken by the interposition of voluntary individual wariness seeking to manufacture evidence for itself." State v. Prater, 52 W. Va. 132, 146, 43 S. E. 230, quoting Wharton, Evidence, sec. 259.

See, also, 2 Jones, Commentaries on Evidence, 810; Hermes v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 80 Wis. 590, 50 N. W. 584, 27 Am. St. Rep. 69; Ward v. White, 86 Va. 212, 9 S. E. 1021, 19 Am. St. Rep. 883. As we view it, the conduct of the officer in making the arrest in the present case is not an element of, nor illustrative of, the litigated act—the carrying of the intoxicating liquor from one point to another within the state. In the absence of such correlation, the evidence in question was not admissible on the theory advanced; and without showing other acts of hostility or malice towards defendants, no inference of their existence is deducible from the fact of the unwarranted maltreatment of Evans, if fact it be. The jury could well believe that he or Williams was the aggressor, and that Houchins did only what appeared necessary to subdue the resistance of the arrest.

[4, 5] The instruction offered by defendants and refused would, if given, have told the jury that, although they may believe from the preponderance of the evidence that the suit case belonged to or was in the possession of the defendants, yet, "unless it has been shown from the evidence beyond all reasonable doubt as to which one of the defendants the liquor belonged or was in possession of, if only one of them, then you shall find the defendants not guilty." Counsel contends that without this instruction to guide the jury defendants' rights were not properly safeguarded, but fails to point out in what particular respect they were prejudiced. Section 24, c. 159, Code (sec. 5600) provides that—

"Where two or more persons are charged and tried jointly, the jury may render a verdict as to any of them as to whom they may agree."

This statute was in effect at the time of defendants' conviction, and the jury was free to return a verdict of not guilty as to either one or both of the defendants, in case they deemed the evidence before them insufficient to sustain the allegations of the indictment. The instruction requested would seem to obscure and confuse, rather than clarify, the issue.

For these reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

DILLON v. TURKEY GAP COAL & COKE CO. (No. 4321.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 1, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Principal and agent §171(1)—Principal may ratify agent's originally unauthorized act by accepting benefits and agreeing to performance.

The act of an agent in making a contract, though originally unauthorized, may be subsequently ratified by the principal by his accepting its benefits and agreeing to its performance.

2. Brokers §64(2)—Cannot be denied commission by principal's failure to enforce contract on which compensation was made to depend.

When a broker has fully performed his contract of agency to sell property, he cannot be denied the compensation stipulated for in his contract by the failure of his principal to enforce a valid and binding contract against a solvent purchaser of the property, the subject-matter of the agency, so as to bring about the contingency on which the broker's compensation was made to depend.

Error to Circuit Court, McDowell County.

Action by J. F. Dillon against the Turkey Gap Coal & Coke Company for broker's commissions for selling mining machinery. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Judgment affirmed.

D. J. F. Strother and Anderson, Strother, Hughes & Curd, all of Welch, for plaintiff in error.

Joseph M. Crockett, of Welch, for defendant in error.

MILLER, J. This is an action begun by plaintiff, a broker, for the recovery of commissions alleged to be owing him by defendant, for making sale for it of certain mining machinery, then situate in West Virginia, to Riley Brothers & Company, located in Ohio, and to whom said machinery was consigned by defendant, and delivered to them by the carrier.

The contract, in writing, with plaintiff was negotiated and entered into through McQuail, vice-president and general manager of the defendant company, and one Cockill, superintendent on the ground, the contract being signed on defendant's behalf by Cockill.

The provision of the contract of agency relied on by plaintiff is as follows:

"In consideration of services rendered in said sale, the Turkey Gap Coal & Coke Company agree to pay to the said J. F. Dillon, One Thousand Dollars as soon as the Three Thousand Dollars has been collected from the purchaser of said plant."

The terms of payment by Riley Brothers, as stipulated in defendant's contract with them, signed on its behalf by said Cockill, was the sum of $3,000.00 payable,

"$300.00 cash in hand paid, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, $2,000.00 to be paid through the Citizens National Bank, of Middleport, Ohio, as soon as bill of lading is presented to said Bank. The remaining $500.00 to be paid as soon as plant is put in operation."

That the property so sold had been delivered to Riley Brothers, and that defendant had received the cash payment and turned it over to plaintiff on account of his commissions, are facts not only proven, but conceded by defendant company. The grounds or propositions of defense are two: First, that Cockill had no authority in the first instance to agree with plaintiff that he might sell the property on the terms stipulated, so as to bind defendant to collect from the purchaser the whole consideration of $3,000.00 and pay over to him the amount of his commissions included in the purchase price; that Cockill's authority was to sell or authorize Dillon to sell at $2,000.00 net to it, the agent to have all that he might receive therefor in excess of the $2,000.00. Second, that as the balance of $500.00 had not yet been collected from the purchasers, the condition of the payment thereof by defendant to plaintiff had not been fulfilled, and that the action was premature.

On the trial the jury, after being instructed by a single instruction given by the court on its own motion, to which both parties excepted, returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff for the amount demanded, $500.00, with interest from June 30, 1920; and the court below pronounced the judgment for plaintiff thereon, to which the present writ of error relates.

[1] On the first proposition, want of authority in Cockill to enter into the contracts, we find no merit. The evidence shows that McQuail, the general manager, from the very beginning had knowledge of the terms of both the contract of agency, and those entering into the contract with Riley Brothers. But however this may be, the fact is undisputed that the defendant subsequently ratified the contracts, by collecting the down payment from Riley Brothers and turning it over to plaintiff on his commissions, and subsequently, with knowledge of all the facts, by agreeing with plaintiff that it would proceed to collect the balance of the purchase money and turn it over to him in settlement of his commission account, but afterwards failed, neglected or refused to do so. It is unnecessary to cite authority for the proposition that an act of an agent, though unauthorized, may subsequently be ratified and the principal bound thereby.

[2] On the second proposition, namely, whether the right to demand of defendant the balance of his commissions had at the time of the action accrued to plaintiff, there is presented a more serious question. It is conceded that this balance has not been collected by defendant, and this in violation of its promise to plaintiff that it would proceed to do so. That the plant of Riley Brothers, after the delivery of the machinery sold them by defendant, was put in operation, is fully proven, and that the balance due by the terms of the contract had matured for payment, there is no question. Nor is the fact of their solvency in any way questioned. Moreover, the evidence is that they were entirely solvent, and the money collectible. It is not denied that plaintiff repeatedly demanded of the defendant that it proceed to collect the balance due from Riley Brothers, nor that the latter refused to do so. Having received all the money coming to it, the evidence shows that it proposed at one time, if plaintiff would indemnify it against costs that might be incurred, he might make use of defendant's name to bring an action against Riley Brothers, which proposition was not accepted, it seems; at least plaintiff never undertook to institute and prosecute such action. Certainly the obligation did not rest upon him, but upon the defendant, by the force of its contract.

While it is true, as a general rule, as argued by counsel for defendant, and for which proposition they cite numerous authorities, that a broker can not recover compensation in advance of the contingency on which he has stipulated in his contract such compensation should depend, in this case the payment of the purchase money by the purchasers; yet there is a very important exception to this general rule, and that is when the broker has found a purchaser, and seller and purchaser have entered into a valid and binding contract, and the broker has done all that is required of him by the terms of the contract, and his principal refuses to enforce his contract against the purchaser so as to bring about the contingency relied on, and by such neglect and refusal, or by surrender by the vendor of his rights, the broker can not be thus deprived of his compensation. Hugill v. Weekley, 64 W. Va. 210, 61 S. E. 360, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1262; Bankers' Loan Co. v. Spindle, 108 Va. 426, 62 S. E. 266; Linton v. Johnson, 81 W. Va. 569, 94 S. E. 945. These cases decide generally that when a broker has fully performed his contract, he can not be deprived of his compensation by the failure or refusal of the seller to enforce the valid and binding contract entered into between him and the purchaser. Cases from other states in point on this proposition are: Pinkerton v. Hudson, 87 Ark. 506, 113 S. W. 35; Grosse v. Cooley, 43 Minn. 188, 45 N. W. 15; Wray v. Carpenter, 16 Colo. 271, 27 Pac. 248, 25 Am. St. Rep. 285.

The instruction given the jury, objected to by both parties, did not properly state the law of the case, but as it was more favorable to the defendant than it was entitled to, and it was not prejudiced thereby, we are not disposed to disturb the verdict because of the erroneous instruction.

Our conclusion is to affirm the judgment.

CAMICIA et al. v. IAFOLLO. (No. 4323.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 1, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Adjoining landowners — Owner may not have damages from adjoining owner for misrepresentation as to boundary where not knowingly false.

The owner of a city lot cannot recover from an adjoining owner damages sustained by him by reason of a mistake in locating his building, because of a representation made by such adjoining owner as to the correct location of his lot, where it appears that such representation was not knowingly false, and that such injured party had equal or superior information to the one making the representation.

Error to Circuit Court, McDowell County.

Action by Toney Camicia and others against S. M. Iafollo. Directed verdict and judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

D. J. F. Strother and Strother, Taylor & Taylor, all of Welch, for plaintiffs in error.

G. W. Howard and Litz & Harman, all of Welch, for defendant in error.

RITZ, P. Plaintiffs by this action seek to recover from the defendant damages sustained by them because of an alleged false representation made by the defendant as to the location of plaintiffs' lot situate in the city of Welch. Upon a trial of the case the court below directed a verdict in favor of the defendant, and rendered a judgment of nil capiat thereon, to review which this writ of error is prosecuted.

Plaintiffs were the owners of a lot situate in the city of Welch, in McDowell county, and fronting 30 feet on McDowell street. The defendant owned a lot adjoining that of the plaintiffs, fronting 35 feet on McDowell street, the parties acquiring their lots about the same time from the same party. Adjoining the lot of the defendant, on the side opposite that upon which the plaintiffs' lot lies, was a lot owned by another party, upon which was erected a building. Shortly after the purchase of these lots by the parties the plaintiffs desired to erect a building upon their lot, and employed a contractor for the purpose. The defendant also desired to erect a building on his lot about the same time. For the purpose of fixing the location of their lot the plaintiffs went upon the ground with their contractor, the defendant also being present, and upon inquiry made of the defendant were informed that he owned 35 feet next to the other adjoining owner, and that the building upon the adjoining lot was on the line. The parties thereupon measured 35 feet from this building as the lot belonging to the defendant, and then laid off the next 30 feet as the lot belonging to the plaintiffs. The contractor thereupon proceeded to make the excavation and erect the building upon this 30 feet. About the same time the parties decided that it would be advantageous to have an alleyway between their buildings, and that, inasmuch as the defendant had a 35-foot lot, and the plaintiffs one only 30 feet in width, an alleyway of 5 feet should be taken off of the defendant's lot on the side next to the lot of the plaintiffs. It was agreed that the plaintiffs should pay to the defendant the sum of \$215 for a strip $2\frac{1}{2}$ feet wide off of his lot. They did pay this sum to the defendant, and the parties executed a deed by which the defendant conveyed to the plaintiffs $2\frac{1}{2}$ feet off of his lot upon the side next to the lot of the plaintiffs, and further dedicated another $2\frac{1}{2}$ feet for use as an alley, and for light and air, and the plaintiffs in the same deed dedicated the $2\frac{1}{2}$ feet thus conveyed to them to the same purposes. Each of the parties proceeded to erect buildings 30 feet wide and four stories high upon the lots as located as aforesaid, leaving a 5-foot alleyway between the two houses.

Some time after the buildings were completed the city of Welch, the owner of the lot adjoining the lot of the plaintiffs on the side opposite that upon which plaintiffs' lot adjoined the lot of the defendant, desired to erect a building upon its lot. It entered into an arrangement with the plaintiffs by which it purchased a half interest in the plaintiffs' brick wall, with right to use the same as one of the walls of its building. This was done upon the assumption that this wall was upon the lot of the plaintiffs, and abutted upon the property line between them and the said city. Preparatory to beginning the erection of a building the city sent its engineer upon the ground to locate its lot. This engineer ascertained that, instead of the wall of the plaintiffs' building being upon their land, it was upon the land belonging to the city, and that the said city was the owner of $23\frac{3}{4}$ inches of the land occupied by the plaintiffs' building. Upon making this discovery the city notified the plaintiffs, who thereupon employed an engineer to definitely locate their lot. This engineer went upon the ground and determined that the result of the survey made by the city's engineer was correct. The plaintiffs and the said city thereupon entered into negotiations for an adjustment of this difficulty, which resulted in the city conveying to the plaintiffs the $23\frac{3}{4}$ inches of land belonging to it, and upon which the building of the plaintiffs had encroached, and provided in this deed between the parties that the wall should be a party wall. The plaintiffs paid to the city in securing this settlement of the difficulty the sum of \$1,581.50, and they thereupon brought this suit against the defendant seeking to recover from him this amount, upon the theory that the mistake which they made in locating their building was due to the false statement made by him as to where his lot commenced.

The evidence in the case makes it very apparent that the parties to this suit had the same means of knowledge as to the true location of their lots. They each purchased their property from the same vendor at about the same time, and the inquiry of the plaintiffs directed to the defendant, it clearly appears, was more for the purpose of ascertaining the width of the lot owned by the defendant than for any other purpose. It is true, the plaintiff who conducted the building operations states that the defendant said to him that he, the defendant, owned 35 feet from the building upon the adjoining lot. Other witnesses who were present at the transaction, including the contractor, state that the defendant's statement was that he owned 35 feet next to the lot of the adjoining owner. The plaintiff conducting the transaction further states that he was informed at the time by the owner of the building on the lot adjoining the lot of the defendant that his building was on his property line; that he knew this because he had had his lot located by a surveyor when he erected the building. It therefore appears that, not only did the plaintiffs have the same knowledge that the defendant did as to the true location of their lot, but they had superior knowledge. The testimony makes it quite clear that the only representation made by the defendant to the plaintiffs was that his lot was 35 feet wide, and this is the way the plaintiffs understood it. There may be cases in which a party will be held liable in an action for fraud and deceit for false and fraudulent representations made by him as to the location of property which another is purchasing or dealing with, but in order to hold one liable under these circumstances it must appear that the parties did not have equal means of information in regard to the matter about which the representation is made, that the representation was relied upon by the party claiming damages by reason thereof, and that the same was false in fact. 12 R. O. L., title "Fraud and Deceit," §§ 40 and 134; Ballard v. Lyons, 114 Minn. 264, 131 N. W. 320, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 301, and note; Bostwick v. Lewis, 1 Day (Conn.) 250, 2 Am. Dec. 73, and note; Silver v. Frazier, 3 Allen (Mass.) 382, 81 Am. Dec. 662; Lawson v. Vernon, 38 Wash. 422, 80 Pac. 559, 107 Am. St. Rep. 880. As before stated, in this case it appears that the plaintiffs not only had equal means of knowledge with the defendant as to the location of their lot, but had superior means of knowledge upon which they relied, and this being true the court below did not err in denying the recovery upon this ground.

There is a matter complained of in the declaration as to which the plaintiffs are entitled to some relief. It is shown that because of this incorrect location of the buildings erected by the parties on their lots the 5-foot alleyway, instead of being entirely upon the 35-foot lot of the defendant, is located partly upon the lots of each of the parties, 23¼ inches thereof being upon the original 30-foot lot of the plaintiffs, and the remainder upon the lot of the defendant. The result of this is that the plaintiffs did not get the 2½ feet of land which the defendant undertook to convey to them. They have the title to it, but the defendant has constructed his building so as to cover 23¼ inches of it. Can compensation be made to the plaintiffs in this suit for this 23¼ inches of land? To do so would necessarily leave the title to the land in them, and also give them back the money which they paid for it. Of course, under the circumstances shown by the evidence in this case, the plaintiffs are in all probability estopped to evict the defendant from this 23¼ inches. The parties built their buildings, each believing that he was on his own land, and a court of equity would in all probability relieve the defendant against the effect of his conveyance as to the 23¼ inches now occupied by him, upon his making compensation to the plaintiffs therefor. But that relief cannot be granted in this suit. If the parties cannot adjust the difficulty themselves, a court of equity must be appealed to where the interest of all of the parties may be protected.

We find no error in the judgment complained of, and the same is affirmed.

STATE ex rel. LIVELY et al. v. STROTHER,
Judge, et al. (No. 4457.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 1, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law § 627(1)—Accused not entitled to copies of testimony of witnesses examined by prosecuting attorney.

One accused of a crime and brought before the court by its order, is not, by virtue of section 3, chapter 98, Acts 1921, relating to the appointment of shorthand reporters, defining their duties and the uses to which the records made by them may be put, entitled to demand or have at the hands of the court or its shorthand reporter, copies of the testimony of witnesses examined by the prosecuting attorney as directed by the court and taken down by such shorthand reporter, such proceedings not constituting a preliminary examination authorized by law, nor a case pending in court to which the accused is a party, as prescribed in said statute.

2. Criminal law § 226—Judges of criminal or circuit courts may not conduct preliminary hearing, but can only order accused taken before justice.

The preliminary hearing to which one accused of a crime is entitled can not be lawfully conducted by the judge of a criminal or circuit court. By section 1 of chapter 156 of the Code (sec. 5517) the limit of the jurisdiction of judges of such courts is to issue their warrants, reciting the accusation and requiring the accused to be brought before a justice of the county, who is authorized to hold such preliminary examination.

Original proceeding in mandamus by the State, on the relation of C. E. Lively and others, against Hon. James French Strother, Judge of the Criminal Court of McDowell County, to require Lee Pendleton, official court reporter, to turn over a copy of the evidence and statements in his possession, taken upon an alleged investigation by court order and continued before the prosecuting attorney. Peremptory writ refused.

Litz & Harman, G. W. Howard, M. S. Taylor, and W. L. Taylor, all of Welch, for relators.

G. L. Counts, of Welch, for respondents.

MILLER, J. The alternative writ, in accordance with the prayer of the petition, commanded the Honorable James French Strother, Judge of the Criminal Court of McDowell County, to require and order Lee Pendleton, official court reporter of said court, and the said Pendleton to deliver and turn over to petitioners and relators or their counsel, a copy of the evidence and statements in his possession, taken by him upon an alleged investigation, begun upon the order of the said court, and continued before the prosecuting attorney of said county, with the aid of said Pendleton acting as such court reporter or stenographer, touching the crime of murder inflicted upon one Sid Hatfield and one Ed Chambers, of which said respondents had been accused, or show cause, if any they could, why they should not do so.

[1] The right of the petitioners to demand of the court and its reporter copies of said evidence and statements is evidently predicated upon the provisions of chapter 98, Acts 1921, relating to the appointment of shorthand reporters, defining their duties and the uses to which the records made by them may be put. The authority given the court by section one of the act is to employ such reporter "to take and report, under such regulations as said judges, or any of them, may prescribe, the proceedings had and the testimony given in any case, either civil or criminal, or in any other proceeding had in such court, including the taking of testimony before the grand jury of such court for the use of the prosecuting attorney of such court, and in proceedings before the judge of such court in vacation, and otherwise to aid the judge in the performance of his official duties."

Section 3 of said act provides:

"Said reporter shall furnish, upon request, to any party to a case, a copy of the testimony or other proceedings, written out in longhand or typewriting, and shall certify the same as being correct, and shall be paid therefor."

The return of the judge, supplemented by that of the reporter, denying the right of the petitioners to copies of the evidence and statements referred to, is that such evidence and statements were not taken before respondent Strother, or in open court, or upon any official or preliminary hearing held by him, and were not taken even in the presence of respondent outside of any official hearing, and that such evidence and statements were regarded by respondent as the private information of the prosecuting attorney, and for his use upon the trial of the petitioners for the alleged murder of said decedents.

As will be observed, the authority of the court is to appoint reporters to take and report "the proceedings had and the testimony given in any case, either civil or criminal," etc. And the right to demand and have a copy of the testimony is given to any party to a case, that is a pending case or proceeding in the court. Was there such a case pending before Judge Strother or his court, and were the evidence and statements described taken in any such case? If not, the petitioners would not have the right to demand and receive copies thereof at the hands of respondents.

The facts disclosed by the petition and the returns are that during the trial of the deceased for an offense, and during the recess of the court, Hatfield and Chambers were shot and killed near the court house, and on reconvening, the court directed the sheriff to bring into court all those who were present and witnessed the shooting, and also directed the prosecuting attorney to examine the witnesses, which he did in the absence of the judge, taking the evidence before the court reporter, who made and furnished copies thereof to the prosecuting attorney and to another attorney, who had been assisting in the defense of Hatfield and Chambers. On the report of the prosecuting attorney that there was sufficient evidence to justify the holding of petitioners to answer any indictment that might be preferred against them by the grand jury, the petitioners voluntarily appeared on the following day, and without demanding a preliminary hearing, voluntarily entered into a recognizance with sureties for their appearance at the next term of the court to be held in said county.

[2] The contention of petitioners is that the proceeding before the prosecuting attorney, conducted by order of the court, was, or amounted to, a preliminary hearing, to which they were parties, and as such entitled to the relief sought by mandamus. It could not possibly be a preliminary hearing of the charges of murder made against them, for such preliminary hearing could neither be had before the judge, the court, nor the prosecuting attorney. The statute nowhere authorizes preliminary hearings before the judge or prosecuting attorney. By section 1, chapter 156 of the Code (sec. 5517), the judge in vacation or term time, or a justice, may issue process for the apprehension of a person charged with an offense, and section 2 thereof says, that on complaint to such officers, and examination of the witnesses and good reason to believe that an offense has been committed, he shall issue his warrant reciting the accusation and requiring the person so accused to be arrested and brought before a justice of the county, before whom only is there any authority given to hold a preliminary examination. Nor is the judge of the court by the statute found authorized to conduct such preliminary hearing. When apprehended upon the order or warrant of the court or judge, petitioners had the undoubted right to demand a preliminary hearing before some justice of the peace, in which event they might possibly of right demand of the reporter copies of the testimony or other proceedings taken down by him. But we do not decide the question, for it is not presented.

The right to a preliminary examination is not a common-law right; 16 Enc. Pl. & Pract. 828; 16 C. J. 322; and may be waived by the accused. State v. Stewart, 7 W. Va. 731, 23 Am. Rep. 623, and cases cited; Butler v. Commonwealth, 81 Va. 159; 8 S. R. C. L. 89. By voluntarily appearing and asking the court to admit them to bail, we think the petitioners waived a preliminary examination, at least for the time being. State v. Strauder, 8 W. Va. 686. Wherefore the examination by the prosecuting attorney, though at the instance of the court, not authorized by law, could not convert that proceeding into a preliminary examination, and give the petitioners a right to demand of the reporter or of the judge copies of the testimony and proceedings thus conducted.

Our conclusion is to deny the peremptory writ.

TIERNEY v. UNITED POCAHONTAS COAL CO. et al. (No. 4322.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 1, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Appeal and error \S 871—Decree, unquestioned until after time for review, cannot be assailed on appeal from subsequent decree.

An appealable decree entered in a cause, not in any way questioned until after expiration of the period of limitation, cannot be assailed on an appeal from a subsequent decree into which it has been carried as a basis of adjudication, allowed after expiration of such period.

2. Appeal and error \S 1195(3)—Where decree against several parties has been affirmed, it is error in subsequent decree in execution of first to relieve against part only.

If, on a bill seeking relief against several persons, on the ground of a constructive trust or constructive fraud, an interlocutory appealable decree against all of such persons has been entered and then affirmed on an appeal, it is erroneous, in a subsequent decree made in execution of the first, to grant the relief sought against some of such defendants and not against the others, in the absence of disclosure of error on the face of such first decree and subsequent impeachment thereof.

3. Evidence \S 113(1)—Ordinarily approximation is the limit of endeavor in ascertaining property values.

Ordinarily, approximation is the limit of endeavor in the ascertainment of values of property, and, to attain that, it is necessary to exclude all fanciful and purely speculative elements or grounds of value, as determined by the facts and circumstances of any given case.

4. Corporations \S 320(12)—In ascertaining value of coal lease, transferred in fraud of minority stockholders seams not opened, containing more coal than will probably be worked pending lease, properly excluded.

In the ascertainment of the value of a coal lease limited in time and taken upon a royalty basis, it is proper to exclude the coal in seams not opened, explored, nor in any way developed in the first half of the term of the lease, there being more coal in the one seam opened and worked than will probably be mined within the potential life of the lease.

5. Evidence \S 113(6)—Estimated profit from operating mine is not distinct item of value of lease to be added.

In such case, the estimated profit from the operation of the mine opened under the lease does not constitute a separate and distinct item of value to be added to that of the property. It is only a circumstance tending to prove the value of the lease, to be weighed and considered with other evidence.

6. Evidence \S 571(7)—In determining value of coal lease, evidence of practical and experienced miners held controlling.

In view of the uncertainty of estimated and unearned profits of an equipped and operated coal lease, extending over a long future period, and the slowness of value in an unequipped and unoperated coal lease taken upon the royalty basis, usually at ten cents per ton, the evidence of practical and experienced coal operators, to the effect that the value of such a lease fully equipped and in operation is the equivalent of the value of the recoverable coal in the lease, at ten cents per ton, is controlling and constitutes a sound basis of judicial ascertainment and declaration of value.

7. Corporations \S 320(12)—In ascertaining value of coal lease transferred in fraud of minority stockholders, equipment or liquid assets should not be added and liabilities should not be deducted.

In the absence of special circumstances, no other property of the owner of the lease, such as equipment or liquid assets, should be added to such value, nor should the liabilities be deducted therefrom.

8. Corporations \S 320(12)—In ascertaining value of a coal lease transferred in fraud of minority stockholders, coal subject to haulage charge equal to royalty properly omitted.

If, in such case, part of the coal included in the leases is subject to a charge for haulage through another property, equal to the royalty, it is properly omitted in such estimation of tonnage value.

9. Corporations \S 320(12)—In ascertaining value of a coal lease transferred in fraud of minority stockholders, funds and property accumulated by previous operations, not used in conducting the lease, not considered.

Funds and property accumulated by previous operations, constituting undivided profits, and not necessarily used in the conduct of the mining operations, should be added to the tonnage value, in the ascertainment of the entire value of such a property.

10. Corporations \Leftrightarrow 320(12)—In ascertaining value of coal lease transferred in fraud of minority stockholders, value of capital stock of another corporation owned by operating company properly added to tonnage value.

It is proper also to add to such tonnage value the value of capital stock of another corporation, owned by the operating company.

11. Corporations \Leftrightarrow 320(12)—In ascertaining by tonnage method value of coal lease transferred in fraud of minority stockholders, deductions not to be made for lessee's inability to mine all the coal within life of lease.

In seeking the value of a coal property by the tonnage value method above described, deductions of tonnage cannot be made upon the theory of inability of the lessee to mine all of the coal within the life of the lease, because the mining capacity of the lessee is presumptively variable and within his own control.

12. Corporations \Leftrightarrow 320(12)—In adjudicating liability to stockholders of corporations taken over at inadequate prices, profits from use of property added to value of dissenting stockholders' stock should be decreed.

In an adjudication of liability of a corporation and individuals by whom it was formed, to stockholders in other corporations taken over by it, at inadequate prices and against the will of such stockholders, it is proper to include in the decree a sum in addition to the value of the stock of the dissenting stockholders, as profits derived or derivable from the use of the property so wrongfully taken over, measured, and determined by the legal rate of interest applied to the value of such stock.

Appeal from Circuit Court, McDowell County.

Suit by L. E. Tierney against the United Pocahontas Coal Company and others, in which a decree was modified and affirmed on appeal, and from a subsequent decree executing the former one by requiring payments of money by the United Pocahontas Coal Company and Worth Kilpatrick to L. E. Tierney and the Flat Top National Bank, the losing parties appeal, and the others assign cross-errors. Decree modified and affirmed.

Malcolm Jackson, of Charleston, and Anderson, Strother, Hughes & Curd, of Welch, for appellants.

French, Easley & Easley, Sanders, Crockett, Fox & Sanders and Russel S. Ritz, all of Bluefield, for appellee.

POFFENBARGER, Judge. The decree constituting the basis of the former appeal in this cause, disposed of by the decision reported in 85 W. Va. 545, 102 S. E. 249, was interlocutory and appealable only because it settled the principles of the cause. From a subsequent decree executing the former one, by requirements of payment of large sums of money, by the United Pocahontas Coal Company and Worth Kilpatrick, to L. E. Tierney and the Flat Top National Bank, the losing parties have appealed, and the others have cross-assigned errors.

[1] For some reason not disclosed, J. A. Armstrong, G. C. Armstrong, A. Stone, and A. D. Rice, associates of Kilpatrick in the sales of the properties of the Zenith and Indian Ridge Coal Companies to the United Pocahontas Coal Company, complained of by Tierney and the Flat Top National Bank, were excluded from the decree. Right to any decree at all against the United Pocahontas Coal Company is denied in argument, on the ground that it was a purchaser for value from the other two companies and had acquired full legal and equitable title to their properties, before this suit was instituted. But, if this position is untenable, then it is urged that the decrees should have gone against the two Armstrongs, Stone, and Rice as well as the company and Kilpatrick. The former decree adjudicated liability of the United Pocahontas Coal Company, and, as to that adjudication, it was affirmed. Assault upon it is now barred by lapse of time. It was entered May 12, 1919, and this appeal was taken from another decree May 6, 1921. The limitation is one year. If it had not been appealed from and affirmed, time would preclude this complaint. Barbour, Stedman & Herod v. Tompkins, 58 W. Va. 572, 52 S. E. 707, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 715.

[2] The former decree may be interpreted as having imposed liability, upon the ground of legal or constructive fraud, not actual fraud. It characterizes the transaction as an "illegal and unlawful merger" and "a fraud on the rights and holdings" of the plaintiffs. All of this is consistent with the theory of constructive fraud. In such cases, equity distributes the burden among those guilty of the wrongful act, when it can do so without causing undue delay or other hardship. Chamberlayne v. Temple, 2 Rand. (Va.) 384, 14 Am. Dec. 786; Janvrin v. Curtis, 63 N. H. 312; Brice v. Myers, 5 Ohio, 121; Cornish v. Clark, 14 L. R. Eq. 184. In the absence of an adjudication of actual fraud, the principle or theory of the former decree should have been adhered to. As to the ground of liability, no new evidence has been taken, wherefore it remains just as it was under the former decree. There is personal liability upon all of the defendants, but, upon a full development of all the facts, it may be equitable, as among them, to require ultimate payment of the entire amounts of the decrees, by the United Pocahontas Coal Company, since it took over all the property in question. But no cross-relief among the defendants has been asked, and we decide nothing as to any supposed right thereto.

[3] Both the commissioner's report and the decree fix the values of the properties of the Zenith Coal & Coke Company and the Indian Ridge Coal & Coke Company by adding to the value of the unmined coal in their leases at 10 cents per ton, what are termed miscellaneous and current assets and the physical values of their plants, and then deducting their liabilities. Tierney and the bank complain of the omission of the coal in three undeveloped seams of coal within the leases, estimated by a witness as aggregating over 11,000,000 tons. They insist also upon addition of nearly $2,000,000 for the estimated present worth of profits derivable from operation of the properties, during the potential lives of the leases. For disallowance of these alleged elements of value they excepted to the report, and here complain of the overruling of their exceptions. They claim the decree should have awarded Tierney $224,242.20 instead of $72,813.40, and the Flat Top National Bank $81,723.43 instead of $27,259.54, including interest. On the other hand, the appellants complain of an allowance of too much tonnage and inclusion of miscellaneous and current assets and physical plant values. They also deny liability for interest and charge a duplication of values in one instance.

As in almost, if not quite, all cases of ascertainment of property values, approximation is the limit of endeavor here. To accomplish a reasonable and fair approximation upon such an inquiry it is necessary to exclude all fanciful and purely speculative elements or grounds of value; and the facts and circumstances of each particular case must be allowed, as a general rule, to determine the character of the elements or grounds of value set up and relied upon.

[4] Omission of the coal in the three unworked seams was manifestly proper. None of the coal was owned in fee by the two old companies merged into, and consolidated with the new one. They were mere lessees. The value of the coal to them depended upon the mining and marketing thereof. It did not belong to them. They were to pay for it as they should take it out. At the rates at which they had been severing and removing it, there would have been no occasion to touch any of the three omitted seams, within the potential lives of the leases. The No. 3 seam would have furnished more coal than was likely to be mined, and, presumptively, the expense of new openings in other seams would not be incurred under such circumstances. As use of the omitted coal was improbable, it had no appreciable value, for its value was to be found only in utilization thereof.

[5] The probability of profits to arise from the operation of the properties is only a circumstance indicating their value. Not having been earned and being dependent upon future conditions and contingencies, they cannot be accepted as constituting present values in and of themselves. Out of the income, it is necessary to pay the royalties and operating and marketing expenses and return the principal with interest on it, in the case of the purchase of such property. The subject-matter of the purchase, the right of mining, is constantly depleted by the operations, and ceases to exist with the exhaustion of the coal or termination of the lease. Besides, it is impossible to say, with any degree of certainty, what per cent. of profits could be realized from mining operations extending over periods of time ranging from 15 to 38 years. The trial court limited the evidence of probable profits to its proper function, namely, reflection of value in the property and rights of the companies.

[6, 7] Ordinarily, a mining lease under which nothing has been done, no entries driven, no equipment nor facilities installed, has no market value. It imposes an obligation fully equivalent, by way of reciprocation, to the advantage or benefit it confers. It alone does not give or carry a value equal to 10 cents per ton for all the coal in the territory. Generally, it obligates the lessee to pay about that much for his privilege, but, not having paid it, he cannot be deemed to have a value in his privilege, determinable upon that basis. According to the testimony of expert coal operators, the entire plant, consisting of the lease, machinery, buildings, appliances, operating capital and equipment of all kinds, is worth a sum of money equivalent to 10 cents per ton for all of the coal in the lease. A prudent operator makes his equipment correspond with the requirements of his lease. His lease without equipment is practically valueless. The equipment and lease, taken together, have value. The standard of value adopted allows something for the mining privilege over and above the costs of equipment. At any rate, the value of the equipment in these cases is very much less than the tonnage value of the coal. Properties of the class of these are frequently valued for several purposes, and the expert witnesses say such a property, fully equipped, is valued at a sum equal to the value of the coal at 10 cents per ton. What has been said makes it apparent that the tonnage value and the value of the equipment cannot be added. To do so would include, as the larger item, what, standing alone, has no value. Of course, the value found on the tonnage basis is not exact, and it may not be closely approximate, but is one that is recognized and used extensively by coal operators, in transactions involving questions of plant values. No doubt, they use it because it is more closely approximate than one obtainable in any other known way. Nor should the probable profits be added to the tonnage value. Edward Cooper, an experienced coal operator, covered all the elements of value in the use of these terms:

"The profits received from the company, that is, the stockholders' profits, in my opinion, would not be much in excess of the profits received from the money recovered from an out and out sale of the property based on a return of ten cents a tonnage, unless you reinvested the $1,300,000 in like property."

This clearly proves he did not regard future profits as present values to be added to the tonnage value. J. W. Beury, who participated in negotiations for the purchase of the properties of the United Pocahontas Coal Company, embracing a great deal more coal than the two old companies had, based his offers of $1,000,000, $1,200,000, and $1,500,000, made at different times on probable profits, as one test, and on tonnage value, as another. No price was based upon both estimated profits and tonnage combined. And then the highest offer was less than 10 cents per ton. Of course, there is some conflict in the evidence. Tierney and the bank make very large claims, founded largely upon propositions we have already disapproved. The large profits made in other mining companies in which Mr. Tierney is interested do not disprove the soundness of the tonnage rule of valuation. They are variable and subject to many contingencies, and, as has been stated, they must return the investment with interest thereon, besides paying the royalties.

[8] Upon these principles and conclusions, it becomes necessary to eliminate from the statements of value the items designated "Miscellaneous and Current Assets" and "Physical Value of Plant" on the credit side, and the item designated "Liabilities" on the debt-or side. They are very considerable sums. In the case of the Zenith Coal & Coke Company, they are, respectively, $65,004.17, $221,810.75, and $113,992.33; and in the case of the Indian Ridge Coal & Coke Co., $241,551.99, $201,941.25, and $15,226.52, respectively. But for a deduction the trial court made from the tonnage, this would make the tonnage value of the former company $522,689.30 and of the latter $414,982.90. Because the coal in the Burkes Garden Lease of the Zenith Company is subjected to a double royalty charge of 10 cents, making the total 20 cents, one charge being the royalty and the other a charge for haulage through the Pocahontas Coal & Coke Company property, the trial court deducted the tonnage of the Burkes Garden lease, amounting to 2,310,578, leaving the tonnage of the Zenith Company, for valuation purposes, at 2,916,315, and making its value, exclusive of the items here eliminated, $291,631.50. Tierney's interest in the Zenith Company is 3.4 per cent. of its value, or $9,915.47. The Indian Ridge Company owned 96½ per cent. of the stock of the Zenith, which, calculated upon its tonnage value, amounts to $281,424.40. This is to be added to the tonnage value of the Indian Ridge Company.

[9] But there is still another addition to be made to it. The "Miscellaneous and Current Assets" item in that account embraces large amounts representing undivided profits accrued from previous operation, which cannot be deemed operating capital covered by the tonnage valuation. These amounts are, cash, $49,290.94, bills receivable, $149,691.07, and real estate not used in mining operations, $26,405.31, and they make an aggregate sum of $225,387.32. The total Indian Ridge Company valuation is $921,794.62, made up of tonnage value, $414,982.90, cash and other items above described, $225,387.32, and percentage of Zenith value, $281,424.40. Of this amount Tierney is entitled to 2 per cent., or $18,435.89, and the Flat Top National Bank 1½ per cent., or $12,290.59.

[10] In addition to dividends on their stock, amounting to about 6 per cent., Tierney and the bank obtain, as of March 31, 1915, several times the par value of their stock. Tierney's allowance on account of his Zenith Company stock amounts to more than 600 per cent., and those made to him and the bank on account of the other company amount to more than 1200 per cent. of their stock holdings. On the basis here adopted, the plaintiffs obtain results about as favorable as those indicated in Col. Tierney's evidence respecting the earnings of other mining companies in the Pocahontas field, ranging from 650 per cent. to 1600 per cent., over periods of 26 to 29 years of operation.

There is no duplication in the addition of 96½ per cent. of the value of the Zenith Company to the total value of the Indian Ridge Company, for the latter owned that much of the former, and Tierney and the bank were entitled to their percentages out of the entire value of the Indian Ridge Company, and Tierney, to his percentage out of the entire value of the Zenith. He and the Indian Ridge Company practically owned the Zenith. They owned all of its stock except 2 shares. Hence it was proper substantially to divide its property between them.

[11] Still further reductions in values are insisted upon by the appellants. Their argument is that, in all probability, the coal estimated in the tonnage would not have been mined under the leases, since the mining at the rate maintained would not have exhausted it. In this connection, much stress is laid upon these facts: The leases were all for 30-year terms, which in the cases of two of them had run for 15 years and the other for 22 years; one of them carried no right of renewal; and the other two were renewable for 30 years, only upon performance of conditions which had already been omitted. The tonnage of the lease having no renewal privilege is not included in the valuation. As to the other leases, the argument assumes what has not happened and may never occur. Performance of the broken conditions may be waived. Ordinarily, a renewal to an equipped and prosperous company already operating the property would not be refused and a new lease executed to some other person or concern having no equipment, so as to interrupt the mining, at the risk of injury and damage to the mine and loss of profits. Besides, it is possible greatly to increase the rate of mining, and such an increase may be assumed, as a probability, if found to be necessary as a means of preventing loss of mining opportunity.

[12] If one taking the property of another, converting it to his own use and realizing a profit from it, is not chargeable with damages corresponding to the value of the use, he not only escapes liability for full compensation to the injured party, but also profits by his own wrong. Here the defendants may be regarded, upon one view of their status, as having wrongfully taken and used the property of the plaintiffs and derived profit from such use. Upon another, they are constructive, if not actual, trustees using and deriving profits from the property. There is as much reason for requiring them to account for the profits as for requiring them to restore the property. It may not be accurate to call such compensation interest, but it is not unfair nor unreasonable, as regards them, to measure it by the interest rate or rule. It would be impossible to deny compensation equivalent to interest, under the circumstances here disclosed, consistently with our decisions. Cresap v. Brown, 82 W. Va. 467, 96 S. E. 66; McCullough v. Clark, 106 S. E. 61; Pittsburgh & W. Va. Gas Co. v. Pentress Gas Co., 84 W. Va. 449, 100 S. E. 296, 7 A. L. R. 901; Lutz v. Williams, 84 W. Va. 217, 99 S. E. 440. The element of profit accruing to the wrongdoer from the use of the property always imposes interest. In Cross v. Cross, 4 Grat. (Va.) 258, it was held that one holding slaves of another, not in a fiduciary capacity, was not chargeable with interest on estimated hires. The holding would no doubt have been different, if the hires had been actually collected. Baird v. Bland, 5 Munf. (Va.) 492. It has been generally held in Virginia, under the statute as we have it, that interest will not be allowed upon conjectural and unliquidated amounts. Baird v. Bland, cited; Rootes v. Stone, 2 Leigh. (Va.) 650; Auditor v. Dugger & Foley, 3 Leigh. (Va.) 241; Stearns v. Mason, 24 Grat. (Va.) 484; Gibson v. Governor, 11 Leigh. (Va.) 600. Some of these decisions deny interest because of doubt as to the defendant's liability, and others, on account of the nature of the liability asserted. In this cause there has never been any room for doubt as to liability. The controversy has been limited at all times to the amount of the liability. Nor can it be said that the cause of action sounded in damages, so as to make the demand an unliquidated one, in the sense in which such demands are sometimes defined. We are clearly of the opinion that interest as damages, or rendition of profits realized from the property by the defendants, should be added to the amounts hereinbefore ascertained as the sums to be decreed. From the accrual of the right of action until the date as of which the commissioner made up his report 5 years and 10 months elapsed. Interest for that period amounts to 35 per cent. of the principal. A 35 per cent. addition makes the amounts to be decreed to Tierney, on account of his Zenith Company stock, $13,385.88, and on account of his Indian Ridge Company stock, $24,888.45, total $38,254.33; and to the Flat Top National Bank, $16,592.30.

The decree complained of will be so modified as to require payment of the said sums of $38,254.33 to L. E. Tierney and $16,592.30 to the Flat Top National Bank, respectively, together with their costs, by the United Pocahontas Coal Company, Worth Kilpatrick, J. A. Armstrong, G. O. Armstrong, A. Stone, and A. D. Rice, with interest on said debts from January 31, 1921, until paid, and, as so modified, it will be affirmed.

J. E. MOSS IRON WORKS et al. v. JACKSON COUNTY COURT et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 1, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Mechanics' liens §13—Public property is not generally subject to mechanics' liens.

As a general rule, public property is not subject to liens created by chapter 75, Code 1918 (Code Supp. 1918, §§ 3842, 3851a-3857), such incumbrances being contrary to public policy.

2. Mechanics' liens §13 — If allowed upon county property, may injure public.

Such liens, may, if permitted, effectively obstruct the transaction of the affairs of the county, to the injury of the public.

3. Mechanics' liens §13 — Mechanics' liens not allowed against county courthouse and jail for labor and materials furnished by subcontractor.

The broad provisions of a Mechanic's Lien Law are not sufficient to authorize liens against a county courthouse and jail for labor employed, materials and equipment furnished by a subcontractor, for which the contractor fails to pay him, according to the terms of the contract between them.

4. Mechanics' liens §13—Legislative intention to allow liens on public buildings must be expressed in unmistakable terms.

Although the Legislature in the exercise of its legitimate powers may, in a Mechanic's Lien Law, authorize the creation of and mode of perfecting liens on public buildings, it must clearly express its purpose to do so in unmistakable and specific terms.

5. Mechanics' liens §13—Statute construed as not authorizing liens on public property.

Chapter 6, Acts 1917 (Chapter 75, Code 1918 [Code Supp. 1918, §§ 3842, 3851a-3857]), does not, when properly construed as a whole, authorize, and apparently was not intended to authorize, the creation of such liens on public property.

6. Statutes §205 — Are to be construed as whole, so that arrangement into parts or sections is of no moment.

As a statute is to be construed in its entirety in order to determine its effect and meaning, its arrangement into parts or sections is of no moment, whether the parts or sections are in logical sequence or otherwise.

7. Mechanics' liens §13—Different sections of lien statute construed not to authorize incumbrance of public buildings.

The different sections of chapter 75, Code 1918 (Code Supp. 1918, §§ 3842, 3851a-3857), properly considered and construed, do not authorize the incumbrance of buildings devoted to public use by mechanics' or other like liens.

8. Mechanics' liens §13—Affected by sale of building so that lien is only permissible when clearly authorized.

Such liens are ineffectual except by a sale of the building incumbered by them; and, as such a sale contravenes public policy, it is permissible only as and when clearly authorized by law.

9. Counties §59—County court held not liable for neglect in accepting contract without a bond.

A county court is not liable at the suit of an assignee of a mechanic's lien creditor for its own neglect, or the neglect of its officers or agents, to perform a duty, such as the acceptance of a contract without a bond, when a bond is required, in the absence of a provision therein declarative of such liability.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

10. Counties §226—A proceeding against a county to enforce a mechanic's lien is a "process."

A proceeding for the enforcement of a lien, created according to Code Supp. 1918, c. 75 (secs. 3842, 3851a-3857), is a process within the meaning of chapter 39, § 43 (sec. 1596), which forbids the sale of county property on execution or other process.

Case certified from Circuit Court, Jackson County.

Action by the J. E. Moss Iron Works and others against the County Court of Jackson County and others to enforce a mechanic's lien for materials, equipment, and labor furnished to the courthouse and jail. Demurrer to complaint sustained, and case certified by the circuit court. Affirmed.

Smith D. Turner, of Parkersburg, and W. W. Smith, of Huntington, for plaintiffs.

W. F. Boggess and Lewis H. Miller, both of Ripley, for defendants.

LYNCH, J. Stated in somewhat different language, but in effect the same as that contained in the order certifying them, the questions to be discussed are these: Is the property of a county, the courthouse and jail and the lot on which they stand, within the meaning of the mechanic's lien law, as amended and re-enacted by chapter 6, Acts 1917, chapter 75, Code 1918 (Code Supp. 1918, §§ 3842, 3851a-3857)? If not is the county court liable for the unpaid debts due a subcontractor for materials, equipment, and labor furnished by him and installed in a courthouse and jail? The questions the demurrer of the county court of Jackson county raised, and the answer of the circuit court of that county was in the negative.

The Jackson county court contracted with Prescott Construction Company May 24, 1917, seven days after the revised statute became effective, to construct and repair the county courthouse and jail, furnish all the labor and material, and perform all the work necessary for that purpose, according to the plans and specifications incorporated in the contract, and made part of it, for a consideration payable as the work progressed. The original amount was $67,133, later increased to $100,000 by extras authorized by the county court.

Subsequently Prescott Construction Company contracted with Huntington Iron Works to furnish some of the materials and perform certain parts of the work provided for in the original and amended contract and specifications, payments therefor to be made upon the same terms and conditions, as those to be made to Prescott Construction Company. These contracts the architect, L. J. Dean, approved when submitted for his approval, as required by the agreement with the county court.

Huntington Iron Works began to furnish the materials and perform the work it undertook to furnish and do soon after the date of its contract with Prescott Construction Company, complied with the terms and conditions so prescribed, and completed it November 15, 1919, and Dean accepted it December 31, 1919, as completed; and, although the county court paid Prescott Construction Company for the work it was to perform and did perform, the latter company did not pay Huntington Iron Works the amount due it, but left unpaid a balance of $6,380.39. For this balance Huntington Iron Works in due form prepared and caused to be recorded in the office of the county clerk of Jackson county a notice of mechanic's lien, and perfected such lien in all respects in compliance with the mechanic's lien statute. At least there seems to be no objection as to any lack of formality in the effort to procure a formally perfect lien.

Having become indebted to the plaintiff the Moss Iron Works, in the sum of $4,242.15, and to the plaintiff Wheeling Metal & Manufacturing Company in the sum of $1,883.01, in some manner not disclosed in the bill, Huntington Iron Works assigned and transferred to each of them, out of the $6,640.39, the amounts due them, respectively, and to enforce payment of the lien is the object of this suit.

[1, 2] Plaintiffs invoke the provisions of sections 12 and 14 of chapter 6, Acts 1917, chapter 75, Code 1918 (Code Supp. 1918, §§ 3851k, 3851m), as authority for the liens and the right to enforce them by a sale of the courthouse and jail, and the ground on which they stand. By section 12, the state board of control, county courts, boards of education, boards of trustees, and all other legal bodies having authority to contract for the erection, construction, improvement, alteration, or repair of any public building or structure, used or to be used for public purposes, are directed in so contracting to require the person or persons to whom it shall award any such contract to execute a good, valid, solvent, and sufficient bond, in an amount at least equal to the reasonable cost of the materials, machinery, equipment, and labor required in the completion of the contract, upon the condition that in the event such contractor shall fail to pay in full for such materials, machinery, equipment, and labor used by him in the erection, construction, improvement, alteration, or repair of such public building, or other structures used or to be used for public purposes, the bond and the sureties thereon shall be liable to the person who has furnished such material, machinery, equipment, or labor for the full payment of the expenses incurred by him in that behalf. This bond the section requires to be filed with the secretary of such board or other legal body, or other custodian of its papers and records.

According to section 14, the contractor is to be deemed and treated as the agent of the owner of the building or other structure, and the improvements appurtenant thereto, and his interest in the lot on which the building is erected, improved, or repaired, or on to which it is removed, and the owner and his property is liable for the full and true value of all work and labor done and materials, machinery, and equipment furnished by a subcontractor, if the owner fails to require the contractor to execute a bond in the amount at least equal to the reasonable costs of such material, machinery, and equipment and labor performed, or to be performed pursuant to the terms of the contract, or fails to record the contract and bond, when so given, or accepts a bond for a less amount.

[3] As the statute before the amendment contained the same general mechanics' and labor liens provisions, without specific reference to property, real or personal, belonging to the public, or purchased and held for public use, as interpreted in Hall's Safe & Lock Co. v. Scites, 38 W. Va. 691, 18 S. E. 895, it did not apply to such buildings. That was a suit to enforce a mechanic's lien against the courthouse and grounds of Wayne county. The first point of the syllabus reads:

"The public buildings of a county are wholly exempt from the operation of the mechanic's lien law, and cannot be sold under execution or other process."

The statute then in force had the same general provisions as the amended statute, except in so far as section 12 enlarges earlier statutes in the particular noted. The mechanic's lien law, as it appears in the 1891 Code (chapter 75, § 3), that being the law construed in Hall's Safe & Lock Co. v. Scites, cited, says:

"Every materialman, workman, laborer, mechanic or other person performing any labor or furnishing any material or machinery, under a contract with a principal contractor or his subcontractor, for the construction, alteration, repair or removal of any house or other structure provided for in a contract between the owner thereof, or his authorized agent and such principal contractor, shall have a lien to secure * * * the value of the labor performed, and the material or machinery furnished * * * upon such house or other structure," etc.

Notwithstanding this broad and comprehensive language, language sufficiently broad and comprehensive to include a county courthouse and jail, and it was so considered by plaintiff in that case, the circuit court and this court held otherwise, and refused to approve and enforce the pretended lien. This holding is justified by an abundance of authority. Does either section of the revised mechanic's lien statute warrant the application of any other rule or principle? Section 12 contains no terms and no language significant of an intention or purpose to permit a contractor or his subcontractor to acquire a lien upon public property, as a courthouse and jail, for the default either of the original contractor or another person, firm, or corporation that agrees to furnish, and does furnish, the material, equipment, or labor required in the erection, construction, or repair of such a building. It says not a word concerning a lien of any kind or character. Its intended and clearly disclosed purpose is to make it the duty of the corporations and boards therein specified to demand and exact a bond in a definite amount, the contract price of the work to be done, the labor to be performed, and the equipment to be furnished to complete the building. Its purpose was not to protect those bodies against the default of the contractor, except as to materials, machinery, equipment and labor.

[4, 5] And although the language of section 14 may be broad enough to include county courts and other state agencies enumerated in section 12, it does not specifically name them, nor does any other section of the chapter. Section 12 alone does that. Nowhere else is there the slightest reference to the board of control, county courts, boards of education, boards of trustees, and other legal bodies having authority to contract for the erection, construction, alteration, or repair of public buildings or other like structures, used or to be used for public purposes. Inclusion by reference or interpretation is not sufficient, when the right to perfect a mechanic's lien or materialman's lien upon public buildings is involved. To warrant the creation and enforcement of such a lien against public buildings, the authority must be specific, positive, and unmistakable in its meaning and terms. They must leave open no room for construction or interpretation. If the Legislature intended to authorize or permit the subjection of public buildings to liens as public property may be subjected, as by pursuing the method prescribed, it could and doubtless would have made its intention clear and explicit. To subject property owned and used by the public for the transaction of public business to mechanics' liens, the authorization must, according to the general, indeed the almost invariable, rule, be unequivocal, not inferential.

"There can be no mechanic's lien on public property," says Boisot, § 208, Mechanic's Liens, "unless the statute creating such lien expressly so provides, since such a lien would be contrary to public policy, and would also be incapable of enforcement, not being subject to forced sale."

To support this statement he cites many decisions. See, also, Hutchinson v. Krueger, 34 Okl. 23, 124 Pac. 591, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 98, note. The statutes construed in these decisions, so far as we have examined them, authorize mechanics', artisans', and laborers' liens on all buildings and structures. Of course, courthouses and jails are structures under the meaning of such legislation, and yet, with but few exceptions, courts have not construed them so as to include buildings devoted to public uses. There being such harmony among the authorities to this effect, further citation seems needless.

[6, 7] Plaintiffs, however, would have us accept their theory, which, if tenable, would require such a construction of sections 12 and 14 as would warrant the liens claimed by them. According to plaintiffs, no other construction is permissible or possible in view of the context. That challenge goes direct to the heart of the subject dealt with by the authorities cited, and by numerous others that could be cited. As before stated, a statute which has for its purpose the authorization of incumbrances in the form of mechanics' and other like and similar liens against public property devoted to governmental uses must be explicit and positive. With this condition sections 12 and 14 fully complied, if plaintiff's argument is meritorious; but do they? Section 12 does, it is true, require a bond where the contract is for the construction or improvement of property owned, useable, and used, or to be used for the transaction of public affairs, but, as we have seen, it need not be recorded as part of the public record. The purpose of such a bond the section fully discloses; it is for the protection, not of the contractor himself, but of those who contract with him for material, equipment, and labor necessary for the completion of his contract. That being its paramount, if not its exclusive purpose, the contractor has a material interest in its execution and in insisting upon its execution, as the county court has, notwithstanding the provision exacting it. But such interest does not begin and end in the contractor, it extends to every one with whom he contracts, where a public building is to be improved. If a subcontractor undertakes to equip such a building, it only devolves upon him to refuse to furnish the equipment, unless the bond required is given, as it is mainly to protect him. While it is true, if plaintiff's theory is sound, that without such bond the contractor becomes the agent of the county court, and the county court liable to the subcontractor for the equipment or labor so furnished, yet in that section and in the other sections of the statute there is no word or language sufficient to justify the inference of an intention on the part of the Legislature to fix liability either upon the county court or the property of the county, for the payment of an indebtedness of the contractor who engages to erect, improve, or repair a public building for county purposes, except such general terms as relate exclusively to privately owned property.

Nor is there to be found a sufficient basis for such an inference in the language of section 9, although its provisions and the provisions of section 12 are similar. The general provisions of the act, considered as a whole, although apparently inclusive, are not broad enough to indicate publicly owned buildings, when construed in accordance with the prevailing weight of judicial authority.

Some significance certainly is to be attributed to the omission in section 12 of the requirement to record in the county court clerk's office the bond called for in that section. It is to be filed, not with the clerk of the county court for record, but with the secretary, or other custodian of the records and other papers of the governmental agencies therein specified. Whatever influenced the Legislature to substitute delivery to the clerk or custodian of the records and papers of such bodies for recordation in the county record office need not be surmised, in the face of the provision to the contrary. The fact remains outstanding that by no provision of the statute considered is it necessary to record the contract in the county court clerk's office, when public buildings are the subject of the improvement. When so filed it is available to any one who may come to inspect it. While in the custody of the clerk, or other like official representative of such bodies, it is accessible to any one lawfully entitled to know of its contents. Not so, when it is the bond given for the protection of a private owner of property, improved under the terms of a contract.

A second reason will appear upon a reasonable construction of the sections preceding No. 12. It is not necessary to enter into detail as to the provisions contained in most of them. Their provisions are general, and have for their purpose designation of the persons entitled to their protection, and the method of acquiring liens on private property and prescription of the method for perfecting such liens. In this respect they are not materially unlike the usual mechanic's lien statutes. By section 8 an owner may limit his liability under the terms of a contract for the construction and repairs of his real property to the price agreed upon by him and the contractor, by recording the contract in the proper office of the county wherein such property is located, prior to the beginning of the building, erection and construction of improvements thereon, and by recording with the contract a valid and solvent bond in a penalty equal to the contract price with solvent surety, conditioned that in the event any such laborer, materialman, or other person, having perfected his lien allowed by the act, be deprived by the recordation of his contract from receiving from said owner the amount of his said lien, then the said bond and the sureties thereon shall be responsible to said lienor for the amount of said lien account, or for any balance thereof not collected by said lienor from said owner and from said property. The provisions of this section somewhat resemble those contained in section 12. In other particulars they are different. They differ in this: The bond required in section 8 (Code Supp. 1918, § 3851g), when recorded with the contract, limits the liability of the owner to the amount agreed upon by the parties, and if the indebtedness of the contractor exceeds such amount, the sureties must pay the excess to the materialmen and laborers whom the contractor has not paid. The converse of these provisions appears in section 12, in that its purpose was to create a liability upon the owner who fails to require a bond, such as the section calls for, and does not record it and the contract as therein required, even though the amount so due and unpaid exceeds the contract price. So that these two sections, when read together, seem to be counterparts in a general system of liability. In other words, private property improved by the erection or repair of buildings thereon is exempt from liability if the contractor executes the bond specified, and the owner records it together with the contract. The lack of sequence of the sectional provisions does not affect the right to construe them together, when the provisions intimately relate to the same subject-matter. They are, in a sense, pari materia, whatever may be their position in the act, in that they provide for the execution and recordation of bonds, and for the consequences that ensue for the failure to execute them. Their arrangement in the act, though not orderly, does not affect the question at issue. Section 14 being the counterpart of section 9, they are to be construed together, notwithstanding the interposition of other sections.

"A statute is passed as a whole, and not in parts or sections, and is animated by one general purpose and intent. Consequently each part or section should be considered in connection with every other part or section, and so as to produce a harmonious whole." Sutherland, Statutory Construction (2d Ed.) § 368. "Words and clauses must be read in a sense which harmonizes with the subject-matter and general purpose of a statute." Id. § 370.

[8] But to what extent, if at all, may a contractor or subcontractor avail himself of the benefit of such a lien on public property of any character, real or personal, useable and used for the transaction of the public affairs of the county, if he can not sell it to raise a fund sufficient to satisfy the lien?

[10] The only mode prescribed by law for the satisfaction of mechanic's liens of any kind is by a sale of the property so incumbered. But section 43, chapter 39 (sec. 1596), expressly forbids the sale of "lands, buildings, * * * and books belonging to a county and used for county purposes, * * * to execution or other process." A proceeding for the purpose of enforcement of a lien, created according to chapter 75, is in effect a process, within the meaning of the section cited. This prohibition alone furnishes ample justification of the ruling upon the demurrer.

[9] The discussion by plaintiff's counsel of the second question certified proceeds upon the theory that, even if a mechanic's lien is not enforceable by a sale of county property, yet, because the county court neglected to exact the bond required by section 12, its neglect imposes liability upon that court, and that, to make the liability effective, the decree to be entered in the cause should include the county court. The right of plaintiffs to this relief they base upon the agency brought into being by the failure to require the bond prescribed in section 12. In other words, according to this argument, the Legislature intended to substitute Prescott Construction Company, probably an insolvent corporation, in lieu of the Jackson county court, as to any indebtedness due to the creditors of the substituted agent, and thereby create or sanction a liability where otherwise none would have existed. There is no statute that goes to that extent, so far as we are advised; at least none is cited by counsel. Such a provision is in section 14, but, according to our construction of the act as a whole, it does not embrace, and we believe was not intended to embrace, county courts. If the Legislature had deemed advisable a law inconsistent with the general policy recognized by most courts as to the nonliability of governmental agencies for mechanic's liens, it should have made its purpose clear. In the absence of such clearly expressed intent "a county court is not responsible in damages, at the suit of an individual * * * in consequence of [its] neglect or the neglect of its officers, and agents, to perform a duty enjoined by law." Watkins v. County Court, 30 W. Va. 657, 5 S. E. 654. Plaintiffs and defendant county court had the same opportunity to know legislative requirement for a bond, and the neglect to demand it is as much the fault of one as the other. Plaintiffs could have refused to furnish what they furnished for the completion of the construction company's contract, until such bond as the statute requires was executed for their protection. Neither they nor the county court perhaps recalled that provision, as it became operative only a few days before the date of the contract.

As what has been said responds to the questions certified, the order of this court will approve the ruling upon the demurrer.

ROBERTS et al. v. HUNTINGTON DEVELOPMENT & GAS CO. (No. 4304.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia, Nov. 1, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Acknowledgment §62(2)—To impeach acknowledgment of duly authorized officer, the proof must be clear and controlling beyond reasonable doubt.

In order to impeach the certificate of acknowledgment of a duly authorized officer, the proof thereof must be clear, cogent, satisfactory and controlling beyond reasonable doubt.

2. Mines and minerals §55(1)—Instrument releasing minerals and mineral rights in lands sued for in ejectment held a valid and binding quitclaim deed.

An instrument reciting the pendency of certain ejectment suits, and reciting the names of the plaintiffs and defendants therein, and whereby the makers thereof in terms or effect undertake to release or disclaim to the plaintiffs in those suits and those claiming under them, any right, title, claim or demand to certain minerals and mineral rights in the land sued for in said actions, and describing the land by reference to certain recorded deeds, and duly acknowledged by the makers before a proper officer, sufficiently identifies the grantees, and being made for a valid consideration, is in effect a quitclaim deed, and valid and binding on the grantors, their heirs and assigns.

3. Mines and minerals §55(1)—Desire to settle conflicting claims to land, surface of which makers possessed, held sufficient consideration for quitclaim deed to mineral rights.

The pendency of such ejectment suits, the fact that the makers were in possession of the surface of the land, and desirous of having settled any and all conflicting claims to the land so occupied by them, and to be relieved from all obligation in relation thereto, constitutes a sufficient consideration for the making and execution of such quitclaim deed to such minerals and mineral rights.

4. Mines and minerals §55(2)—Technical words of legal import must yield to manifest intent in construing quitclaim deed.

In construing such an instrument effect must always be given to the plain intent of the parties, when such intent can be ascertained from the instrument, and is not repugnant to any rule of law; and technical words of legal import, when employed, must yield to such manifest intent of the parties.

5. Estoppel §15—Mines and minerals §55(1)—Grantee in quitclaim deed need not be described by name, if properly distinguished by description.

The fact that in such an instrument the grantee may not be described by name will not affect the validity of the deed, if the designation or description be sufficient to distinguish the person or persons intended from the rest of the world.

6. Estoppel §29(1)—Maker of quitclaim deed and his grantees estopped to assert any right, title, or interest in land quitclaimed.

The maker of such an instrument is estopped by the deed from asserting any right, title or interest in the land so granted or quitclaimed, and being so estopped, those claiming under him are also estopped thereby.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Putnam County.

Bill by M. T. Roberts and another against the Huntington Development & Gas Company. Decree for plaintiffs, and the defendant appeals. Reversed, and plaintiff's bill, and amended and supplemental bills, dismissed.

J. S. Clark and Henry A. McCarthy, both of Philadelphia, Pa., and Vinson, Thompson, Meek & Renshaw and Fitzpatrick, Campbell, Brown & Davis, all of Huntington, for appellant.

Wilkinson & Wilkinson, of Hamlin, for appellees.

MILLER, J. The object of the present bill was to have removed as a cloud upon plaintiffs' alleged title to two tracts, comprising one hundred and thirty-eight (138) acres of land in Putnam County, alleged to have been acquired by them in the year 1887, by deeds from Margaret Billups, a certain recorded instrument, commonly known as a disclaimer, the pertinent parts of which are as follows:

"Whereas, certain actions of ejectment are now pending in the District Court of the United States for the District of West Virginia in favor of Henry McFarlan and others against Lewis Adkins and others, John P. Yelverton and others against Jeremiah Witcher and others, Gustavus A. Sacchi against James A. Holley and others, Gustavus A. Sacchi against J. M. Reece and others and Gustavus A. Sacchi against A. J. Barrett and others; for the recovery of a certain tract of land heretofore conveyed by Henry McFarlan and others, Trustees of the Guyandotte Land Company, to Gustavus A. Sacchi by deed bearing date on the 27th day of June, 1885, and recorded in the office of the Recorder of Cabell County in Book A (new series) page 104; and

"Whereas, Charles M. & Dortha D. S. Billups are in possession of and claiming title to a portion of said land so sought to be recovered and are desirous of settling any and all conflicting claims to lands so occupied and claimed by them:

"Now Therefore the said Charles & Dortha — in consideration of the premises and of being released from all litigation in relation to the land hereinafter described and from liability for costs in relation to lands sought to be recovered as aforesaid, do hereby disclaim all right, title, claim, demand or interest in and to all and any land set out and described in said deed and said declarations in said actions of ejectment except those pieces or parcels of land situate, lying and being in the county of Putnam and State of West Virginia on Big Creek of Trace Fork of Mud and being part of a survey of 200 acres made for Andrew Barrett on the 10th day of May 1838 being 55½ acres situate on the waters of Big Creek of Trace Fork of Mud in Putnam County, West Va., beginning at an ash, (etc.).

"Also that other piece or parcel of land adjoining the above tract beginning at a white oak and two beeches a corner to said survey of 200 acres, thence N. 84° E. 48 poles crossing the creek to a gum and red oak, thence a straight line 159 poles to a beech, thence a south course crossing the creek 35 poles to a beech and dogwood bush, thence a straight line and south-east direction to the beginning, containing 35 acres more or less.

"But the said Charles and Dortha D. S. Billups hereby disclaim all title to or interest in all coal (except so much as shall be required for domestic purposes) and iron ore, hydrocarbon oils, salt brine, natural gas and all other minerals in, upon or under the said tract of land herein excepted with the exclusive right to the said plaintiffs and those claiming under them for rights of way for tram, rail and wagon roads through said land so excepted and to dig for and mine coal, iron ore, bore for oil or natural gas and the necessary conveniences on said land for storing oil and coal and the transmission of the same by the best and most convenient means to market.

"And the said Charles and Dortha — further agree that the plaintiffs in either of said actions may take judgment against them in ejectment for the interests by them herein disclaimed and to that end they empower any attorney of said court to appear for them and consent that such judgment be entered and that this disclaimer be filed as a part of the record in such cause.

"Given under our hands and seals this 22nd day of May, 1891.

"C. M. Billups [Seal.]

"Dortha Billups [Seal.]"

This paper purports to have been acknowledged by both the makers, before Alexander Eggleton, Notary Public, August 8, 1891, and was recorded in the clerk's office of the county court of Putnam County, March 21, 1893.

Two main grounds are alleged and relied on as the bases for the relief prayed for and decreed to plaintiffs by the decree of July 30, 1920, appealed from. First, that the instrument in question is a forgery as to Dortha, or Dortha D. S. Billups, and was never executed or acknowledged by her in any form, or by any one with her authority: Second, that said instrument is not a deed, nor a deed of bargain and sale, operating to pass any title to the minerals and mineral rights described therein.

On the first of these questions, that of the alleged forgery of the instrument, the record shows that about the time of the alleged execution of the instrument, numerous other deeds or contracts in substantially the same form were executed by other defendants in the several ejectment suits described in the instrument, and either recorded as deeds or carried into judgments in those suits. The contract involved here does not appear to have been covered by any judgment against the makers. Mrs. Billups is not shown to have been a party to any of those ejectment suits, but Charles M. Billups, her husband, was, who along with his wife was then in possession of the land. The notary public before whom the acknowledgment was taken, now deceased, was a near neighbor of the Billupses, and passed and repassed their place almost every day, so they testify. He had no interest in any way in the subject matter of the alleged instrument. Charles M. Billups admits the execution of the instrument on his part, and as to him there is no question of forgery presented, but the title to the land was not in him, but in his wife, Dortha D. S. Billups. Mrs. Billups, the evidence shows, could neither read nor write. Her name was signed to the paper as Dorothy Billups, but the certificate of acknowledgment contains her full name, Dortha D. S. Billups, and identifies her as the same person whose name is signed to the instrument. The instrument is dated May 22, 1891, but does not purport to have been acknowledged until August 8th following, which is a significant fact taken in connection with the other evidence. This suit was instituted, not by the Billupses, but by plaintiffs, near relatives, and remote grantees, in October, 1916, more than twenty-three years after the recording of the paper in Putnam County, and more than twenty-five years after the date and acknowledgment thereof. Such is the record evidence of the making and executing of the instrument.

We next turn to the oral evidence of the witnesses relied on to support the decree. We have first the testimony of C. M. Billups. He admits he signed and acknowledged the contract on his part before Eggleton, Notary. He says he did this after being threatened with prosecution for cutting timber belonging to plaintiffs in the ejectment suit over the line claimed by his wife. This fact is unimportant on the question of forgery of his wife's name. As to her signing and acknowledging the paper he says that he had no recollection of his wife having signed and acknowledged the disclaimer, and as to her refusal at any time, he says:

"I can only state just what I know and what I am positive. It strikes me like she did in the first place kind of kicked, but whether she finally signed it I couldn't tell for my life. I have no recollection,—my recollection is kindly bad."

Of course as Mrs. Billups could not write, some one who could would have to sign her name for her, and that she may not have signed her name or made her mark is not a very significant fact. When pressed with the question: "Why did you disclaim your wife's mineral?" Billups answered:

"I suppose I was always doing business for her was the reason I done it; I don't know what else. Of course I always done business just the same as for myself and was bound up and could not get out of it any way, and of course there had to be something done, or big trouble."

That Mrs. Billups in the beginning may have objected to executing the paper, as her husband swears, is in keeping with the evidence of all the other witnesses for plaintiff unless it be that of Mrs. Billups herself, who swears that she did not execute it or authorize the execution thereof by any one else. As observed, nearly three months elapsed between the date of the instrument, when Billups may have signed it, and when Mrs. Billups may have refused to do so, as Billups says, when she "kind of kicked," and the date of the acknowledgment, when according to Billups and other witnesses, she may have relented and actually authorized her husband or some one else to sign the contract, and herself acknowledged it before the notary public. His certificate, a quasi judicial act, so certifies at all events.

The testimony of two other witnesses, namely, Victoria Cottrell, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Billups, and W. M. Ashworth, at the date of the instrument in the employ of E. L. Butterick, who appears to have been attorney for the plaintiffs in the ejectment suits, is relied on. The pertinent part of Mrs. Cottrell's testimony is that she remembers that about the year 1891, her father was in trouble about cutting timber on what was known as the company's land, and she recalled that Ashworth and Eggleton were at her father's house for the purpose of getting her father and mother to sign a paper writing or deed of disclaimer of the minerals under the land owned by her mother; that her father had signed such writing, but her mother had not. And as to what was said on that occasion she says:

"Of course it has been some time, you know, and I don't remember more than this, she made this remark that she would die before she would sign it."

She further testified that she did not know of Eggleton being back at her father's house at any other time when he signed and acknowledged the paper. She could not be positive that she was at home all the time from May 22, 1891, to August 8, 1891, and that she did not know of Mr. Eggleton going back to her home to see her mother about the disclaimer after her father had signed it. She was finally asked: "Could he (referring to Eggleton) have come when you were away from home?" Answer: "Yes, he could have come." She could not remember the date or season of the year when he was present with Ashworth to secure the paper, so that her evidence is not inconsistent with defendant's theory, based largely on the testimony of other witnesses and the difference between the date of the deed and the date of the acknowledgment, that Mrs. Billups, though objecting in the beginning afterwards consented, and the instrument was signed on her behalf by some one, and she acknowledged it before Eggleton.

The strongest evidence perhaps in support of plaintiffs' case is that of Ashworth, representing Butterick, attorney for plaintiffs in the ejectment suits. He acknowledges that Mrs. Billups objected, and refused to sign the instrument; said she never would. But on cross-examination Ashworth says his understanding is that there was only one paper to be executed at the time he was present, but would not be positive about that. And he says that if Mrs. Billups on another day, after her husband had acknowledged it, also acknowledged it, he knows nothing about it. And when shown another disclaimer deed like the one involved here and purporting to bear the same date and to have been acknowledged on the same day before Eggleton, Notary Public, he could not say which one of the two instruments it was that Mrs. Billups refused to sign or acknowledge. The only other witnesses examined on the subject of forgery were Spurlock, Sponaugle, Linkous and the plaintiffs, all of whose testimony on this proposition was hearsay and wholly incompetent. It related to what others had told them after the transaction.

[1] Are these facts and circumstances and the testimony of these witnesses sufficient to overthrow and brand as a forgery a solemn deed or instrument, twenty-five years after it purports to have been executed before a public officer? If so, there is little safety in the titles to land. The treachery of memories, and the cupidity and avarice of former owners and claimants of the land would be sufficient to overthrow deeds and other instruments. The rule of law laid down in this state, as elsewhere, is that in order to impeach the certificate of acknowledgment of a duly authorized officer, the proof must be clear, cogent, satisfactory and convincing beyond reasonable doubt or controversy. Pickens v. Knisely, 29 W. Va. 1, 11 S. E. 932, 6 Am. St. Rep. 622; Swiger v. Swiger, 58 W. Va. 119, 52 S. E. 23; Hill v. Horse Creek Coal Land Co., 70 W. Va. 221, 73 S. E. 718; Mankin v. Davis, 82 W. Va. 757, 763, 97 S. E. 296. It was decided in the Swiger Case that the evidence of the grantor denying the execution of the deed, and the opinion of the experts that the signature thereto was not that of the grantor, was not sufficient to overthrow the verity of the certificate of acknowledgment. And in Hill v. Horse Creek Coal Land Co., supra, it was decided that the denial of the execution of a deed and acknowledgment thereof, unaided otherwise than by the fact that the signature was by mark, and the party could write, and denied having signed any paper, was not sufficient to overcome a certificate of acknowledgment thirty years old, and pronounced genuine by the officer who certified the acknowledgment. See also, Houlihan v. Morrissey, 270 Ill. 66, 110 N. E. 341, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 364, and note; People's Gas Co. v. Fletcher, 81 Kan. 76, 105 Pac. 34, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1161, and note; 1 C. J. p. 896, and note 60.

[2] The remaining question is as to the adequacy of the instrument to pass title to the minerals and mineral rights disclaimed. It is apparent from the language of the instrument that the makers thereof intended to release or disclaim to the plaintiffs in the several ejectment suits referred to and those claiming under them any right, title, claim or demand to the land sued for in said actions, being the land theretofore conveyed by Henry McFarland and others, trustees of the Guyandotte Land Company, to Gustavus A. Sacchi, by deed of June 27, 1885, and recorded in Cabell County, in Deed Book A (New Series) page 104, except the tract described as containing 55½ acres, and a tract of 35 acres also described therein; and as to the tracts so excepted to also disclaim all title to or interest in all coal (except so much as shall be required for domestic purposes) and iron ore, hydrocarbon oils, salt brine, natural gas and other minerals in, upon or under the said tract of land therein excepted, with the exclusive right to said plaintiffs and those claiming under them for right of way for tram, rail or wagon roads through said land so excepted, and to dig for and mine coal, iron ore, bore for oil and natural gas etc. The instrument so states its purpose. The plaintiffs were well known or easily ascertainable, and there can be no question as to the parties to the instrument nor the subject-matter or matters of the disclaimer.

[3] The consideration for this disclaimer was, as the instrument recites on its face, the pendency of the suits, the fact that the makers were in possession of the lands sued for, their desire to have settled any and all conflicting claims to the lands so occupied by them, and to be relieved from all litigation in relation thereto, and from liability for costs. Certainly these were sufficient considerations for the deed or instrument of disclaimer. It is conceded that if this instrument was genuine, and had been filed in the ejectment suits, and judgment taken in favor of the plaintiffs therein, such judgment would have worked a complete estoppel as to claimants or any one holding under them; but the contention of counsel is that this was not done; that no judgment was taken; and the paper not being in form a deed, and containing no words of bargain or sale, or grant or other operative words, there is no manifest intent in the instrument to pass any title.

[4] We need not travel outside of our own decisions for a statement of the well settled rules of construction, namely, that effect must be given to the intent of the parties to an instrument, when it is plainly and clearly expressed, or can be settled or ascertained from the instrument, and is not repugnant to any rule of law, and that technical words or form of the instrument are not essential to the validity or effectiveness of the instrument, where the intent is so manifested; and that technical words of legal import, where employed, must always yield to such manifest intent of the parties. Parsons v. Balto. B. & L. Ass'n, 44 W. Va. 335, 29 S. E. 999, 67 Am. St. Rep. 769; Crookshanks v. Ransbarger, 80 W. Va. 21, 92 S. E. 78; 18 Corpus Juris, p. 170; American Emigrant Co. v. Clark, 62 Iowa, 182, 17 N. W. 483. In the recent case of T. J. Woodall v. Clark et al., Trustees, 254 Fed. 526, 166 O. C. A. 84, the Circuit Court of Appeals for this circuit, affirming Judge Keller, of the District Court, held the instrument there involved, practically the same as the one we have under consideration here, to be in effect a quitclaim deed. And again, in Miller v. Estabrook et al. (C. C. A.) 273 Fed. 143, the same court held a like instrument to be in effect a quitclaim deed. And when we read and consider the whole instrument and all its parts, as we are reminded by counsel that we must, there is nothing to be found there to manifest any intent other than to quitclaim to the plaintiffs in the pending ejectment suits all right, title and interest in and to all coal (except, etc.), and iron ore, hydrocarbon oils, salt brine, natural gas and all other minerals in, upon and under said tracts of land, with the exclusive right etc., as there described. These were interests severable from the rest of the land, and as held in Freudenberger Oil Co. v. Simmons et al., 75 W. Va. 337, 83 S. E. 995, Ann. Cas. 1918A. 873, were the proper subjects of grant or exceptions in a deed.

[5] It is contended, however, that there are no grantees named in the instrument, and that for this reason the instrument lacks an essential element in order to pass title. But this argument was met and decided adversely to the contention of counsel in the two federal cases cited. It is true, the persons to whom the disclaimers were made are not specifically named in that part of the instrument, but the plaintiffs in the ejectment suits are named or recited in the previous part thereof; and the rights and interests disclaimed, are, by the very language of the instrument, "with the exclusive right to the said plaintiffs and those claiming under them for rights of way for tram, rail and wagon roads through said lands so excepted." These words taken in connection with those following, providing that, "plaintiffs in either of said actions may take judgment against them in ejectment for the interests by them herein disclaimed," etc., removed all doubt as to the grantees intended, and sufficiently describes them. In 1 Devlin, on Deeds, § 184, it is said:

"The fact that a grantee is not described by name will not affect the validity of a deed, if the designation or description be sufficient to distinguish the person intended from the rest of the world."

On this subject we also refer to American Emigrant Co. v. Clark, supra.

[6] The argument is also advanced that the instrument is executory only, and not having been carried into judgment, as the plaintiffs were authorized to do, the title never passed. That was the right of plaintiffs in the ejectment suits; but as to the defendants nothing remained to be done on their part. As to them the instrument was fully executed. And being executed under seal, and delivered, the grantors were thereby forever estopped by the deed from asserting any right, title or interest in the several interests in the land so granted or quitclaimed. One may be estopped to deny the truth of facts agreed upon and settled by force of entering into the contract, and arising from acts done under or in performance thereof. 21 Corpus Juris, 1110; Headley v. Hoopen-garner, 60 W. Va. 626, 55 S. E. 744. In Dickerson v. Colgrove, 100 U. S. 578, 25 L. Ed. 618, an owner of land was held to be estopped as against a purchaser by a letter which he wrote to the vendor and which was shown to the purchaser. And in Summerfield v. White, 54 W. Va. 311, 46 S. E. 154, it was distinctly held that one claiming under another so bound by an estoppel is himself bound thereby. In this case the plaintiffs are bound thereby, if not by actual knowledge, by force of the recorded instrument. Section 11, chapter 72, of the Code (section 3790) provides:

"And all deeds heretofore made, whether by officers, agents, commissioners, or individuals, shall be valid and effectual, and bind the parties thereto and the persons whose estates and interests are thereby conveyed, notwithstanding any defects, or informality therein, in the same manner and to the same extent, as if the same had been in due and legal form, if it sufficiently appear by the contents of the deed what is intended."

Having held the instrument sufficiently formal, and indicating the interests of the parties, it was a recordable instrument, and being recorded was notice to the plaintiffs as purchasers, of the rights of appellants.

Our conclusion, therefore, is to reverse the decree, and to dismiss plaintiffs' bill and amended and supplemental bills, and that appellant recover of the plaintiffs its costs here incurred and in the court below, and it will be so ordered.

NASH et al. v. SHUTE. (No. 418.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 23, 1921.)

1. Judgment ¶719—Conclusive as to all matters within scope of pleadings.

A judgment by a court having jurisdiction of the cause and the parties will estop the parties and their privies as to all issuable matters directly presented by the pleadings, and also as to all matters within the scope of the pleadings which were material and relevant and were in fact investigated and determined.

2. Boundaries ¶51—Judgment in boundary proceedings cannot determine title.

In processioning proceeding, the clerk, in view of C. S. § 362, which provides that occupation constitutes sufficient ownership for the purposes thereof, has no jurisdiction to settle questions of title.

3. Boundaries ¶52(3)—Determination not conclusive as to title.

A judgment rendered by the clerk in a processioning proceeding is not conclusive on the parties on any question of title.

4. Boundaries ¶52(3)—Finding of ownership not conclusive against easement.

Even if the finding in a processioning proceeding that one of the parties was the owner of the premises in dispute was conclusive on the issue of ownership, it would not be conclusive that such ownership was unincumbered, and therefore would not preclude a claim by the adjoining owner of an easement by prescription to have his eaves project over the land.

Exceptions and Appeal from Superior Court, Union County; Ray, Judge.

Civil action by H. G. Nash and others against J. T. Shute. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant excepts and appeals. Error.

Plaintiffs, claiming ownership of a lot in city of Monroe abutting on Hayne street, institute this action alleging that defendant's, owner of a lot to south of plaintiffs', has built a brick opera house and post office thereon, which, in the eaves and other incidents above the surface, wrongfully project over plaintiffs' line, causing water from defendant's building to fall on plaintiffs' said lot and otherwise interfering with plaintiffs' rightful enjoyment of their property, and the prayer is for a mandatory injunction requiring defendant to remove the eaves and other projections, to restrain the trespass and nuisance thereby caused, and for general relief.

Defendant answers, admitting plaintiffs' ownership of the lot as claimed, and alleging, in effect, a prescriptive right to maintain said projections and the effects of same, etc., by open and adverse user for more than 20 years next before action brought. On the hearing and in support of their position, plaintiffs offered in evidence the record in proceeding before the clerk to establish the line between the two lots under Consolidated Statutes, c. 9, § 361 et seq., in which said proceedings plaintiffs alleged ownership of present lot: that defendant owned the lot just adjoining on the south, and defendant claimed the true dividing line was as much as five feet in and upon the lot as claimed by plaintiffs, and beyond the brick buildings which defendant had constructed upon his property.

Defendant answered, admitting plaintiffs' ownership as claimed, alleged that defendant had never claimed the true line to be five feet north of defendant's buildings, but admitted that the true dividing line was as plaintiffs claimed, and on these admissions appearing in defendant's answer the clerk entered the following judgment:

"This cause coming on to be heard before the undersigned clerk of superior court of Union county, N. C., upon the verified pleadings filed in the cause, and it appearing to the court that the defendant admits the location of the lines claimed by plaintiffs to be at the places where plaintiffs contend that they are, and that there are no issues either of fact or law to be decided by a court and jury:

"Now, therefore, upon motion of plaintiffs, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the true dividing line between the lot of plaintiffs and the lot of the defendant J. T. Shute is a line commencing at the northwest corner of J. T. Shute's brick opera house building on the eastern boundary of Hayne street and running thence with the northern wall of said brick opera house building and with the old post office building of J. T. Shute about N. 87° E. 180 feet, more or less, to Beasley street, the northeast corner of said J. T. Shute's post office building; and it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the true dividing line between the lot of plaintiffs and the lot of defendant S. B. Hart is a line commencing at a point on the eastern boundary of Hayne street 30 feet north of the northwest corner of the said J. T. Shute's brick opera house building and running thence parallel with the dividing line between the lot of plaintiffs and the lot of the defendant J. T. Shute to Beasley street; and the cost of this action be divided between the plaintiffs and the defendant J. T. Shute.

"This the 6th day of November, 1919.

"R. W. Lemmond, C. S. C."

The record was admitted by defendant, and the court, being of opinion that defendant was estopped by the proceedings and judgment before the clerk from maintaining any claim for an easement or other right in plaintiff's property, judgment was entered substantially as claimed by plaintiff, and defendant excepted and appealed.

Vann & Millikin, of Monroe, for defendant.

HOKE, J. [1] In Coltrane v. Laughlin, 157 N. C. 282, 72 S. E. 961, it was held, in effect, that—

"When a court having jurisdiction of the cause and the parties" enters judgment therein, purporting to determine the controversy, the judgment will estop "the parties and their privies as to all issuable matters" directly presented by the pleadings and "though not issuable in a technical sense," it will conclude, "among other things, as to all matters within the scope of the pleadings, which are material and relevant and were in fact investigated and determined."

And this statement of the principle is in accord with numerous decisions where the subject has been directly considered. Holloway v. Durham, 176 N. C. 550, 97 S. E. 486; Propst v. Caldwell, 172 N. C. 594, 90 S. E. 757; Cropsey v. Markham, 171 N. C. 44, 47 S. E. 950; Gillam v. Edmonson, 154 N. C. 127, 69 S. E. 924; Tyler v. Capeheart, 125 N. C. 64, 34 S. E. 108; Jordan v. Farthing, 117 N. C. 188, 23 S. E. 244.

[2] The record relied upon by plaintiff as an estoppel in the present case is a proceedings before the clerk, and terminated before him, to settle the location of a disputed boundary line under the provisions of chapter 9 of the Consolidated Statutes. Proceeding under this statute, the court is bound by its limitations and restrictions, Proctor v. Commissioners, 108 S. E. 360, at the present term, and the law confers on the clerk no jurisdiction to settle questions of title. He can only authoritatively determine the location of a disputed line, and very properly this is all that his judgment professes to decide:

"It is ordered and decreed that the true dividing line between the lot of plaintiffs and the lot of defendant J. T. Shute is a line commencing at the northwest corner of J. T. Shute's brick opera house building on the eastern boundary of Hayne street, and running thence with the northern wall of said brick opera house building and with the old post office building about N. 87° E. 180 feet, more or less, to Beasley street, the northeast corner of said J. T. Shute's post office building."

[3] The statute itself provides in section 362:

"That the occupation of land constitutes sufficient ownership for the purposes of this chapter."

The judgment of the clerk only undertook to determine the location of the surface line between the parties, and did not purport to settle the extent or character of the proprietary interests of the owners or claimants on either side. Not only were these matters not investigated or determined in any hearing before him, but the clerk, as stated, was without jurisdiction over them, and the parties are therefore not concluded by his judgment in respect to them. The decisions which were cited by counsel as upholding the claim of an estoppel by judgment were cases where, the issue of title being raised in the pleadings, the cause was transferred to the superior court, and under the statute applicable became in effect an action to determine the title, etc. That court, having general jurisdiction, could enter a judgment concluding the parties as to the questions presented by the pleadings. Hilliard v. Abernethy, 171 N. C. 644, 88 S. E. 865; Maultsby v. Braddy, 171 N. C. 300, 88 S. E. 423; Woody v. Fountain, 143 N. C. 66, 55 S. E. 425.

There is nothing in Whitaker v. Garren, 167 N. C. 658, 83 S. E. 759, that militates against this ruling. In that case the trial judge, under several decisions construing a former statute, had held that in a subsequent suit between the parties to try out the question of title a proceedings under the statute the clerk to settle a disputed line could be allowed no effect whatever, and could not be received in evidence. The court in Whitaker v. Garren only held that, under the statute now prevailing, "the action of the clerk in a proceedings to settle the line was admissible as to the location of the line," but it was not held that the judgment of the clerk in a proceedings which terminated before him could work an estoppel on questions of title.

[4] Apart from this, in a proceedings of this character a finding on the question of ownership does not necessarily signify the holder of an unincumbered title. A recognized definition of easement is "a liberty, privilege, without profit, in the land of another, existent distinct from the ownership of the soil," and, unless it should appear from the issue and evidence pertinent that a full and incumbered title was the question determined, such a finding would not of itself necessarily work an estoppel as to the existence of an outstanding easement in the property. Stokes v. Maxson, 113 Iowa, 122, 84 N. W. 949, 86 Am. St. Rep. 367; Burr v. Lamaster, 30 Neb. 688, 46 N. W. 1015, 9 L. R. A. 637, 27 Am. St. Rep. 428; 9 R. C. L. pp. 735, 736.

On the record we are of opinion that the proceedings and judgment of the clerk as to correct placing of a surface line does not work an estoppel on defendant as to the easement claimed by him, and the cause must be remanded, that the issues arising on the pleadings may be properly determined.

Error.

McKAUGHAN v. MERCHANTS' BANK & TRUST CO. (No. 359.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 30, 1921.)

1. Banks and banking — 148(2)—Liable for payment of forged indorsement not induced by negligence.

A bank is liable for the payment of a check on a forged indorsement, unless the drawer was guilty of some negligence which caused the bank to make the payment.

2. Banks and banking — 140(2)—Liable for payment on unauthorized indorsement of payee's name.

A bank is liable for paying a check drawn to the order of one whose name was signed to a forged trust deed upon the indorsement of the payee's name by a customer known to the bank, who was unauthorized to make such indorsement.

3. Banks and banking — 140(2)—Amount received by maker credited on bank's payment of check on unauthorized indorsement.

Where a creditor gave to his debtor a check payable to the order of the debtor's sister in reliance on a forged deed of trust covering the sister's property, which check was cashed by a bank on the unauthorized indorsement of his sister's name by the debtor, and the amount of the debt paid to the creditor, the payment to the creditor is to be deducted from the amount of the check, which he is entitled to recover from the bank, even though he had lost the security for the original debt, since such loss was occasioned by his reliance on the forged deed of trust, and not by the bank's payment on the unauthorized indorsement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Forsyth County; Webb, Judge.

Action by L. C. McKaughan against Merchants' Bank & Trust Company. Judgment for plaintiff for a part only of the amount claimed by him, and both parties appeal. No error.

The defendant bank paid and charged to plaintiff's account a check with an unauthorized indorsement. The plaintiff was a tender of money, and one W. B. Byerly being indebted to him in the sum of $1,000, with interest, and the debt being past due, applied to the plaintiff for an additional loan, out of which the old loan was to be taken up. The new loan was to be $3,000, out of which Byerly was to pay the plaintiff the old loan, amounting with interest to $1,065.84.

Byerly stated to plaintiff that he would give as security a deed of trust on 10 acres of land belonging to his sister Adella Byerly. The plaintiff had the papers drawn and delivered them to Byerly for execution. Byerly brought them back with their due execution certified by a notary public, whereupon the plaintiff made out a check payable to Adella

J. Byerly, whose name purported to be signed to the deed in trust, for $2,848.15, having deducted from the loan certain fees and costs, and gave the said check to W. B. Byerly to whom the loan had been made.

W. B. Byerly occupied offices across the hall from the plaintiff, and was associated in the real estate business with one Sid Venable who had been in jail about a real estate transaction. There was evidence that Venable came over to the plaintiff to get the check and was present in plaintiff's office when the check was drawn and was handed to W. B. Byerly. The plaintiff's partner, H. O. Sapp, lived near W. B. Byerly and his sister, Adella J. Byerly.

W. B. Byerly presented the check to bank, where he had long had an account, indorsed "Adella J. Byerly, by W. B. Byerly." The proceeds of the check ($2,848.15) were placed to the credit of W. B. Byerly on August 5, 1919, and were subsequently drawn out on his order. On August 6, 1921, a check for $1,065.85 from W. B. Byerly back to plaintiff was deposited with the bank by plaintiff and paid. At no time did Adella Byerly apply to plaintiff for a loan or come to his office and there was no communication between them, although she lived only a short distance. The loan was to W. B. Byerly and the security he offered of a mortgage on his sister's property was a forgery and void.

Adella Byerly testified that she never authorized W. B. Byerly to sign any papers or indorse any checks for her, and that the signature on the check "Adella J. Byerly" was not written by her, nor authorized by her; that she knew nothing about it, and did not execute the deed in trust in question; that her name is Adella L. Byerly, but that she usually drops the L; that neither the deed in trust on the land nor the check was signed by her or by her authority or with her knowledge. The notary public who took acknowledgment states that Adella Byerly is not the person who signed and acknowledged the deed in trust before him, and he is of the opinion that the woman who signed and acknowledged the deed in trust was the wife of W. B. Byerly. Thomas Maslin, president of the defendant bank, testified that on August 5, 1919, before this check of $2,848.15 was put to the credit of W. B. Byerly he had a balance to his credit of 13 cents, and that out of this deposit, check for $1,065.84 was paid and charged to W. B. Byerly and was credited to the plaintiff.

The court instructed the jury that if they believed the evidence they should answer "No" to the second issue, "Did the negligence of the plaintiff cause said payment to be made by the plaintiff bank as alleged in the answer"? To this instruction the defendant excepted. There was no contest that the de-defendant paid and charged to the plaintiff's account the check described in the complaint, upon the unauthorized indorsement of the payee; that the plaintiff was not indebted to the drawee of said check at the time it was issued, and that the drawee of said check (Adella Byerly) had no information of its being drawn; that the plaintiff, the drawer of said check, received $1,065.84 out of proceeds of said check, and the court so instructed the jury, and also that, if they "believed all the evidence in the case, to answer the issue $1,782.31, with interest from August 5, 1919."

The defendant excepts because of the instruction as above in regard to the second issue, and the plaintiff excepts because the amount of the payment, $1,065.84, which he received from the bank out of the proceeds of the check, was deducted from the amount of his check paid by the bank under the instruction as to the fifth issue. Both parties appealed.

H. O. Sapp, Swink & Hutchins, and O. O. Efrd, all of Winston-Salem, for plaintiff.

J. E. Alexander, of Winston-Salem, for defendant.

CLARK, C. J. The plaintiff, having canceled the security he held for the $1,065.84, contends that though he was paid by Byerly's check that sum out of the proceeds of the check which he handed to Byerly, he is entitled to recover the full amount of the check which he made payable to Adella Byerly, and which by an indorsement unauthorized by her was paid by the bank.

[1] A bank is liable for the payment of a check on a forged indorsement unless the drawer was guilty of some negligence which caused the bank to pay it.

"A bank is authorized to pay only to the person designated by the depositor. It cannot charge against the depositor's account an amount paid by it on a forged indorsement of the depositor's check unless such payment is properly attributable to the negligence or other fault of the depositor, or unless the money has actually reached the person whom the drawer intended should receive it, or the drawer himself." 7 C. J. § 414, p. 686.

In 2 Daniel's Neg. Instruments, it is said, as quoted in note 23 to 7 C. J. 678:

"Cases have arisen in which checks have been paid on forged indorsements made by the person to whom the drawer delivered the check, mistaking his identity for the one who is designated as payee; and, although it be a forgery of the name of the person whom the bank took him to be, it has been considered that the bank should be protected in paying the check because the drawer was in fault in the first instance, and the person who forged the instrument was the person to whom the drawer actually delivered the instrument."

We do not think this quotation, however, is in point. For there was no mistake as to the person W. B. Byerly, to whom the check was paid, which was indorsed "Adella J. Byerly, by W. B. Byerly."

[2] We do not think these, however, and other similar authorities, have a bearing upon this question. The indorsement of the check to the bank was not forged by W. B. Byerly, who obtained the money thereon. The check was obtained from the plaintiff by the forgery of a mortgage purporting to be signed by Adella Byerly, and the check procured on such forgery was handed by the drawer to W. B. Byerly, but the check was made payable to Adella J. Byerly. Whether the plaintiff was negligent or not in making a check payable to Adella J. Byerly upon the faith of a forged mortgage purported to be executed by her, and acknowledged before a notary public who certified that Adella J. Byerly had signed the deed in trust is not the issue in this case.

The plain fact here is that the plaintiff gave a check, payable to Adella J. Byerly, and that check was paid by the bank, not upon her forged signature, but to W. B. Byerly, a depositor well known to the bank, who indorsed the check "Adella J. Byerly, by W. B. Byerly." It is therefore not the case of the payment of a check upon a forged indorsement, but upon a genuine indorsement made by W. B. Byerly and the defect is not a forgery, for there was none in this respect, but the bank negligently assumed that W. B. Byerly had authority to indorse the paper "Adella J. Byerly by W. B. Byerly." There was no negligence of the plaintiff shown to justify this negligence of the bank.

Upon the evidence the court properly directed the jury to answer all the issues in favor of the plaintiff except as to the fifth issue, as to which he directed the jury to credit the check with the amount, $1,065.84, repaid to the plaintiff out of the proceeds of the plaintiff's check which had been credited to Byerly.

[3] The amount returned to the plaintiff came out of the proceeds of the check issued to Adella J. Byerly, and, inasmuch as the plaintiff had canceled the mortgage held by him against W. B. Byerly by reason of the forged instrument delivered to him, such cancellation, as between the plaintiff and W. B. Byerly, was a nullity, and his remedy as to so much of the proceeds ($1,065.84) as was repaid to him is to be sought by reinstatement of his lien against Byerly; and if that has been lost by the sale of the property in the meantime to other parties, it is the plaintiff's loss.

As between the plaintiff and the bank the amount of the check paid by it on Byerly's unauthorized indorsement should be credited with the $1,065.84 which was repaid to the plaintiff by Byerly out of the proceeds of the check, for this measures the loss which the plaintiff has sustained by reason of the payment of the check upon the indorsement thereof by W. B. Byerly. The $1,065.84, if lost, has been lost by plaintiff's acceptance of the forged security.

As to both appeals we find no error.

MITCHELL v. STATE. (No. 2779.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 14, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Homicide ⚡127—Indictment for murder by poisoning not demurrable.

The court did not err in overruling the demurrer to the indictment.

2. Homicide ⚡166(12), 338(1)—Evidence of insurance paid defendant on life of other than deceased held erroneous and prejudicial.

One ground of the motion for a new trial assigns error on the admission, over timely objection, of the following evidence: "I suppose Dr. Mitchell has paid my company around $50. We declined to pay this. We paid Dr. Mitchell $500 when he lost his first wife." This testimony was objected to by the defendant's counsel upon the ground that the evidence in regard to insurance on his former wife, who is now dead, was not admissible, and could not in any way shed any light upon this homicide. Evidence had already been admitted tending to show that the accused was the beneficiary of insurance policies taken out on the life of his nephew, the deceased, Henry Sam Mitchell; and this was urged as a motive for the defendant to commit the crime. The evidence objected to in this ground of the motion, to the effect that the insurance company had paid the accused $500 when he lost his first wife, was irrelevant and prejudicial, and the error requires the grant of a new trial.

3. Criminal law ⚡1064½—Ground of motion not unqualifiedly approved not considered.

Other grounds of the motion for a new trial were not unqualifiedly approved by the trial judge; therefore no ruling upon them will be made.

4. Criminal law ⚡1134(4)—Newly discovered evidence not considered, when judgment reversed on other ground.

Another ground of the motion for a new trial is based upon alleged newly discovered evidence. As the case is, for the reasons stated in the second headnote, to be remanded for a new trial, it is unnecessary to rule upon this ground.

5. Criminal law ⚡371(12), 419, 420(12), 442—Homicide ⚡166(12)—Insurance policies and applications admissible to show motive, and not inadmissible as hearsay tending to prove another crime or for want of execution.

Several grounds of the motion complain of the admission of documentary evidence, such as life insurance policies, the applications therefor, and the like, the objection being that they were hearsay, irrelevant, and inadmissible, that such documentary evidence tended to charge the defendant with an independent crime other than that for which he was being tried, and that the execution of the documents had not been proved. These documents were admissible for the purpose of showing motive; and therefore the court did not err, as against the objections raised in admitting the same.

6. Homicide ⚡166(12)—Policies on deceased's life, payable to accused's relatives, admissible on question of motive.

Other grounds of the motion for a new trial complain of the admission of policies of insurance on the life of the deceased, Henry Sam Mitchell, the ground of objection being that the policies were payable, one to Ella Mitchell, and one to Marie Mitchell. It appears from the evidence that these two designated beneficiaries were relatives of the deceased and of the accused; and the evidence was not inadmissible for any of the reasons assigned.

7. Grounds of motion incomplete and indefinite.

Other grounds of the motion for a new trial are incomplete, or too indefinite to raise any question to be decided by this court.

8. Charge not erroneous.

The grounds of the motion assigning error on excerpts from the charge of the court are not meritorious, all of which have been settled by previous decisions of this court.

9. Criminal law ⚡698(1) — When evidence admitted subject to connection of defendant therewith, defendant must renew objection.

Where counsel objects to the admission of evidence, and the court neither finally admits nor rejects the same, but states to counsel, "Unless the defendant is in some way connected with it I will rule it out, but I will not rule it out now," it is the duty of objecting counsel to renew his objection or move to rule the testimony out; otherwise it will be presumed that the objection is waived.

10. Witnesses ⚡388(1)—Exclusion of statements of person who had not at the time testified, offered as foundation for impeachment, not error.

It was not error to exclude the sayings of a person who had not at the time testified as a witness in the case; the object of the testimony being to lay the foundation to impeach the witness. The legal method of laying the foundation for such impeachment is to first interrogate the person whose impeachment is sought, when he is sworn and placed on the stand as a witness; and therefore the court properly excluded sayings which at the time amounted only to hearsay evidence.

11. Criminal law ⚡419, 420(1), 921—Testimony of witness as to refusal of Bureau of War Risks to let original papers leave office held not hearsay as a whole nor ground for new trial.

One ground of the motion for a new trial complains that the court admitted, over timely objection, the following testimony of a witness for the state: "My business is operative of the United States Secret Service. I am familiar with the rules and regulations of the Treasury Department in Washington in reference to keeping of file of certain papers. It is required by the Bureau of War Risks that all applications for insurance and the change of beneficiary, and affidavits in support of the insurance claim, that the original of those papers be kept and filed in the city of Washington in the United States Treasury Department; of course persons who are interested can go and see the originals, but they won't allow the original papers to go out of the office." This evidence is not shown to be harmful to the accused; and, as it was not, as a whole, subject to the objection that it was hearsay, this ground of the motion does not show cause for a new trial.

12. Criminal law — 867—Argument of counsel concerning effect of nonenforcement of law held not to require mistrial.

One ground of the motion complains that the court refused to declare a mistrial, on motion of defendant's counsel, because of the language used by the solicitor general in his concluding argument to the jury, movant alleging that "the solicitor general was arguing to the jury that the nonenforcement of the law would make human life as cheap here as in the jungles of Africa." The refusal to declare a mistrial because of the use of this language was not error.

13. Other grounds insufficient to require new trial.

The grounds of the motion for a new trial not mentioned above do not show cause for the grant of a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; H. A. Mathews, Judge.

M. C. Mitchell was convicted of murder, and he brings error. Reversed.

Dr. M. C. Mitchell, a negro practitioner of medicine, was convicted of the murder of his nephew, Henry S. Mitchell, and given a sentence of life imprisonment. The indictment charges that Dr. Mitchell prepared and administered and caused to be administered, internally to Henry S. Mitchell, arsenic or other poisons of like character, which produce death. The indictment was demurred to upon the grounds that it does not charge any offense; does not charge the time and place when the poison was alleged to have been administered; does not charge that the "other poisons of like character" were deadly and likely to produce death, or that the defendant administered these other poisons with intent to kill unlawfully and with malice aforethought; does not set out any amount of poison as having been administered, and does not with sufficient clearness allege the manner in which the poison was administered. Error is assigned on exception taken pendente lite to the overrulings of this demurrer. Error is also assigned upon the overruling of a motion for new trial.

The contention of the state was that the defendant had administered the poison which produced the death of Henry S. Mitchell, in order that he might realize some twenty-odd thousand dollars of insurance carried upon the life of Henry S. Mitchell, the policies covering which were payable to Dr. Mitchell or to some member of his family. The evidence introduced by the state tended to show that after the discharge of Henry S. Mitchell from the army he lived for some time the life of a vagrant in and around Montezuma, where the defendant was engaged in the practice of medicine and the conduct of a drug store; that during this time an examination by a physician revealed the fact that the deceased had syphilis in an advanced stage; that the beneficiary in a certificate of insurance carried by the deceased with the Bureau of War Risks was changed, and the same was made payable to the defendant; that with knowledge of the condition of the deceased the defendant procured the issuance of a number of insurance policies upon the life of the deceased, payable to himself or to members of his family; that in some instances the reports of the medical examination, purporting to have been filled in and signed by a physician formerly engaged with the defendant as a partner in the practice of medicine, were forgeries; that these forgeries were committed by the defendant; that premiums upon the policies were paid by the defendant, and, while remittances covering the claims under the policies were made payable to the beneficiaries named in the policies, the proceeds were collected by the defendant; and that the defendant had made an unsuccessful attempt to burn the deceased to death, and, having failed in that, resorted to the use of poison. In his statement the defendant explained that he had raised the deceased and cared for him as if he had been his own child; that the members of his family "had a lot of insurance"; that during the time the deceased was in the army he had three or four policies payable to his grandmother, the mother of the defendant; that the premiums on these policies were paid by the defendant and his mother; that defendant knew nothing of the taking of the certificate of war-risk insurance; that the change in beneficiary in that certificate was made voluntarily by the deceased, because of the ill health of defendant's mother, the original beneficiary; that the clothing of the deceased accidentally caught on fire, and the defendant extinguished the flames. The defendant claimed that the death was caused by the burning or the inhalation of flames. The evidence discloses that the burning occurred on December 27, 1919, and that death followed on December 31, 1919. The body was embalmed, and, after having been buried for approximately a year, was exhumed. Experts who removed and examined the viscera testified that they contained traces of arsenic, showing that the deceased had taken a sufficient amount of the poison to have produced death, and that there were practically no evidences of injury from burning. A negro physician, who was called to attend the deceased immediately after the burning, testified that the injuries were only slight. A physician who treated the deceased for syphilis testified that quite awhile before the death of the deceased he had administered through the veins one dose only of "606." There was expert evidence to the effect that this remedy is a preparation of arsenic; that the doses are ordinarily given about one week apart, in order to allow for the elimination of the dose from the system; that one dose would in no event contain sufficient of the poison to produce death; and that only a very small amount, if any at all, would find its way into the alimentary canal.

PILLEY, Com'r, v. SULLIVAN. (No. 30.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 23, 1921.)

1. Perpetuities §6(1)—Restraint on alienation held void.

Where one devise of land was in fee simple and another was of an estate for life with remainder in the daughter of the tenants for life, a provision that the devisees should not sell or convey the land, but that it should descend by inheritance to their next of kin, and, if either or both die without heirs or intestate, that it should be equally divided among all the heirs of the testator's children, is void as repugnant to the estate devised, and in contravention of public policy.

2. Wills §439—Primary purpose in construing is to give effect to intention of testator.

The primary purpose in construing a will is to ascertain and give effect to the intention of the maker.

3. Wills §450, 461, 470, 471—Rules of construction stated.

In construing a will, the entire will should be considered, clauses apparently repugnant being reconciled, and effect given where possible to every clause and word, and sometimes the word "or" should be construed as meaning "and."

4. Wills §461, 506(4), 622 — Limitation of devise construed; "or;" "heirs;" "either or both."

Where a devise was to testator's son and his wife for life, with remainder to their daughter, and another devise was to his daughter with condition that the land should not be sold by any of the devisees, "but the same shall descend by inheritance to their next of kin, and if either or both should die without heirs or intestate, then it shall be equally devised among all my children's heirs, share and share alike," the word "or" between "heirs" and "intestate" should be construed as meaning "and," and the word "heirs" should be construed as meaning "children," while the words "either or both" in the clause "if either or both should die without heirs or intestate" cannot be construed as applying to testator's son and his wife, since the remainder after their life estate vests in their daughter.

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; Horton, Judge.

Submission of controversy without action between J. T. Pilley, Commissioner, and J. B. Sullivan. From a judgment directing plaintiff to deliver and defendant to accept a deed to land, defendant appeals. Reversed.

The statement of the agreed facts is as follows:

"(1) That J. T. Pilley was duly appointed as commissioner in a special proceeding in the superior court of Beaufort county, entitled, 'J. T. Pilley and Wife, Mattie E. Pilley, and Kathleen Lamm, by Next Friend, J. T. Pilley, and Sidney Lamm, her husband, ex parte,' and as such commissioner duly authorized and empowered to convey to J. B. Sullivan the tract of land known as the A. S. Pilley land, containing 100 acres more or less, the said proceeding being regular and sufficient to authorize conveyance of said land.

"(2) That the said land was devised by Alfred S. Pilley by his will, dated August, 1913, and recorded in Beaufort county, in Book of Wills No. 4, at page 36, the material parts of which said will are as follows:

"Third Item. I give and devise to my daughter, Harriet Chauncey, twenty-five acres of land to be divided off from the west end of my home tract.

"Fourth. I give and devise unto my son, Jno. T. Pilley and his wife, Mattie E. Pilley, a life estate in all my lands and tenements with such privileges as may be necessary for their convenience and comfort during their natural lives except the twenty-five acres above devised to my daughter, Harriet Chauncey.

"Fifth. I give and devise to my granddaughter, Kathleen Pilley, the above-mentioned land whereon I live after the death of her father and mother, John T. and Mattie E. Pilley, all except the 25 acres above devised to my daughter, Harriet.

"It is my will and desire, and it is hereby stipulated that the devisees of my land herein named shall not sell or convey the said land or any part thereof to any individual or incorporative company, but the same shall descend by inheritance to their next of kin, and if either or both should die without heirs or intestate, then it shall be equally divided among all my children's heirs, share and share alike."

"(3) It is agreed that said John T. Pilley and wife, Mattie E. Pilley, are now living, and Kathleen Pilley has married one Sidney Lamm and now has one living child.

"(4) That the special proceeding authorizing sale of said land required and directed that the proceeds therefrom should be invested in land in Greenville, N. C., the title of which should be held under the same terms and conditions as set out in said will; that the agreed consideration to be paid for the conveyance of said land by J. B. Sullivan was $1,000.

"(5) That in the event that the court shall be of the opinion that the said Jno. T. Pilley and wife, Mattie E. Pilley, and the said Kathleen (Pilley) Lamm took a fee-simple estate under the provisions of said will, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover of the defendant the agreed consideration of the said conveyance of $1,000 upon the delivery to the defendant of the deed making the conveyance of said land, but that, if under the said will the estate of said parties is less than the fee simple, or it be subject to be defeated by conditions therein stated, then the plaintiff shall not recover anything; that cost shall be taxed against the losing party."

His honor rendered judgment directing the plaintiff to deliver and the defendant to accept a deed to the land described. The defendant excepted and appealed.

A. W. Bailey, of Washington, N. C., for appellant.

Harry McMullan, of Washington, N. C., for appellee.

ADAMS, J. [1] The contention of the parties presents for determination the quantity of the estate embraced in Items 4 and 5 of the last will and testament of Alfred S. Pilley. The clause which purports to ingraft upon the devise an unlimited restraint on alienation is not only repugnant to the estate devised, but is in contravention of public policy, and therefore void. Latimer v. Waddell, 119 N. C. 370, 26 S. E. 122, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 668; Wool v. Fleetwood, 136 N. C. 461, 48 S. E. 785, 67 L. R. A. 444; Christmas v. Winston, 152 N. C. 48, 67 S. E. 58, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1084; Lee v. Oates, 171 N. C. 717, 88 S. E. 889, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 514.

Lord Coke is credited with the observation that—

"Wills and the construction of them do more perplex a man than any other learning; and to make a certain construction of them, this excedit jurisprudentum artem."

[2] Nevertheless the courts have established canons of construction which are designed as guides to the discovery of the testator's intent; for the primary purpose in construing a will is to ascertain and give effect to the intention of the maker.

[3] Accordingly, the entire will should be considered; clauses apparently repugnant should be reconciled; and effect given wherever possible to every clause and to every word. One of the arbitrary canons of construction sometimes requires that the word "or" be construed as meaning "and." 28 R. C. L. 204 et seq.; Satterwaite v. Wilkinson, 173 N. C. 38, 91 S. E. 599; Ham v. Ham, 168 N. C. 487, 84 S. E. 840, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 301. In Dickenson v. Jordan, 5 N. C. 380, the testator devised certain land to his grandson in fee, with the limitation that, if he died before he arrived at lawful age or without leaving issue, the land should go to his other grandson in fee. Judge Taylor said:

"According to a literal construction of the will, the occurrence of either event would vest the estate in John Spier; but it is evident that such was not the testator's intention, and this intention ought always to be effectuated, when it does not contravene the rules of law. He could not have intended that the issue of William Spier Stewart should be deprived of the estate, if their father died under age; for that would operate to take all from those who appear to have been the principal objects of his bounty; yet such would be the effect of a literal interpretation of the will. His intention seems to have been that the fee should remain absolute in William S. Stewart on the happening of either event, either his leaving issue or attaining to lawful age, or, in other words, that both contingencies, to wit, his dying under age and without leaving issue, should happen before the estate vested in John Spier. To give effect to this intention, it is necessary to construe the disjunctive 'or' copulatively; and there are various clear and direct authorities which place the power of the court to do this beyond all doubt." Ham v. Ham, supra, and cases cited.

An application of this principle requires that the word "or" be read "and" in the expression "without heirs or intestate."

[4] The testator evidently did not intend that the limitation over should take effect in case Kathleen, although leaving heirs, should die intestate. It is equally manifest that the word "heirs" in the expression referred to should be construed as meaning children. Francks v. Whitaker, 116 N. C. 518, 21 S. E. 175; May v. Lewis, 132 N. C. 115, 43 S. E. 550. The clause "but the same shall descend to their next of kin" should be interpreted not so much as directing the course of descent as indicating the testator's reason for the attempted restraint or alienation. The words "either or both" in the clause "if either or both should die without heirs or intestate" cannot be construed as applying to John T. Pilley and Mattie E. Pilley, for the reason that they are only tenants for life, and upon the termination of their life estate, whether they die testate or intestate, the remainder will vest in the granddaughter, Kathleen Pilley. In this connection it will be noted that the limitation over is to "all my children's heirs, share and share alike." In point of legal interpretation the substance of the devise in items 4 and 5 is this:

"I give and devise unto my son, John T. Pilley and his wife, Mattie E. Pilley, an estate in all my lands and tenements, with such privileges as may be necessary for their convenience and comfort, during their natural lives, except the twenty-five acres devised to my daughter, Harriet Chauncey; and after their death I give and devise said land to my granddaughter, Kathleen Pilley, and if she should die intestate and without children, then said land shall be divided among all my children's heirs, share and share alike."

The testator gave to John Pilley and his wife a life estate with remainder in fee to Kathleen Pilley, defeasible in the event of her dying intestate and without children. The plaintiff therefore cannot convey an absolute fee to the defendant.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed.

STULTZ v. THOMAS et al. (No. 358.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 23, 1921.)

1. Trial \S 165—Evidence considered most favorably for plaintiff.

On a motion to nonsuit, the evidence should be considered in its most favorable light for plaintiff.

2. Negligence \S 6—Violation of law negligence per se.

Failure to discharge an affirmative duty imposed by law constitutes negligence per se.

3. Negligence \S 136(25)—Proximate cause of injury for jury.

It is for the jury to say whether negligence in failing to discharge an affirmative duty imposed by law was the proximate cause of an injury.

4. Municipal corporations \S 809(2)—Established custom of other paving contractors no defense to action for injuries caused by violation of ordinance requiring proper guards, lights, etc.

In an action for injuries from falling over a rope barricade erected by defendant contractors around a newly laid concrete sidewalk, an established use or custom among men engaged in the same line of work cannot avail defendants as against the positive requirements of an ordinance that excavators or others creating a dangerous condition on or near a street, alley, sidewalk, etc., place and maintain proper guard rails and signal lights or other warnings sufficient to warn the public and protect persons using reasonable care from injuries, for a breach of a legal duty comes within the very definition of negligence and is actionable if it be the proximate cause of an injury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Forsyth County; Webb, Judge.
